Under the proposition that the act is unconstitutional because it puts unreasonable restrictions and regulations upon the right to vote, counsel cites Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 78 Mich. 545, 7 L. R. A. 99. That case arose under a local act of the city of Detroit, passed in 1889, and it was held invalid because its tendency was to disfranchise a large class of voters in the city by unreasonable restrictions upon the manner of registration and of finding that they were entitled to registration. Such claim cannot be made under this act. The regulations are to preserve the purity of the election, and we see no constitutional objections to them as prescribed by the act. Certainly the reasons given by this court for holding the act void in Atty-Gen. v. Detroit have no application here. Similar laws have been upheld in many other states. In State v. Black, 54 N. J. L. 446, 16 L. R. A. 769, the supreme court of New Jersey, speaking of similar provisions of a statute in that state, says: "Any provision in such an act which is likely to bring about a result which conduces to the purity of popular elections should receive a favorable consideration. It is of course true that, if the effect of any provision is to shut off the voters from the ballot box, such provision must fall before the constitutional guaranty of the right to vote. But in measuring the cases of mere inconvenience, expense, or sentiment, the existence of a salutary purpose and the likelihood of the provision tending to accomplish that purpose must weigh greatly in determining the reasonableness of the statutory regulation." The supreme court of Missouri, in Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 45, 16 L. R. A. 754: "The ballot reform law was intended to improve the methods for giving expression to the popular will in the choice of public officers. It should be construed so as to promote, not to destroy, the great object in view in its passage." And the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in De Walt v. Bartley, 146 Pa. 529, 15 L. R. A. 771, says: "The law itself may be regarded in the light of an attempt on the part of the people to secure a pure, free, and unintimidated ballot. Every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of the law." The following cases also uphold the constitutionality of similar acts: Re Ballot Marks, supra; Minor v. Olin, 159 Mass. 487; Simpson v. Osborn, 52 Kan. 838; State v. Benton, 18 Mont. 806; Atkinson v. Lay, 115 Mo. 588. Our Constitution, by article 7, § 2, provides: "All votes shall be given by ballot, except for such township officers as may be authorized by law to be otherwise chosen:" and by section 6 of the same article it is provided: "Laws may be passed to preserve the purity of elections and guard against the abuse of the elective franchise." The act in question was passed to secure this end; and although it may result in some inconvenience to the voter, the restrictions placed upon the manner of voting, and regulations under which votes may be received and placed in the ballot boxes, are within the province of the legislature under the provisions of the constitution above quoted. The law aims to secure secrecy in the ballot, and does not attempt to disfranchise any voter. At the expense of this secrecy, and in order to enable voters who are physically incapacitated from marking their ballots, the law provides a method for such aid, as well as to those who cannot read the English language. The law does not deprive these voters of any right, but rather secures to them aid in voting intelligently; it is plain and simple in its provisions. Every voter, however illiterate or however much incapacitated physically, has a method pointed out by which he may exercise his right of franchise. The law does not shut off any class of voters from the ballot, and, we think, was designed by the legislature to accomplish the purpose specified in the constitution. Act No. 268 of the Public Acts of 1889, containing provisions to secure purity of elections, was before this court, and held valid in Detroit v. Rush, 82 Mich. 532, 10 L. R. A. 171; and the present act was before this court in Shields v. Jacob, 88 Mich. 164, 13 L. R. A. 760; Chateau v. Jacob, 88 Mich. 170; and McQuade v. Furgason, 91 Mich. 438. The questions in these cases referred to other provisions of the act, but in each the provisions of the act were enforced in the furtherance of the purity of the elections.

2. It is contended that the court was in error in directing the jury: "It is unlawful for either United States marshals, challengers, or others except inspectors of election who are lawfully assisting him, to either mark the ballot for voters, or see them marked before they are deposited in the ballot box, and all such votes are void; and it is contrary to law to deposit them in the ballot box or to count them in determining the result of the election." Section 32 provides the only authority by which an elector may have a ballot marked. It has been quoted above. The marking can be done only by an inspector designated by the board for that purpose, and in the presence of at least two of the inspectors. Under this act, no other can lawfully mark ballots, and to no other can the ballot be exhibited, unless United States supervisors of election may see them when a member of congress is to be elected. The court was therefore right in its interpretation of this act, if United States supervisors of election may not witness the marking. But counsel for respondent contends that, inasmuch as members of congress were to be elected at that election, this act must be construed in the light of, and in subordination to, sections 2017, 2019, 2021, 2022 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Section 2017 provides that "supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections for representatives or delegates in congress. . . . to be and remain where the ballot boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted . . . and to personally inspect and scrutinize from time to time and at all times on the day of election the manner in which the voting is done." Section 2019 provides that "the better to enable the supervisors of election to discharge their duties, they are authorized and directed . . . whether before or behind the ballot boxes as will in their judgment best enable them to see each person offering himself for registration or offering to vote, as will best conduce to their scrutinizing the manner in which the registration or voting is being conducted." By section 2021 it is provided that United States marshals shall attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct; and, by section 2022, it is further provided that "the marshal and his general deputies and such special deputies shall keep the peace and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties preserve order at such place of registration and such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, and fraudulent conduct on the part of any election officer." Counsel for respondent, it appears, at the close of the testimony asked the court to instruct the jury, in his fifth and ninth requests, as follows: "(5) If you are satisfied from the evidence that the method pursued by Inspectors Diemel and Vandergyp, in company with United States Officers Erhard and Knauss, in assisting voters in preparing their ballots, was pursued in good faith, and the voters in like manner received such assistance, then, in respect to the preparation of them, the ballots must be treated as valid." "(9) Under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the United States supervisors and deputy marshals at the election in question were authorized to put themselves in such place or places as would enable them to see that the ballot of an assisted voter was marked as directed or desired by the voter, and a disclosure of the contents of such ballot to the United States officers under such circumstances does not invalidate it." These requests were refused. Mr. Erhard, referred to in the fifth request, was United States supervisor of election, and Mr. Knauss a deputy United States marshal. By the finding of the jury, it appears that Mr. Erhard did not mark any of the ballots himself, but he saw others mark ballots of voters, and there were disclosed to him the names of 20 candidates voted for on the ballots so marked; and that the other supervisor of election saw 100 marked, and these were disclosed to him. But we shall not, for the purposes of this case, regard these ballots as irregular. It appears that Mr. Knauss, the deputy United States marshal, marked the ballots of 10 electors, and had disclosed to him the ballots of 100 electors after they were marked, so that he saw the names of the candidates voted thereon. Under the charge of the court, the jury were directed that it was unlawful for these officers to mark ballots or to see them marked, or for any disclosure of such ballots to be made to them. It is therefore seen that the court below did not discriminate between the United States supervisors of election and the deputy United States marshal.

Whatever may be said in reference to the power and authority of the United States supervisors of election under the federal law to mark ballots, or see them marked, for the purpose of seeing that the election is fairly and properly conducted, it is apparent that the deputy United States marshals have no such right or authority. In United States v. Gima, 8 Hughes, C. C. 549, Fed. Cas. No. 15,209, after citing sections 2017 and 2019 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, above quoted, the court said: "Thus not only does the law in terms empower a supervisor to be in the room with the judges of election, but empowers him to be in any place or position in which in his own judgment he can best perform his duties. The act of congress which is thus specific in defining and complete in conferring these powers on supervisors is the same one which prescribes the duties of deputy marshals. While it is thus express and full in regard to supervisors, it is the reverse in defining the authority of deputy marshals. Section 2021 simply provides that, when required to do so by the supervisors, it shall be the duty of deputy marshals to attend the polls in their districts or precincts. The section gives the deputy marshals no authority except to be present at the polls. The same act of congress which expressly directs supervisors to place themselves before or behind the ballot boxes as they may think proper is silent in regard to deputy marshals, and gives them no such authority." It is said by the court, in reference to section 2022, that that section defines the object of the appointment of deputy marshals, and defines their powers and duties,—that is, to keep the peace, and support and protect supervisors in the discharge of their duties,—and omits to give them authority to go behind ballot boxes and place themselves in any position they please, and that their duties are therefore not those of supervisors of election, but those of conservators of the peace at the polls, and that they have no right to be in the room in which the judges and supervisors of election are performing their duties, or go behind the ballot boxes, unless requested to do so by the judges and supervisors, except to prevent violence, or to preserve the peace when actually disturbed, or to prevent fraud actually attempted in the room. It is evident from the reading of these statutes that the deputy United States marshals, in the present case, had no right to mark ballots or to see them marked, or to know for whom the electors were voting. The court was therefore right in its direction to the jury, so far as the deputy United States marshals are concerned, and therefore right in refusing the request to charge, as the requests coupled the marshals with the supervisors of election. Whether the court was correct in the charge as to United States supervisors of election we need not discuss or pass upon, as it is apparent that, if the court was wrong in that particular, the respondent is not in any manner prejudiced by the ruling, as will be made apparent in our further discussion. The jury found, by the thirteenth and fourteenth findings, that the relator received in all the voting precincts of the county, aside from the fourth district of the Fifth ward of Detroit, 25,910 votes, and that the respondent received in the same districts 23,984 votes. The jury also found, by the forty-sixth finding, that the relator had a majority over the respondent in all the districts within the county of 1,926 votes. It is thus apparent that the jury, in arriving at this result, threw out the entire fourth district of the Fifth ward. This was undoubtedly done under the testimony and the charge of the court, in which they were directed as follows: "If illegal votes were received, and the evidence does not show in whose favor the illegal votes were cast, and they are as great in number as the majority received in that voting district, then the election in that district shall be thrown out and disregarded by you. If the evidence does not disclose for whom such illegal votes were cast, and they are less in number than the majority in that voting district, then they shall be taken from the total vote proportionately, according to the entire vote returned for each candidate in that precinct." It is contended that this was error. As to the fourth district of the Fifth ward, the jury found that Alois Diemel and John Vandergyp were designated as inspectors, by the board of inspectors, to mark ballots for electors who made oath that they could not read English. They found that 565 electors were assisted in marking their ballots because they could not read English, and that not one of them made oath that he could not read English. The jury further found that in that district Alois Diemel marked 320 ballots not in the presence of any other inspector; that Joseph Diemel, deputy United States marshal, marked 10 ballots, and saw 100 ballots marked by others, and that the contents thereof were disclosed to him; that Peter Knauss, deputy United States marshal, marked 10 ballots, and saw 100 ballots marked by others, and the contents thereof were disclosed to him; so that the jury found at least 540 illegal ballots cast at that poll, not counting those seen by the supervisors of election. In the fourth district of the Fifth ward, the record shows that the relator received 398 votes and the respondent 858 votes, or a majority for respondent of 560. It appears, therefore, that the jury must have taken into account the ballots marked and seen marked by the United States supervisors of election to make the number of illegal votes equal to the majority received by the respondent; that is, the 20 marked by Erhard and the 100 by the other supervisor, Mr. Schneider. If, however, the whole district should not have been excluded, and the illegal vote had been taken from the total vote, proportionately, according to the entire vote returned for each candidate in that district, it is apparent that the relator would still have a majority of the whole vote of the county, as shown by the finding of the jury, that being that the relator had 1,926 majority. If it be conceded that the respondent should have had the vote of that district apportioned, then he should be credited with a majority over the relator of 340. If now we take the other districts where the respondent had a majority, and make the same deductions, to wit, the fourth district of the Ninth ward, fifth district of the Eleventh ward, and fourth district of the Twelfth ward, he should be credited with 384 votes more; that is, in the four districts of the Fifth ward, together with these other districts which should have been apportioned, he should be credited with a majority of 724 votes in those districts. But even this leaves the relator ahead 1,203 votes in the whole county. So that, if it be conceded that the court was in error in the charge in permitting the jury to throw out any district, and the districts in which the respondent had a majority be apportioned under the rule laid down by the court, still the relator has a majority. This majority would be increased if the same rule were to be applied to districts where his majority was less than or equal to the illegal vote, as the jury found it was in the ninth district of the Second ward, the first district of the Fourth ward, the first district of the Sixth ward, the third district of the Eleventh ward, and the second district of the Thirteenth ward.

But it is claimed that the court erred in admitting testimony tending to show how many illegal voters voted, and in requiring inspectors of election and United States supervisors and deputy marshals to testify to the contents of ballots which were made known to them only in the performance of their official duties. This testimony is found in the cross-examination of respondent's witnesses, and that given by relator in rebuttal. The first relates to fifteen different districts, and the latter to eleven districts. We have carefully examined that testimony, with the result that ballots of both candidates were shown to have been exhibited so that parties seeing the ballots were able to state for whom the elector was voting; the only difference being that about twenty more ballots were exhibited showing respondent's name thereon than the relator's, so that, if all such ballots were excluded, it could make no possible difference in the result. If, therefore, the court was in error in directing the jury that "if illegal votes were received, and the evidence does not show in whose favor the illegal votes were cast, and they are as great in number as the majority received in that voting district, then the election in the district shall be thrown out and disregarded by you," it could not affect the result. We need not, therefore, pass upon the question whether the court was or was not correct in his instruction. It went beyond the rule laid down in Atty. Gen. v. McQuade, 94 Mich. 439. In that case the question was one of fraud affecting the whole poll, and the rule was adopted from the language of the court in Heyfron v. Mahoney, 9 Mont. 497, and other cases there cited, that, where the frauds are of such character that the correct vote cannot be determined, the return of the precinct will be rejected. In the present case the inspectors and other officers of the various districts are not charged with active fraud, but in marking ballots of those who claimed they could not read English, without having first made oath as to that fact. This may have arisen from the interpretation of the statute now claimed by respondent's counsel; that is, that such provisions are not mandatory, but directory merely. And, again, it appears that proofs were obtainable and actually introduced as to the number of electors whose ballots were so marked. This would not, under the facts shown, necessarily taint the vote of the whole district, and it would not taint the whole ballot if the jury were able to determine the correct ballot, as, under such circumstances, it would not destroy the presumption of the correctness of the other ballots cast. But, as said, this question, as it relates to the present case, is of but little moment, for the jury were able to determine the number of illegal votes put in the boxes in the various districts.

3. We now come to the other portion of the charge, where, in substance, the jury were directed that they should take the illegal votes from the total vote proportionately, according to the entire vote returned for each candidate in that district. In this we think the court, under well-settled rules, was entirely correct. It is a fair way to arrive at results. The rule is based upon the proposition that the illegal votes have gone into the boxes without the fault of either candidate. If these illegal votes can be separated from the legal ones, so that the number is substantially ascertained, then the poll is too large by exactly that number, and they must be cast out. In casting them out, the rule laid down by the court below is sustained by McCrary, Elections, 8d ed. § 460, where it is said: "Of course, in the application of this rule such illegal votes would be deducted proportionately from both candidates, according to the entire vote returned for each." In 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 353, it is said: "Where more ballots are found in the ballot box than there are names on the poll list, the statutes of many of the states require the officers of election to draw out enough ballots, without seeing them, to make the number equal to that of the voters. And, where they have not done this, it is probable that no other mode would be preferable to that of deducting from each candidate a number of votes proportioned to his total vote, compared with the aggregate vote of the precinct;" and the following cases are cited: Gibbons v. Sheppard, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 128; Finley v. Walls, 4 Cong. Elect. Cas. 367; Platte v. Goode, Id. 650. Our statute (How. Stat. § 174), provides: "If the ballots in the box shall be found to exceed in number the whole number of names of electors on the poll list, they shall be replaced in the box, and one of the inspectors shall publicly draw out and destroy so many ballots therefrom unopened as shall be equal to such excess." Mr. Justice Cooley, in speaking of this provision of the statute in People v. Cicott, 16 Mich. 322, 97 Am. Dec. 141, says: "As each ballot is usually one of a number designed to be allowed to particular cau-didates, and counted against others given to other candidates, the drawing may still work no injustice, since each candidate will probably lose by it a number proportionate to the relative number of ballots appearing for him in the box, and thus the relative proportions will be preserved." This rule, he says, "is based upon the doctrine of probabilities." While we have no statute directing the mode of apportionment laid down by the court below, yet the rule, we think, is one which does no injustice to either candidate, and in the end carries into effect, as nearly as may be, the will of the people as expressed at the polls.

4. But one further question need be discussed. It is contended by the respondent that the court erred in ruling that the relator had the opening and closing in putting in the proofs, and in the argument to the jury. We think there was no error in this. The burden of proof was upon the relator to establish his title to the office. In the proceeding the relator prosecutes and the respondent defends. We think the rule is that the right to open and close belongs to the party who seeks to alter the existing state of things, as stated by Thompson on Trials, § 287.

Judgment must be entered, finding the relator entitled to the office, and of ouster against the respondent.

Grant, Montgomery, and Hooker, JJ., concurred.

Montgomery, J., concurring:

I cannot assent to any construction of the statute which shall result in nullifying the salutary provisions which were intended as safeguards against the interference with voters in the exercise of their franchise, and were likewise intended to preclude the possibility of improper influences being brought to bear upon the voter, and it seems to me that the statute is so plain that one carefully considering the provisions with a purpose of getting at the legislative intent need not err therein. Section 21 of the Act provides for the erection in all voting precincts of a railing or fence, four feet in height, which is to be placed through and across the room, and for the construction of gates; and provides for a sworn gatekeeper, who shall be "sworn to allow no person to pass through said gate and enter said railing except as otherwise provided in this act, except to vote or assist some elector in the preparation of his ballot as provided in this act;" and provides that "no person shall be allowed to be inside of said railing, except to vote, or to assist an elector in the preparation of his ballot as hereinafter provided." Pub. Acts 1891, No. 190. The only provision made in the act for assisting a voter is section 82, which provides that "when an elector shall make oath that he cannot read English or that because of physical disability he cannot mark his ballot or when such disability shall be made manifest to said inspectors, his ballot shall be marked for him in the presence of at least two of the inspectors by an inspector designated by the board for that purpose." The provision of the law is plainly that no inspector can be in the position to observe the marking of the ballot except in case of physical disability, unless the elector shall make oath that he is unable to read the English language. No constitutional right is infringed by this provision in the interests of the purity of elections. Its purpose is plain,—to prevent the bartering and sale of votes either through the instrumentality of inspectors of election or of others outside the booths,—and it is only in the exceptional case of a voter who cannot, by reason of his inability to read the English language, and who makes the fact manifest by his oath, that there can be any departure from the usual method. If the requirement is held not mandatory, the inspector can be present in all cases as well as in a single case. But section 26 has made the legislative intent certain. This provides that "if any elector shall show his ballot, or any part thereof, to any person (other than one lawfully assisting him in the preparation thereof), after the same shall have been marked so as to disclose any of the candidates voted for, such ballot shall not be received or deposited in the ballot box." I am aware that many cases may be cited in which provisions relating to the method of conducting elections are held directory. But, certainly, the better authorities and the better reasoning do not justify the counting of a ballot which by the terms of the act it is provided shall not be received. I am not able to distinguish how a provision that a vote shall not be counted would more clearly indicate the legislative intent than does one which provides that it shall not be received or deposited in the ballot box, from which place alone it can be counted. I concur with Mr. Justice Long.

Long, Grant, and Hooker, JJ., concurred with Montgomery, J.

McGrath, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with my brethren in the conclusions reached by them. The original returns, as certified by the inspectors of election, gave May 26, 799 votes and Reynolds 26, 821, leaving a majority for Reynolds of 23 votes. The recount, made under Act No. 208, Laws 1887, by a Republican board of canvassers, gave May 26, 847 votes and Reynolds 26, 729, or a majority for respondent of 118. In his replications to respondent's plea, Reynolds sets forth: First: That 74 ballots cast for respondent bore distinguishing marks, and were therefore illegal and void. Second. That in the township of Ecorse, and in the First and Third wards of the city of Wyandotte, after the votes had been canvassed and returned, and before the recount was made, the votes cast were changed, raised, altered, and mutilated in the interest of respondent, so as to destroy 106 votes, which were cast in favor of relator, and insert in said ballot boxes, instead thereof, 100 false and fraudulent votes. Third. That there was no valid and legal election held or had in the fourth precinct of the Fifth ward, for the reason that 215 ballots were cast by persons who were not registered as electors. Fourth. That there was no valid election in said last-named precinct, for the reason that five outsiders wrongfully, illegally, and with the approval of the chairman of the board of election inspectors went into the polling booths, and worked, and influenced 750 voters, and marked their ballots, and said ballots were illegally received. Fifth. That in such last-named precinct 780 voters exposed their ballots to persons who were not lawfully assisting them. Sixth. That 215 unregistered voters were not sworn as required by law to justify their registration on election day. Seventh. That in the following named precincts the number of votes enumerated were cast by persons whose names were not entered on the poll lists; that the number of ballots found in the boxes at the close of the poll were in excess of the names on the poll lists; that all of said ballots so cast were canvassed, and that the poll lists were not placed in the ballot boxes, but were concealed or destroyed, to wit: In the second precinct in the Sixth ward, 528 votes; in the third precinct of the Sixth ward, 495 votes; and in the second precinct of the Seventh ward, 601 votes. No further or other charges were contained in the pleadings. Questions were framed, submitted, and sent to the jury, and have been answered. The first nine questions, and the answers thereto, are as follows: "(1) Did any of the ballots containing votes cast in favor of said respondent, William May, when the same were voted, bear distinguishing marks; that is to say, letters, initials, words, or marks so made thereon as to distinguish each of the same, respectively, from the other ballots cast at that election? No. (2) If so, how many, as near as can be estimated? Not any. (3) How many votes were cast in favor of said relator, Henry M. Reynolds, in the township of Ecorse? 243. (4) How many votes were cast in favor of said respondent, William May, in said township of Ecorse? 450. (5) How many votes were cast in favor of said relator, Henry M. Reynolds, in the First ward of the city of Wyandotte? 188. (6) How many votes were cast in favor of said respondent, William May, in the First ward of the city of Wyandotte? 182. (7) How many votes were cast in favor of said relator, Henry M. Reynolds, in the Third ward of the city of Wyandotte? 206. (8) How many votes were cast in favor of said respondent, in the Third ward of the city of Wyandotte? 182. (9) After the votes cast for said parties in said township of Ecorse, and in said First and Third wards of said city of Wyandotte had been canvassed and returned by the board of inspectors of elections thereof, were any of the votes cast therein changed, erased, altered, or mutilated at any time before the meeting of the board of county canvassers? No." (The figures given in answers to the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth questions are the exact figures returned by the canvassing board upon the recount). By these answers it will be observed that the charges made in relator's first and second specifications are expressly denied. The charges made in the sixth and seventh specifications were abandoned on the trial. Out of the 215 persons referred to in the third specification, relator's own witness Lemcke, found the names of all but 14 on the registration list, and of those found by him, 14 were discovered on the witness stand upon cross-examination. The jury found, not that the inspectors did not find these 14 names, but that they actually found all the other names. This would not affect the result, and disposes of the third specification. There is no pretense that any person went into any booth and worked or influenced a single voter, as charged in the fourth specification. The only other charges made are: (1) That a large number of voters exposed their ballots, and the ballots so exposed were received; (2) that voters were assisted without first having been sworn as to their inability to read English, as required by law. Although the law provides that no election district shall contain more than 500 electors, 1,158 electors actually voted in the fourth precinct of the Fifth ward. There were 300 more votes cast in this district than in any other district in the city. About 42,250 votes were cast in the entire city, which is divided into 102 voting precincts. Thirty-five precincts cast 22,400 votes, or an average of 650 each, while 67 districts cast 19,850 votes, or an average of 296 each. The First ward, where, out of a total vote of 8,299, relator received a majority of 541, is divided into eight districts. The second ward, where, out of a total vote of 2,914, relator received a majority of 484, is divided into nine precincts. The Fourth ward, where, out of a total vote of 3,060, relator received a majority of 498, is divided into eight precincts. The Fifth ward, where respondent, out of a total vote of 3,165, received a majority of 635, is divided into five districts. Relator attacked five other precincts, in each of which there are large numbers of German and Polish voters, and the number of votes cast in each average 700. In these districts the charge was made, and the only charge made in any district except the fourth precinct of the Fifth ward was, that large numbers of voters were assisted without first having taken the oath. Relator's proofs tended to show that there were 700 assisted voters in the fourth precinct of the Fifth ward, 586 in another precinct, 526 in another, 425 in another, and 348 in another. The law provides that the voter shall be assisted by "an inspector," in the presence of another inspector, and that the polls shall continue open 10 hours, or 600 minutes. At the trial, relator introduced the following testimony in support of the allegations relative to the fourth precinct of the Fifth ward: "That in the fourth district of the Fifth ward the registration list made prior to and used at the election, appeared as is set forth in the original registration book, which was introduced in evidence, and which, it is agreed upon by counsel, may be produced by either party at the hearing on this report in the supreme court, instead of having a copy annexed hereto; that all the poll lists made at the election were two in number, and as set forth in the originals, which were introduced in evidence, and which, it is agreed by counsel, may be produced by either party at the hearing on this report, instead of having copies annexed hereto; that the poll lists were written respectively by Casper Hoffman, a German, and Henry Vincent, an American of French descent; that the board of inspectors of election and board of registration in this district consisted of the following named persons: Alois Diemel, Edward Fierz, John Manquin, Bernard Zentowski, Peter Brinker, and John Vandergyp; that this board consisted of four Democrats and two Republicans; that no one was designated by the board to assist voters in the preparation of their ballots; that John Erhard, a Democrat, and William F. Schneider, a Republican, were United States supervisors of election; that Joseph Diemel, a Democrat, and Peter Knauss, a Republican, were deputy United States marshals; that there was one Democrat challenger and one Republican challenger; that two metropolitan policemen were stationed at the door through which voters were admitted from the street, and were in position to observe all that was going on in the room containing the booths; that the greater part of the voters consisted of Poles, Germans, and Italians; that from six hundred to seven hundred of the last-mentioned voters were assisted in the marking of their ballots, because they could not read English; that none of the voters thus assisted was sworn as to his inability to read English; that the only persons who actually marked the ballots for such voters were Alois Diemel, John Vandergyp, Joseph Diemel, and Peter Knauss; that during the election the marking of ballots for voters in this district, as above described, was seen or observed by the United States officers of election and deputy United States marshals above named; that the names set forth in question number 16 were selected by a witness for the relator, one Felix A. Lempke, a German of Polish extraction; that in selecting these names he had before him poll lists, Exhibit 99, and a printed copy of the registration list; that he had examined for the first time original poll list, Exhibit 98, on the Saturday and Sunday before giving his testimony in the case, together with the original registration book; that he had made a careful examination; that he was unable to find, and there was not in the registration book, the following names: No. 58, Q. Gabriel; No. 170, A. Katino; No. 188, Wm. Greataw; No. 224, Louis Tremonte; No. 227, Gus Debold; No. 254, Leo. Brichto; No. 290, A. Labasch; No. 310, Geo. Peterson; No. 322, Fred. Ziesse; No. 395, Chas. Stuerwald; No. 433, Frank Schoner; No. 709, Wenzil Ziska; No. 721, John Klaus; No. 726, Fred. Scheffler; No. 774, Jacob C. Land; No. 786, Jacob Wiley; No. 874, John Gaobarino; No. 993, John Gremps; No. 1044, Philip Green; No. 1068, Louis Gencorde; No. 1099, John A. Peters; No. 1103, C. J. Dean; No. 1115, Stephen Sauer; No. 1153, John Oss; No. 1155, Samuel Einick; No. 1161, John Ciescke; No. 1165, Anton Gora; No. 1186, Joseph Slanz [at this point relator's counsel announced that they would confine themselves to the 28 names above given]; that, on cross-examination, Lempke was able to find 14 of the 28 names above given; that during the entire day a Republican challenger was in attendance with a book containing a list of registered persons whose votes might be questioned, which book was furnished by a Mr. Burt, chairman of the Republican city and county committees; that the United States supervisor, from the opening of the polls until about 2 o'clock P. M., was present, and also looked after the matter of voting; that all persons objected to by them and others were not allowed to vote until the matter was investigated, and their right to vote established." There was no testimony introduced tending to show that unregistered voters had voted in the fourth district of the Fifth ward, except the registration book and the poll lists above mentioned.

The testimony of the respondent as to the fourth precinct of the Fifth ward was as follows: "Testimony tending to show that in the fourth district of the Fifth ward the board of registration and the board of inspectors of election for this election were as above set forth; that, by resolution of the board of inspectors, Alois Diemel, Democrat, and John Vandergyp, Republican, were appointed or designated to assist voters who might need such assistance in marking their ballots; that Dr. Kwicinski, a Pole, acted as interpreter; that Inspector Zentowski examined the registration book, Inspectors Fierz and Brinker received ballots, Tally Clerks Hoffman and Vincent kept poll lists, Inspector Manquin initialed and handed out the ballots; that, when the polls were first opened, a crowd of several hundred voters were in attendance; that the pressure of voting was great until about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when it became easier; that the number of voters who were assisted because they could not read English was about the same as shown by relator's testimony; that a large number of Poles, Germans, and Italians were assisted in making their ballots, because they could not read English; that the number thus assisted was the same as shown by the people's testimony; that none of the voters thus assisted was sworn as to his inability to read English; that in the early part of the day Inspectors Diemel and Vandergyp assisted voters in marking their ballots, always accompanying each other, until the rush or pressure of voting became so great it was thought necessary to assist voters in the following manner: Inspector Diemel accompanied by a Republican United States officer, attended to one voter, while Inspector Vandergyp, accompanied by a Democrat United States officer, attended to another, and thus assistance in marking ballots was rendered by Inspectors Diemel and Vandergyp until, in the latter part of the day, the rush subsided; that no persons other than Inspectors Diemel and Vandergyp assisted any voter in marking his ballot; that no person other than the inspectors designated by the board to assist voters in marking their ballots, and the United States supervisors and deputy marshals on duty at this poll, saw how any ballot was marked; that the method pursued in assisting voters in marking their ballots was adopted because it was believed that, on account of the large registration and the great number of voters needing assistance, the proper vote of the district could not be cast if the work of assisting voters in marking their ballots was to be done only by Diemel and Vandergyp in company with each other." The law provides for a board of election inspectors, and places them in charge of the polling place, and gives them authority and control of the conduct of the election. Section 23 of the law provides that a challenger for each party may be present inside the room where the ballot box is kept, and entitles him to the protection of the inspector and police. Pub. Acts 1891, No. 190. Section 25 makes it the duty of each inspector to challenge every person whom he shall know or suspect to be disqualified as an elector. Section 26 provides that if any elector shall show his ballot, or any part thereof, to any person (other than one lawfully assisting him in the preparation thereof) after the same shall have been marked, so as to disclose any of the candidates voted for, such ballot shall not be received or deposited in the ballot box. Section 32 provides: "When any elector shall make oath that he cannot read English, or that because of physical disability he cannot mark his ballot, or when such disability shall be made manifest to said inspectors his ballot shall be marked for him in the presence of at least two of the inspectors by an inspector designated by the board for that purpose who is not a candidate on said ticket." Section 36 provides that, in the canvass of the votes, any ballot which is not indorsed with the initials of the inspector, as provided in this act, and any ballot which shall bear any distinguishing mark or mutilation, shall be void, and shall not be counted, and any ballot or part of ballot from which it is impossible to determine the elector's choice of candidates shall be void as to the candidate or candidates thereby affected. The United States marshals present on election day were there under instructions from the attorney general of the United States that they had the right, and that it was their duty, to be and remain in all places where they can best discharge their duties, whether such places be inside or outside the guard rail, notwithstanding local statutes regulating the number of persons who are to be admitted within the guard rail on election day. The United States supervisors were present, with instructions that it was their duty to put themselves in such a place that they could see that the tickets were marked as directed by the voters. This precinct was manned with six election inspectors, four of whom were Democrats, and two Republicans; two United States supervisors of election, one of whom was a Democrat and the other a Republican; two challengers, one a Democrat and one a Republican; an interpreter; two deputy United States marshals; and two policemen stationed at the inner door. If any of these persons were not entitled to be present, they were there under color of right and authority, and with the knowledge, consent, and permission of the inspectors of election. Two of the inspectors of election were designated by the board to assist voters. A rush, incident to a crowded district, occurred, and in order to facilitate the voting and enable all to exercise the constitutional right of qualified electors, by and with the consent and approval of all present, the United States supervisors and the United States marshal were called upon by the inspectors to assist, and did so. Seven Democrats were present, and did not object. Five Republicans were there, and concurred. Inspectors, supervisors, and marshals, all charged by law with the duty of its observance and the prevention of wrongdoing, and with the solemn duty of permitting electors to cast their ballots, all acting in good faith, and solely with the desire of enabling voters to exercise a constitutional right, consent, approve, and concur.

The right to vote for, and be represented by, county and state officers is a constitutional right, which cannot be taken away or destroyed. Cooley, Const. Lim. 616; McCrary, Elections, 13. John Erhard, a supervisor and a Democrat, saw the ballots of 20 of the said voters while they were being marked by a Republican inspector; William Schneider, a supervisor and a Republican, saw the ballots of 100 voters while assisted by a Democrat inspector; Joseph Diemel, a marshal and a Democrat, saw the ballots of 100 voters while being assisted by a Republican inspector; Peter Knauss, a marshal and a Republican, saw the ballots of 100 voters as they were being assisted by the Democrat inspector, and Joseph Diemel and Peter Knauss each, in the presence of an inspector of the opposite party, marked the ballots of 10 of the assisted voters. This occurred in the presence of the board of election inspectors; indeed, it was done with the consent, approval, and procurement of the board. The board, officers of the law, charged with control of the place, and with the instruction and direction of the voter, participated in the work. Supervisors and marshals, there by federal authority, charged with the duty of supervision, participated in the work. Each and every one of these officers was there commissioned to protect, instruct, and direct the voter. No challenge is made by any person. Relator's specification alleges that this was done with the approval of the chairman of the board of election inspectors. To these officers, and to these officers only, did voters expose (?) their ballots. Is it not monstrous to say that, under these circumstances, the voter and this entire precinct, composed of 1,156 qualified electors, shall be disfranchised? The law should not be so construed as to make the machinery of election a snare to entrap the unsuspecting voter. It may be urged that the voter is charged with knowledge of the law, but is he charged with knowledge of the personnel of the inspectors, or of those designated to assist him? Inspectors of election are not either uniformed or badged. Is each voter bound to suspect men there by authority, acting in the presence of the power that creates the actors, and to inquire by what authority? Of whom should the voter inquire, if not of the very men who were engaged in and directing this work? These men, whether inspectors, supervisors, or marshals, were there acting in the capacity of instructors or assistants, in the presence of the board of inspectors, the very power under the law that should designate and create assistants or instructors, and were recognized by all as having authority. Were they not, under all the authorities, de facto assistants and instructors? Is an elector to be disfranchised because one of these de facto officers looked upon his ballot? If respondent be ousted from his office, who shall say that no witnesses sworn by him while acting as clerk of the circuit court for the county of Wayne can be prosecuted for perjury, or that every subpoena or summons signed by him is a nullity, because he was not legally elected to the office of county clerk? Suppose that no assistant be actually designated by the board, but that one should act for the day in the presence of the board; would the absence of an express designation disfranchise the voter? McCrary, Elect. §§ 105, 214, 216. In Boileau's Case, 2 Para. Sel. Eq. Cas. 503, Brightly, Elect. Cas. 268, upon the afternoon of the day of election, one of the clerks of election became intoxicated and unfit for his duties, and, at the request of the inspectors, one Coxe acted as clerk for the balance of the day, and until about 3 o'clock of the morning of the succeeding day, when the clerk, having recovered from his debauch, appeared and signed the returns. Coxe was not sworn, and was a candidate for assessor at this election. Held, that these facts were not such as should induce the court to set the election aside, and the ground of the decision was that the evidence did not disclose any bad faith on the part of the officers, nor any fraud. In the same case, one Harris, a candidate for judge, was occasionally in the room where the election was held, during its progress and after the polls closed; that he opened a few of the tickets, but, being admonished, desisted. Several witnesses testified to his handling tickets, and to his intermeddling, but the court says: "It has not been pretended that this election is in any particular tainted with actual fraud; no evidence has been adduced either showing legal votes to have been rejected or illegal votes received; the election seems to have been honestly conducted,"—and for these reasons the court declined to set it aside. Anderson v. Winfree, 85 Ky. 597.

But it is insisted that in this precinct, and in a large number of others, assisted voters were not first sworn. Whatever may be the construction of section 32 of the Act, it is evident from this record that in all but a very few of the districts in the county of Wayne boards of inspectors have construed it to mean that, where the fact that an elector is unable to read English is made manifest, it is not necessary to require the oath provided for by statute. I do not, however, regard this requirement as mandatory. The oath is not required to determine the qualifications of the elector. It will be noticed that our statute does not prohibit the receipt of a ballot unless the voter has been first sworn, or declare that the ballot so received shall be void, but it does provide, by section 36, that ballots not initialed, or which bear a distinguishing mark or mutilation shall not be counted, and that any ballot from which it is impossible to determine the elector's choice shall be void. The rule as laid down in 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 825, is as follows: "When the election is fair and honest, courts will not disfranchise the voters, unless compelled to do so by the peremptory requirements of the law. Directory provisions are such as are not of the essence of the election, but are enacted as a guide to the officers of the elections. As to what requirements are mandatory, and what merely directory, the cases are not all in agreement, and it may be difficult in some cases to determine from the authorities into which class a provision falls; but it may be said that the tendency of the courts, and also of legislative bodies, is not to hold a provision mandatory, unless it is clearly of such a character that its violation will tend to prevent a correct determination of the result of the election, unless it is declared in the law that its violation shall render the election void. This is true even if the language is prohibitory as to the officers, or even if its violation may subject the offending officer to penal liability." Judge McCrary, in his work on Elections (sec. 190), states the rule thus: "If the statute expressly declares any particular act to be essential to the validity of the election, or that its omission shall render the election void, all courts whose duty it is to enforce such statute must so hold, whether the particular act in question goes to the merits or affects the result of the election or not. Such a statute is imperative, and all considerations touching its policy or impolicy must be addressed to the legislature. But if, as in most cases, the statute simply provides that certain acts or things shall be done within a particular time, or in a particular manner, and does not declare that their performance is essential to the validity of the election, then they will be regarded as mandatory if they do, and directory if they do not, affect the actual merits of the election. . . . Statutes which simply direct the judges of election to number the ballots, without declaring what consequences shall follow if this be not done, may well be held directory only; but, where the statute both gives the direction and declares what the consequences of neglecting their observance shall be, there is no room for construction." Citing Ledbetter v. Hall, 63 Mo. 422; West v. Ross, 58 Mo. 350; Jones v. State, 1 Kan. 273; Gilleland v. Schuyler, 9 Kan. 569. See also Peard v. State, 84 Neb. 372.

It is true that a number of cases may be found holding certain provisions of certain statutes to be mandatory. The section in question here was not under discussion in Atty-Gen. v. McQuade, 94 Mich. 489. That case came here upon the pleadings, involving grave and flagrant charges. Willful and fraudulent conduct was set forth. The present case, when here upon the pleadings, did not disclose the real facts or issues involved. People v. Onondaga County Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 395, 14 L. R. A. 624, was an application for a mandamus to compel the counting of certain ballots. The court held that the ballots contained distinguishing marks, and were within the prohibition of the statute. The court says, however, that, in the absence of some clear and positive prohibition of the statute against counting such ballots, the tendency of the courts would undoubtedly be in the direction of effectuating as far as possible the intent of the voter. People v. Dutchess County Supra, 135 N. Y. 522, and Bechtel v. Albin, 184 Ind. 193, were both cases of marked ballots. In Re Ballot Marks, 18 R. L. —, the governor requested an opinion as to whether a cross placed at the right of a blank space below the names of the candidates on an official ballot, and opposite no name thereon, should be counted for any candidate on said ballot. The court held that a compliance with the requirement was necessary to determine the elector's intention, and that the ballot should not be counted. In State v. Ellis, 111 N. C. 124, 17 L. R. A. 883, the court held that the letters O. K. written on the outside of a ballot, are a device within the code providing that ballots shall be "without device," and that any ballot having a "device" on it shall be void. In State v. Walsh, 62 Conn. 260, 17 L. R. A. 864, the principal controversy arose over a large number of double ballots and upon the construction of the statute respecting their disposition. Other questions relate to distinguishing marks upon ballots. In Spurgin v. Thompson, 37 Neb. 89, it was held that the indorsement of the name of "Eagleham" upon a ballot was within the inhibition of the statute forbidding the marking of the ballot, and in the same case it was held that, while the statute requires that the cross which signifies the preference of the elector shall in ink be placed in a space designated for that purpose, a ballot upon which such preference is indicated by a cross made with a lead pencil, outside the space designated, but opposite the name of the choice of the elector, should be counted according to such manifest intention. None of these cases are opposed to the rule above laid down. The statutes in each case contain provisions similar to those contained in section 86 of our own statute, thus bringing the cases within the rule as stated. In Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 45, 16 L. R. A. 754, there is a very able and exhaustive discussion of the Australian ballot laws of England, Missouri, and other states, and of the principle embraced in the rule referred to. The court says: "Undoubtedly, some irregularities are of so grave a nature as to invalidate the whole return of the precinct at which they occur; as for example, the omission of registration (Zeiler v. Chapman, [1874] 54 Mo. 502), or of statutory notice, McPike v. Pen [1872] 51 Mo. 63. In determining which are of that kind, the courts aim merely to give effect to the intent of the lawmakers in that regard, aided by established rules of interpretation. If the law itself declares a specific irregularity to be fatal, the courts will follow that command, irrespective of their views of the importance of the requirement. Leadbetter v. Hall (1876) 62 Mo. 422. In the absence of such declaration, the judiciary endeavor, as best they may, to discern whether the deviation from the prescribed forms of law had or had not so vital an influence on the proceedings as probably prevented a free and full expression of the popular will. If it had, the irregularity is held to vitiate the entire return; otherwise, it is considered immaterial. It has been sometimes said, in this connection that certain provisions of election laws are mandatory, and others directory.

These terms may, perhaps, be convenient to distinguish one class of irregularities from the other. But, strictly speaking, all provisions of such laws are mandatory in the sense that they impose the duty of obedience on those who come within their purview. But it does not therefore follow that every slight departure therefrom should taint the whole proceedings with a fatal blemish. Courts justly consider the chief purpose of such laws, namely, the obtaining of a fair election and an honest return, as paramount in importance to the minor requirements which prescribe the formal steps to reach that end; and, in order not to defeat the main design, are frequently led to ignore such innocent irregularities of election officers as are free of fraud, and have not interfered with a full and fair expression of the voters." In Woodward v. Sarsons, 44 L. J. C. P. 293, it was held that where there was no ground for thinking that the electors had been prevented from voting as they wished, and the election was substantially won by ballot, it would not be invalidated because there may have been mistakes or misconduct in the use of the machinery of the ballot act; but that, in order to have this effect, the non-observance of the forms of the act must be so great as to amount to conducting the election contrary to the principle of an election by ballot, and be such that it did affect, or might have affected, the result. The statutes of Illinois provide that no vote should be received if the name of the person tendering same be not registered, unless such person shall furnish to the judges of election his affidavit that he is an inhabitant of the district and entitled to vote therein, and also prove by the oath of a householder and registered voter of the district that he knows such person to be an inhabitant of the district, but nevertheless it has been held in that state that when a person votes without having been registered and without proof of right, and it does not appear that he was challenged, or any objection made to his voting, the presumption must be that he was a legal voter, and so known to the judges of the election. Dale v. Irwin, 78 Ill. 170; Clark v. Robinson, 88 Ill. 498; Kuykendall v. Harker, 89 Ill. 126. In State v. O'Day, 69 Iowa, 868, it was held that no objection could be based upon the fact that an informal oath was administered to a legal voter; that an informal oath is no oath; and that, if the voter was a qualified elector, his ballot was lawfully received, even though he had not been sworn at all. There is a conflict in the authorities upon this subject. In the case of Reg. v. McNeil, 5 U. C. C. P. 137, where the votes of persons who had refused to take the oath had been received, the court excluded the votes, not because the voters were shown to be disqualified, but because they had refused to take the required oaths of qualification; but the court says that, where the voter has not been challenged, it may well be doubted whether, in the absence of any showing of fraud, the omission of the officers to require the statutory proof rebuts the presumption that the vote received is legal. In Wisconsin, where it is provided that no person whose name is not on the register shall be allowed to vote without furnishing certain proofs, it is held that this prohibition is mandatory, and that all votes received in violation of the provision should be rejected. State v. Hilmantel, 21 Wis. 567. In a number of cases it has been held, and Judge McCrary, in his work on Elections, upholds this view, that the vote is illegal, but that it may be counted upon proof that the person was a qualified voter. It is not necessary here to determine which rule, in our view, is the correct one, for no such case is here. There is an essential difference between requirements which go to the qualification of the elector and those police regulations relative to the means employed to get the ballots of qualified voters into the ballot box, the enforcement of which regulations is committed to officers designated by law for that purpose.

Intelligent men, familiar with the English language, have not readily grasped the intricacies of this new system or of the prescribed ballot. It is notorious that the class of electors who were assisted are wholly unfamiliar with our language. They comprehend an oath from the signs which attend its administration rather than from the language of such oath. These men were duly qualified electors, under the law. No fraud is charged. The only complaint made is that legal voters, entitled to vote, have voted without the observance of the machinery of the ballot act,—without the observance of a regulation, the enforcement of which was committed to the election officers. Yet those officers directed the conduct of these electors, and, with a full knowledge of the facts, received these votes unchallenged. Under these circumstances, I think the presumption should prevail that these voters could not read English, and that the inspectors of election were satisfied of that fact.

It is, however, urged that, inasmuch as these voters were not sworn, that part of section 26 which provides, if any elector shall show his ballot or any part thereof to any person (other than one lawfully assisting him in the preparation thereof) after the same shall have been marked, such ballot shall not be received or deposited in the ballot box, applies so that an exposure to an assistant vitiates the ballot. I do not think that the statute is subject to this strained construction. The oath is to be administered, not by the assistant, but before the board. The language of the section refers to the qualifications of the assistant, and not to the observance by the voter of the provisions of another section. If the provision that the elector should be first sworn is directory only, any process that such ballot passed through in the ordinary course did not invalidate it. The question here is not the right of the assistant to refuse to assist, the right of the board to refuse to receive a ballot, or the right of a voter who refused compliance with a requirement, but the right of those who have complied with all that was required of them. The purpose of this act is to secure to the elector an opportunity to exercise a sacred constitutional right, and the expression of the will of the majority, as well as to secure the purity and integrity of the ballot. The right of an elector to vote is the paramount right. The act was not framed to prevent the exercise of this right, nor should it receive a construction which will encourage the packing of voting precincts. The electors, and the other actors involved in the charges here made, were innocent of wrong. No voter has been denied the right to vote. All who voted, except, possibly, the 14, had all the qualifications of electors, and were entitled to vote. The effect of the rulings of the court below is to change a majority of 118 in favor of the respondent to one of 1,926 in favor of relator, and to disfranchise nearly 8,900 voters.

The construction given to this act by the court below leads to gross injustice, and I cannot but feel that there is fault in such construction, and that such a result was never intended or suspected by the legislature in framing the act. As is said by Barclay, J., in Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 45, 16 L. R. A. 754: "While it is well enough to insist upon a proper and strict performance of duty by officers conducting elections, we are not of the number of those who imagine that such performance will be promoted by disfranchising the whole body of electors in any locality where errors, such as here charged, occur. The legislature has not plainly declared such a purpose, and we think it should never be imported into a statute by construction."

MOTION by the receiver of the American Waterworks Company to dismiss a writ of error to the District Court for Arapahoe County which had been sued out in a suit between it and the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, on the ground that the affairs of plaintiff in error had been committed to the custody of the receiver, and that the writ of error having been procured at the instance of the vice-president of the company was unauthorized. Granted.

Statement Per Curiam:

Motion to dismiss the writ of error. The motion was based upon a duly verified petition, which, omitting the formal parts, was as follows: "Your petitioner, E. Hyde Rust, receiver of the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey, respectfully petitions the court and prays that the writ of error in the above-entitled cause be dismissed, and in support of said petition represents unto the court as follows: (1) The American Waterworks Company of New Jersey was incorporated under an act of the legislature of the state of New Jersey, entitled 'An act concerning corporations,' approved April 7, 1875, and the acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, which said act, among other things, expressly provides as follows, to wit: 'Whenever any incorporated company shall have become insolvent, or shall suspend its ordinary business for want of funds to carry on the same, it shall and may be lawful for any creditor or stockholder to apply, by petition or bill of complaint, to the chancellor, setting forth the facts and circumstances of the case, for a writ of injunction and the appointment of a receiver, receivers, or trustees; whereupon, the chancellor, being satisfied of the sufficiency of said application, and also of the truth of the facts and allegations contained in the said petition or bill, by affidavit or otherwise, and upon giving, when so ordered, such reasonable notice, to be served or published, as the chancellor, in an order to be made for that purpose, shall direct, the chancellor may proceed in a summary way to hear the affidavits, proofs, and allegations which may be offered by or on behalf of the parties; and if, upon such inquiry into the matters or cause of complaint, it shall be made to appear to the chancellor that the said company has become insolvent, and shall not be about to resume its business in a short time thereafter, with safety to the public and advantage to the stockholders, it shall and may be lawful for the chancellor to issue an injunction to restrain the said company and its officers and agents from exercising any of the privileges or franchises granted by its certificate, or by the act incorporating the said company, or from collecting or receiving any debt, or from paying out, selling, assigning or transferring any of the estate, moneys, funds, lands, tenements or effects of the said company until the court shall otherwise order.' (2) Your petitioner represents to the court that the said act is a part of the charter of the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey, and that in said act it is further expressly provided as follows: 'It shall and may be lawful for the court of chancery, if the circumstances of the case and the ends of justice require at the time of ordering the said injunction, or at any other time afterwards during the continuance of the said injunction, to appoint a receiver or receivers, or trustee or trustees, with full power to demand, sue for, collect, receive and take into their possession, all the goods and chattels, rights and credits, moneys and effects, lands and tenements, books, papers, choses in action, bills, notes and property of every description belonging to said company at the time of their insolvency or suspension of business as aforesaid; and to sell, convey or assign all the said real or personal estate.' (8) And your petitioner further shows that heretofore, and on, to wit, the 8th day of April, 1892, there was exhibited in the court of chancery of the state of New Jersey a bill of complaint by certain stockholders and certain creditors of the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey, including the Denver City Waterworks Company and others, against the said American Waterworks Company of New Jersey, by and in which it was made to appear to the said court of chancery of the state of New Jersey, as the fact then was and still is, that the said American Waterworks Company of New Jersey was insolvent, and was not carrying on its ordinary business for want of funds, and that its liabilities were in excess of its assets, and that the said company was without any legally constituted governing body, and was unable to elect or convene one; and said bill prayed that said company, its officers, agents, directors, and attorneys, and each and every of them, might be enjoined and forbidden from receiving any debts due the said company, from paying and transferring any of its moneys or effects, and from in any manner exercising any of the franchises or privileges of its charter, and from holding any meetings or alleged or pretended meetings at which action might be taken concerning the business of said company, or attempt to use the defendant's name and its privileges and franchises for any purpose whatever, and that said defendant company might be decreed to be insolvent, and that a receiver thereof might be appointed according to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided,—that is to say, the statute of the state of New Jersey,—and that the said complainants in said action might have such further or other relief in the premises as the nature of the case might require and as might be agreeable to equity and good conscience; whereupon, after issue joined and appearance made by the said defendant the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey in its own name, as well also as of certain of its stockholders defending and opposing said application, including among such stockholders Clarence H. Venner, who was then, and still is, one of the vice-presidents of said the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey, the said court of chancery of the state of New Jersey did, on the 20th day of July, 1892, make and enter the following decree, to wit: 'Upon opening the matter this day to the court by Lindley M. Garrison, of counsel for the complainants, in the presence of Flavel McGee, of counsel for Clarence H. Venner and others of the directors who were permitted to interpose for the defendant by order of the chancellor, and due proof being made of the service of the order to show cause heretofore granted herein, and it appearing to the court that the said defendant corporation is insolvent, it is on this 20th day of July, A. D. 1892, ordered that the said order to show cause be made absolute, and that an injunction do issue against the said defendant according to the prayer of the said bill. And it is further ordered that E. Hyde Rust, Esq., of Jersey City, be, and he is hereby, appointed receiver, with full power to demand, sue for, collect, and receive and take into his possession all the goods and chattels, rights and credits, moneys and effects, lands and tenements, books, papers, choses in action, bills, notes, and property of every description belonging to the said the American Waterworks Company, and to perform all the duties imposed upon him and required by law, and especially by an act entitled 'An act concerning corporations,' approved April 7, 1875, and the acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof. And it is further ordered that the said E. Hyde Rust, Esq., before entering upon his duties, take the oath prescribed by law, and give bond to the chancellor for the sum of twenty thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, to be approved, as to form and security therefor, by John W. Heck, Esq., one of the masters of this court. [Signed] Alex. T. McGill, Chancellor.' (4) Your petitioner further shows unto the court that he, the said E. Hyde Rust, did, on the 22d day of July, 1892, duly file his bond as receiver as aforesaid, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars; that the said bond was duly approved, as in said order provided, and your petitioner qualified as such receiver, and entered upon his duties as such, and since then has been, and is now, receiver of said the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey. (5) Your petitioner further shows that an injunction was duly issued in said cause as prayed for in the complaint therein filed, and in accordance with the order of said chancellor, wherein it was provided as follows: 'The said defendant company (meaning the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey), its officers, directors, agents, and attorneys, and each and every of them, shall absolutely desist and refrain from receiving any debts due to it, and from paying and transferring any of its moneys and effects, and from in any manner continuing its business, or exercising any of the franchises or privileges of its charter, and from holding any meetings, or alleged or pretended meetings, at which action might be taken concerning any business of the said company, or attempting to use its name and its privileges and franchises for any purpose whatever,'—which said injunction is still in full force. (6) Your petitioner further shows unto the court that one Clarence H. Venner was, at the time of the institution of said suit in the court of chancery of New Jersey, as above mentioned, one of the two vice-presidents of said the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey; that he, as permitted by order of said chancellor, personally appeared and defended said cause in the name of the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey, notwithstanding which said defense the orders and decree of said court as hereinbefore set out were, after hearing and argument, duly made and entered as the action of said court. That since the entry of the order appointing your petitioner as receiver as aforesaid, the said Clarence H. Venner has had no right or authority in any manner whatsoever to use the name of the said the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey for any purpose whatsoever, and that your petitioner, as receiver of said company, alone has authority to institute or continue suits in the name or on behalf of said the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey. (7) Your petitioner further shows that the writ of error heretofore sued out in this case in the name of the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey was so sued out at the request and at the instigation of the said Clarence H. Venner, without the consent or authority of your said petitioner, and in violation of the injunction so issued as aforesaid by the court of chancery of the state of New Jersey, and without any action or direction of the board of directors or other governing body of said the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey. That in the opinion of your said petitioner, as receiver as aforesaid, it is not to the interest of said the American Waterworks Company of New Jersey to prosecute said writ of error. Wherefore, your petitioner prays that the said writ of error be dismissed."

An answer to the foregoing petition, and also an agreed statement of facts in writing, signed by the attorneys of Rust and Venner, respectively, were filed herein, and thereupon the motion to dismiss was submitted.

Per Curiam:

By the petition to dismiss the writ of error, the answer thereto, and the agreed statements of facts filed in connection therewith, all matters essential to the determination of this motion are admitted.

1. A corporation is a creature of the law. It is always subject to the law of its charter, or, if it has no special charter, then to the incorporation laws of the state or sovereignty under and by virtue of which it has been created; and though it may transact business in other jurisdictions, yet its charter or the laws to which it owes its existence have a paramount influence over its corporate powers wherever it undertakes to exercise them. Hence, to determine the capacity or disability of a corporation in a given case, regard must primarily be had to the laws of the state or sovereignty from which it has derived its franchises. See Canada Southern R. Co. v. Gebhard, 109 U. S. 527, 27 L. ed. 1020. Also Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 585, 10 L. ed. 306 et seq., and cases there cited.

2. It appears that plaintiff in error is a corporation duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of New Jersey. From the agreed statement of facts it appears that plaintiff in error, prior to the suing out of the writ of error in this cause, had become an insolvent corporation, and had been so adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction in the state of New Jersey; that by the judgment of said court under the laws of said state the petitioner, E. Hyde Rust, had become the duly appointed and qualified receiver of said corporation, with full powers to control and manage its affairs; and, further, that plaintiff in error as a corporation, its officers, directors, agents, and attorneys, and each and every of them, had been absolutely enjoined from in any manner continuing the business of said corporation, or from attempting to use its name, privileges, or franchises for any purpose whatever. There is nothing in the petition, answer, or agreed statement of facts to show that plaintiff in error, or Mr. Venner as one of its vice-presidents, has ever been relieved from the disabilities of said injunction, or that they, or either of them, have any power or authority to prosecute the writ of error herein. It seems clear that Mr. Rust, as receiver of the plaintiff in error, is justified in pleading the laws of New Jersey relating to insolvent corporations, and the decrees of a court of competent jurisdiction of that state based thereon, in support of this motion to dismiss the writ of error herein. Such laws and decrees are admitted to be correctly set forth in the petition.

3. Against the granting of this motion to dismiss it is urged that the laws of a state have no extraterritorial force. It is also urged that the receiver of a corporation cannot exercise his powers as such beyond the jurisdiction of the court appointing him. Conceding that the laws of a state do not have any extraterritorial force as mere laws, nevertheless the general rule is that things done in one state in pursuance of the laws of that state are to be regarded as valid and binding in other states. Moreover, Mr. Rust by his petition to dismiss this writ of error, is not seeking to transact business or do any affirmative act by virtue of his authority as receiver of the corporation. On the contrary, he seeks to prevent the corporation of which he has been invested with exclusive control from doing an affirmative act contrary to the laws of the state from which such corporation has derived its powers, and contrary to the judgment of a court having full jurisdiction in the premises; in other words, he seeks to prevent Mr. Venner from making an unauthorized use of the name of such corporation. In taking this course Mr. Rust is undoubtedly acting within the scope of his authority as the duly appointed and qualified receiver of plaintiff in error. Life Assn. of America v. Rundie, 103 U. S. 225, 26 L. ed. 339; Bockover v. Life Assn. of America, 77 Va. 85.

An extended discussion of the legal questions involved in this motion seems unnecessary. Whatever may be the grievances of Mr. Venner, it is clear that he is not entitled to use the name of plaintiff in error in the further prosecution of this writ.

The motion to dismiss must be sustained.

(18 Colo. 373.)

1. Persons cannot be convicted of conspiracy to commit larceny if they merely adopt a scheme which is suggested to them by a detective and which has received the approval of the owner of the property.
2. Evidence of statements of a witness for the state made to third persons in the absence of defendants is not admissible to corroborate his evidence against defendant's mere denial of its truthfulness.

NOTE.—Instigation or consent to crime for the purpose of detecting criminal as a defense to prosecution.

The law governing this question is well illustrated by the above case and the succeeding one of COMMONWEALTH v. HOLLISTER, post, 342.

While the true line of distinction is not as clearly marked as it might be, and there are cases in which it seems to have been lost sight of entirely so that the decision is apparently on the wrong side, the following propositions are fairly well sustained by the decided cases:

1. If the criminal design originates with the accused and the intended victim does not actively urge him on to the commission of the crime, the mere fact that he facilitates the execution of the scheme, and that his agents appear to co-operate in its execution will be no defense to the accused. People v. Hanselman, 76 Cal. 480; Reg. v. Bannen, 1 Car. & K. 226, 2 Moody, C. C. 309; King v. Whittingham, 3 Leach, C. C. 912; King v. Eggrington, 2 Bos. & P. 603, 2 East, P. C. 494, 603, 2 Leach, C. C. 913; Com. v. Nott, 135 Mass. 299, and many of the other cases which will be found stated in the various subdivisions infra; State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 493.

Michigan seems to make an exception to this rule in so far as the consent or apparent connivance is on the part of police officers. Saunders v. People, 33 Mich. 213; People v. Murphy, 33 Mich. 41. And a case which apparently overlooks all rights of the accused is Reg. v. Lyons, Car. & M. 217.

2. If the design is originated by the one who apparently becomes the victim or by his agent, and is suggested to the accused and merely adopted by him, he cannot be convicted. Pigg v. State, 43 Tex. 103; O'Brien v. State, 6 Tex. App. 605; Johnson

ERROR to the District Court for Arapahoe County to review a judgment convicting defendants of conspiracy to commit larceny. Reversed.

Statement by Goddard, J.:

On the 8th day of June, 1889, James Connor, Charles Connor, and James Marshall were indicted in the district court of Arapahoe county for a conspiracy to rob the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company. The indictment contained five counts, charging the offense in various forms. On the 5th day of October, 1889, the cause came on for trial, and upon the 28th day of October, 1889, a verdict of guilty against the defendants was returned upon all the counts of the indictment. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were filed and overruled, and they were sentenced, under the verdict upon the first count of the indictment, to imprisonment in the county jail, and to pay a fine and costs. They bring the case here for review, and present numerous assignments of error as grounds for reversal of such conviction and sentence.

As part of this rule it may be stated further that to convict the accused he must himself have done all that was necessary to constitute the offense. He cannot be made answerable for acts of the agent of the victim. Spelden v. State, 3 Tex. App. 156, 30 Am. Rep. 126; State v. Douglass, 44 Kan. 618; State v. Hayes, 105 Mo. 76; State v. Jansen, 23 Kan. 466; People v. Collins, 53 Cal. 185; Williams v. State, 55 Ga. 361.

So when the commission of the offense is procured by the prosecutor for some purposes of his own there would seem to be no ground for holding the accused guilty, and such is the rule where the offense can in a sense be regarded as committed against the prosecutor and absence of his consent is a necessary element of the crime. King v. McDaniel, Fost. C. L. 121, 2 East. P. C. 665; People v. McCord, supra; People v. Clough, 59 Cal. 438.

But there is a class of cases in which the commission of the offense is solicited for the express purpose of furnishing cause for prosecution in which the fact of solicitation is held to be no defense. These cases seem to embrace offenses which may be regarded as more against the public generally than against the prosecutor. Such a distinction does not, however, furnish a sufficient basis for the application of a different rule. The true reason for the difference would seem to be that the offense following the solicitation is merely one of a kind habitually committed and the solicitation merely furnished evidence of the course of conduct. It cannot, therefore, be said to be the cause of it as it was in the case of King v. McDaniel, supra. In fact in some of the cases of this class there was nothing more than a facilitating of the commission of the offense, bringing the case within the rule 1, supra. Of this class are illegal sales of liquor, taking or answering decoy letters, etc. See cases infra. A careful discrimination between the necessary elements of the different crimes will usually account for the application of different rules in the different cases.

Burglary.

The fact that the owner upon being advised of the intended burglary makes no effort to prevent it, but provides a force to secure the arrest of the burglars, will not change their liability to punishment. Thompson v. State, 18 Ind. 386, 61 Am. Dec. 364.

Where one to whom persons who had planned a burglary of a store communicated their plan, informed the police and was advised to continue in the plot and keep the police informed, and they with the consent of the owner of the property secreted themselves in the store on the night when the burglary was to take place and captured them, it was held that there was no conspiracy to entrap defendants into committing the crime and no inducements were offered to them to commit it, nor were they encouraged to do it; and that the mere consent of the owner of the property to have the officers occupy the store in order to arrest defendants did not constitute a consent to the crime. People v. Morton, 4 Utah. 457.

If the lock was broken by accused and an entry effected by him he cannot escape conviction because part of the fastenings were not in place at the time and the owner of the property and officers were waiting within to arrest the criminal in reliance upon information furnished them by a detective. State v. Stickney (Kan.) May 5, 1894.

But if the entry is made by means of a key furnished by the master to his servant for the purpose of furthering the scheme to entrap the burglar, there can be no burglary. Allen v. State, 40 Ala. 384, 91 Am. Dec. 477.

So where a servant after being approached to aid in robbing his master's house pretended to consent and then informed the police who told him to proceed and he went out and found the defendants and took them to the house letting them in through the door, it was held that they could not be found guilty of burglary, but one was convicted of stealing from a dwelling house, and the other for being an accomplice before the fact. Reg. v. Johnson, Car. & M. 218.

Where the proprietor of a store and three other persons by appointment with a fifth who was acting as a private detective for the purpose of apprehending a criminal, stationed themselves in the store and left a window unfastened through which the defendants and the detective entered when defendant was arrested, the court said if the crime was instigated by the detective with the acquiescence of the proprietor of the store he would not be guilty of burglary, and if defendant was merely aiding and abetting him he could not be guilty, and the prisoner was discharged on the ground that the evidence which had been offered did not justify the submission of the case to the jury. People v. McCord, 76 Mich. 200.

Where the one who had informed the sheriff was the only one who entered the building, it was held that no burglary had been committed for the aiding of which the one sought to be entrapped could be convicted. People v. Collins, 53 Cal. 185.

If the one to whom a burglary is suggested and who becomes informer and acts with the police to capture the other party is the only one who enters the building and does so with no felonious intent his companion cannot be convicted of burglary, although if he attempts to carry away property which is taken from the building he may be guilty of larceny. State v. Hayes, 105 Mo. 76.

In Sanders v. State, a Tennessee case decided in 1879 and stated in 25 Alb. L. J. 185, the court held that if the breaking of the house and removal of the property was the act of the owner's servant with the owner's consent and accused only aided Goddard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We omit the discussion of many of the errors assigned, not because we regard them as without merit, but because those considered are more important, and are decisive of the case. The vital and important question presented by the record is whether, under the evidence, any crime is shown to have been committed. The crime charged is a conspiracy entered into by the defendants below (plaintiffs in error here), to rob the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company. The statute defines a conspiracy as follows: "If any two or more persons . . . shall agree, conspire, or co-operate to do, or aid in doing, any other unlawful act," etc. To constitute the crime there must be not only an agreement to co-operate to do a certain act, but that act must be unlawful. The unlawful act to be done in pursuance of the conspiracy as charged in the indictment was the commission of larceny in taking the property of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company. The evidence introduced on the trial to sustain the fact of confederation between the plaintiffs in error was the testimony of the witness Holliday, alias Ward, which in effect is that he was in the employ of Thiel's Detective Agency, of St. Louis, Mo., and was sent to Kansas City on a special mission to find out if one James Marshall and abetted the servant they would not be guilty; but if the plan or plot was only to detect the crime and not to bring it about, the accused would be guilty if in fact they feloniously broke and entered or without the owner's consent and with a felonious intent they removed any part of the stolen property.

In Rex v. Bigley, 1 Crawf. & D. C. C. 202, the persons in waiting went to the extent of opening the door in response to the burglar's knock, and a conviction was upheld. In that case since the intention was to secure admission by fraud which would not deprive the offense of the burglarious character it may be that the owners pretending to be defrauded would not defeat a conviction, but the case is very close to the line.

Where detectives who were working up a case against defendant went into a bank and then went out and told defendant that they wanted more help and solicited him to go in to help them and then he followed them in, it was held that he was not a burglar. Speiden v. State, 3 Tex. App. 156, 30 Am. Rep. 128.

Robbery.

It is no defense to a prosecution for robbery that one having heard of the practice of a highwayman to rob a certain stage accompanied it in a post-chaise for the purpose of apprehending him, and when he came up and presented a weapon and demanded money gave him some, and then with a weapon which he carried for that purpose and with the assistance of the passengers of the stage captured the robber. Norden's Case, Fost. C. L. 128.

But where several persons arranged among themselves that others should be procured to rob one of them who should be stationed at a designated place in the highway for that purpose, with a view to obtaining the reward offered for the apprehension of robbers, the court held that no robbery could be held to have been committed. King v. McDaniel, Fost. C. L. 121, 2 East. P. C. 665.

No robbery can be held to have been committed if the victim and a third person had arranged that the former should meet the latter and defendant at a certain place and go through the form of being robbed for some purpose of their own. People v. Clough, 59 Cal. 438.

In Rex v. Fuller, Russ. & R. C. C. 408, it seems to have been held that giving a man money for the purpose of apprehending him will prevent the offense from being robbery.

Larceny.

The taking of property from a building is not changed from the offense of larceny in a building by the fact that a police officer has been stationed there to watch and see the thief when he took the property. Com. v. Nott, 135 Mass. 289.

Where, for the purpose of determining who had been committing some crimes, a police officer feigned drunkenness and pretended to fall in an alley in a drunken stupor, and while so lying in a perfectly conscious condition defendant came up to him and took some money out of his pocket, he making no resistance, it was held that there was no such consent as to prevent the taking being larceny. People v. Hanselman, 76 Cal. 460. In that case the court says: "We do not think there is such consent, where there is mere passive submission on the part of the owner of the goods taken and no indication that he wishes them taken, and no active measures of inducement employed for the purpose of leading into temptation."

Merely furnishing opportunities to commit larceny for the purpose of entrapping the one who proves guilty will not prevent his conviction. Varner v. State, 72 Ga. 745.

The mere presence and pretended assistance of a detective will not relieve one from the result of his acts, if he himself does all that is necessary to constitute the crime, although he may not be chargeable with what is done by the detective. State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 498.

Where one has been notified of a design to steal his goods, which he neither ratified nor suggested, he may in order to detect the thief direct an agent to encourage the design and afford facilities for the completion of the crime; and such facilities will not affect the criminality of the thief. State v. Duncan, 5 Rob. (La.) 562.

If one pretending by way of artifice to be an accomplice but believed by the accused to be a real accomplice performs, at the instance of the owner of the goods, acts amounting to the physical constituents of larceny, the pretended accomplice represents the owner and not the accused, although the accused may have concurred in the acts and thought he prompted them, and therefore for them the accused cannot be held guilty. Williams v. State, 55 Ga. 301. In that case the court says: "Should not the owner and his agent after making everything ready and easy wait passively and let the would-be criminal perpetrate the offense for himself in each and every essential part of it? To stimulate unlawful intentions with the motive of bringing them to punishable maturity is a dangerous practice."

Where a slave was sent with some money to a certain place where the owner of the money and others were lying in wait, and the slave was approached by a third person, who was seized by the owner and the money found lying on the ground, without any evidence to show that such person intended to take it, the court held that even if it had been found in his possession it would not be larceny because the owner had consented to its passing into his possession. Dodd v. Hamilton, Taylor's N. C. Term Rep. 31.

If the property is delivered by a servant to the defendant by the master's directions the offense corresponded with the police department of Denver, and also to find out if he knew anything about the First National Bank robbery. That he met Marshall, and learned from him that the chiefs and heads of the police department in Denver were his friends, and would co-operate with him, or any one he should introduce, in any unlawful scheme, and, upon obtaining promise of a letter of introduction to them from Marshall, he (Holiday), returned to St. Louis to report to his superiors what he had done. That his superiors suggested that he devise a scheme to rob an express company, planning such robbery like one that had taken place in Missouri. On the 9th day of April he returned to Kansas City, and, on meeting Marshall again, he told him that he had a friend in New York who knew a messenger who ran out of Denver, and from whom he could get a letter to such agent; that he had written for the letter, and it would be in Denver in a few days. That Marshall expressed a hope that it was on the Denver & Rio Grande. That he obtained the letter of introduction to James Connor, and agreed with Marshall to let him know where he was stopping in Denver, and to wire him before the robbery, so he could come on and take part. On his arrival in Denver, and on the 12th of April, he presented his letter of introduction to James Connor, and stated to him the same cannot be larceny. Reg. v. Lawrence, 4 Cox, C. C. 488.

If the owner of goods consents that his slave shall deliver them to a third person, such person cannot be guilty of larceny. Dodge v. Brittain, Meigs, 84.

If the design is originated by the owner there can be no theft, but if it is originated by the accused and the owner merely affords an opportunity and provides for a discovery of the thief, the guilt will be complete. Pigg v. State, 45 Tex. 108.

A servant who appropriates to his own use money which his master has marked and given to a third person to purchase goods at the master's shop is guilty of a breach of trust within the statute, 39 Geo. III., chap. 85; King v. Whittingham, 2 Leach, C. C. 912; King v. Hodge, Id. 1083. But he is not guilty of larceny, because the money cannot be said to have been taken from the possession of the master. King v. Bull, 2 Leach, C. C. 841.

In Saunders v. People, 38 Mich. 218, in which in obedience to a request made to an officer to leave the court-room unlocked in order that certain papers might be taken from it, the police made a plan to capture the would-be thieves, the court makes some very forcible remarks about what it calls the reprehensible character of the acts of officers who upon being notified of a purpose to commit crime, instead of taking steps to prevent it, assist and encourage it for the purpose of arresting the offender.

In Reg. v. Williams, 1 Car. & K. 195, defendant having made propositions to a bar-tender to rob the master's till, the matter was communicated to the master who directed the servant to send for defendant and carry out the design. The defendant came to the shop and according to agreement pretended to purchase drinks and was given an excess of change by the bar-tender, a part of which was marked coin. He was immediately afterwards arrested and the marked money being found on him he was convicted of stealing.

If the owner of property on being informed by his servant that he has been solicited to take part in a robbery of the master's house, tells the servant to carry on the business and consents to his opening a door leading to the premises, and also marks property and lays it in a place where the robbers are expected to come with a view to apprehending them, his consent will not be a defense to an indictment against the robbers. King v. Eglington, 2 Bos. & P. 508, 2 Leach, C. C. 913, 2 East, P. C. 494, 666. In that case, however, the offense was held not to be burglary, because it was not committed in a place capable of being burglarized, and the discussion of the effect of the owner's acts did not therefore extend to the question of whether his acts prevented the offense from being burglary, but whether they prevented it from being felony at all, and although one of the justices doubted whether it could be said to be done  invito domini, the others thought that the owner's consent did not take away the criminal character of the offense and the prisoners received the punishment to which they would have been liable for larceny. The court said: "The design originated with the prisoners and all that the owner did was to prevent the design from being carried into undetected execution. Which differed the case greatly from what it might have been if he had employed his servant to suggest the perpetration of the offense originally to the prisoners."

It is no defense to an indictment for soliciting a servant to rob his master, that the servant sought out the defendant with the express purpose of receiving a solicitation that the defendant might be convicted. Reg. v. Quail, 4 Post. & F. 1076.

Stealing slave.

There seems to have been some difference of opinion upon this branch of the question. In Tennessee it was held that one cannot be guilty of stealing a slave who is the whole time under the control of his master carrying out a plan to entrap the supposed thief. Kemp v. State, 11 Humph. 320.

But in South Carolina it was held that the fact that the owner of a slave consented to the slave's apparently consenting to go with one who was trying to steal him, for the purpose of apprehending the thief, is not sufficient consent to deprive the act of its criminal character. State v. Covington, 3 Bell, L. 509.

Likewise in Texas it was held that the mere fact that the owner of a slave who learns of an intent to steal him directs the slave to appear to go with the thief for the purpose of procuring his arrest, will not prevent the thief's conviction if he actually appears to take possession of the slave and carry out his purpose. Alexander v. State, 12 Tex. 540.

In State v. Jernagan, Taylor's N. C. Term Rep. 44, which was an indictment for stealing a slave, it was said that there could be no stealing of the slave if the owner through his agent consented, for the purpose of apprehending the thief. But that if the accused brought a stolen slave to a particular place after the assent of the owner had been given, but in pursuance of a plan matured and partly executed before that time, they might be convicted.

Trading with slave.

A prosecution for illegally trading with a slave will not be prevented by the fact that the owner of the slave gave him the goods and then went along to see the transaction, that he might procure evidence against the guilty party. State v. Anone, 3 Nott & McC. 27.

That the master gives the slave property for the purpose of being carried to the defendant for sale or barter, will not prevent his conviction of trading with a slave. State v. Sonnerkalb, 3 Nott & McC. 220; State v. Stroud, Id. 24.

in reference to a letter to an agent. That he (Connor), expressed the hope that it was over the Denver & Rio Grande. That on the 18th of April he met Farley, who was then resident manager of Thiel's Detective Agency in Denver. "Told Farley I had a talk with Connor. . . . Up to this time I had done what I did from instructions from the St. Louis office. After this I was under instructions from Farley. Question. When did you first discuss the plan of the robbery, and with whom did you first talk about the plan of operations to rob this road? Answer. I think it was with Mr. Farley at 31 and Curtis. We discussed the D. & R. G. road, when I told him what I had learned from the defendants." That a letter was prepared in Mr. Farley's office, with the consent of the officers of the company, purporting to be written by one William S. Buell, of New York, to Icon, an express agent in the employ of the Denver & Rio Grande Express Company, introducing to him Mr. Holliday as Joe Ward. That plans were devised between Holliday and Connor to carry out the robbery. Mr. Farley testifies that on the night of the 18th of April, after meeting Holliday, he saw Mr. Gillooly, treasurer of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company, and told him what Holliday had said; and, it appears from the evidence, from that time on, the company, through its officers, not only con-

Offering bribe.

The offer of a bribe upon the suggestion of an officer that he will accept it is not punishable. O'Brien v. State, 6 Tex. App. 665.

Counterfeiting.

In Reg. v. Bannen, 1 Car. & K. 295, 2 Moody, C. C. 300, after an order had been given for the construction of dies from which shillings could be struck, the one receiving it communicated the fact to the officers of the mint, and they told him to proceed and fill the order which was done, and then the one giving the order was convicted of felony.

Receiving stolen goods.

There is an English case upon this subject which perhaps meted out justice, but looking at the facts of the case it is difficult to see upon what ground the conviction was had.

A boy stole brass from his master and having been detected it was taken from him, but restored to him for the purpose of permitting him to sell it to one to whom he had previously sold such things, in order to prosecute the latter. After he had purchased the property, he was arrested, convicted, and sentenced for feloniously receiving property which he knew to have been stolen. Reg. v. Lyons, Car. & M. 217.

In Reg. v. Dolan, 6 Cox, C. C. 449, however, it was held that if stolen goods are restored to the possession of the owner and he returns them to the possession of the thief for the purpose of enabling him to sell them to a third person, such person although he buys the goods cannot be convicted of receiving stolen property. By that case Reg. v. Lyons, supra, was overruled.

So where a boy was searched by a policeman at the instance of his master and a cigar, the property of the master, found on him, and then five other cigars were given him and he was directed to give them to accused which he did, and then accused was arrested for receiving stolen property, the court held that he could not be convicted on the charge. Reg. v. Hancock, 14 Cox, C. C. 119, 28 Moak, Eng. Rep. 554.

False pretenses.

It is no defense to an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses that the one from whom it was obtained had laid a plan to entrap the defendant into the offense. Rex v. Ady, 7 Car. & P. 140. In that case a clergyman having received a letter purporting to come from James Laurie, which promised valuable information for certain compensation, took the letter to defendant who falsely represented himself to be a partner of Laurie and to be entitled to receive the money. The money was given to him and the information received which proved valueless, and defendant was then prosecuted for obtaining the money by false pretenses. The trap seems to have been in showing the letter to defendant in order to give him an opportunity to claim the compensation, but whether this is so or not is not clearly brought out in the report of the case. The report upon this point is in fact very unsatisfactory.

Putting away forged instruments.

An indictment for disposing of and putting away forged bank notes cannot be defeated by showing that the notes were purchased by persons who knew them at the time to be forged and procured them at their own solicitation as agents for the bank for the very purpose of bringing the offenders to justice. Rex v. Holden, 2 Leach, C. C. 1019, 2 Taunt. 384, Russ. & R. C. C. 154.

Obstructing railway track.

Where an employé of a railway company, for the purpose of entrapping a third person into the commission of a crime which would send him to the penitentiary, invited him to go up the track with him, in the meantime informing another employé of the design and then after procuring liquor the two went along the track and were followed by the other employé and an officer who found a railway tie on the track and arrested the defendant, it was held if the tie was placed on the track by the employé the fact that the defendant consented to it would not constitute an offense for which defendant could be convicted. State v. Douglass, 44 Kan. 618.

Conspiracy.

A conspiracy to commit burglary is committed when the agreement is made, and the conspirators may then be convicted unless it is shown that the owner of the property or the detective created the original intent or agreement to commit the offense. Johnson v. State, 8 Tex. App. 593.

There can be no conspiracy between one contemplating a crime and one who has undertaken to entrap him and enters into the plan for that purpose. Woodworth v. State, 20 Tex. App. 375.

Selling obscene prints and lottery tickets.

It is no defense to an indictment for selling obscene prints that the buyer requested to have them shown him and purchased some for the purpose of prosecuting the seller. Reg. v. Carlile, 1 Cox, C. C. 229.

In People v. Noelke, 94 N. Y. 187, 46 Am. Rep. 125, a person bought a lottery ticket for the purpose of securing the conviction of the seller of a violation of the statute against selling them. The defendant did not rely upon the fact that the offense had not been committed because of the facts, but did rely upon the contention that the purchaser was an accomplice, upon whose uncorroborated testimony a conviction could not be had. But the court overruled this contention.

sented that their property might be taken, but co-operated with the witness Holliday, through Farley, in perfecting plans by which such taking might be accomplished. Mr. Gillooly testifies that "Holliday was in the employ of Thiel's Agency. Thiel was in our employ. Whatever Mr. Holliday did was being done with the full knowledge and consent of the company. This scheme was being worked for nearly a month."

To constitute the crime of larceny at common law there must be a trespass,—that is, a taking of property without the consent of the owner,—coupled with an intent to steal the property so taken. It is therefore evident that the crime is not committed when, with the consent of the owner, his property is taken, however guilty may be the taker's purpose and intent. This is the accepted doctrine, as laid down by the various text-writers on criminal law. Mr. Bishop, discussing this principle in the fifth edition of his work on Criminal Law (sec. 262), says: "The cases of greatest difficulty are those in which one, suspecting crime in another, lays a plan to entrap him. Consequently even if there is a consent, it is not within the knowledge of him who does the act. Here we see, from principles already discussed, that supposing the consent really to exist, and the case to be one in which, on general doctrines, the consent will take away the criminal quality of the act, there is no legal crime committed, though the doer of the act did not know of the existence of the circumstance which prevented the criminal quality from attaching." 2 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 1181; 2 Russell, Crimes, 190; 3 Chitty, Crim. L. 925; 1 Whart. Crim. L. § 914. To the same effect is the uniform current of the decisions. In the case of Reg. v. Johnson, Car. & M. 218, it was held that, where a servant pretended to concur with two persons who proposed to rob his master's house, and acting under the advice of the police he opened the door for them to enter, there could be no conviction of burglary. Of the same purport is the case of Allen v. State, 40 Ala. 384, 91 Am. Dec. 476, wherein it is said: "Where the proof showed that the prisoner proposed to a servant a plan for robbing his employer's office by night; that the servant disclosed the plan to his employer, by whom it was communicated to the police; that the master, acting under the instructions of the police, furnished the servant with the keys of his office on the appointed night; that the servant and the prisoner went together to the office, where the servant opened the door with the key, and they both entered through the

Selling liquor.

It is somewhat surprising that so few cases have arisen in which prosecutions for illegal liquor selling have been defended on the ground that the liquor was procured for the purpose of supporting a prosecution.

In a New York case it was held that the fact that the board of excise hired persons to purchase liquor for the purpose of determining violations of the law will not prevent the prosecution of the seller if he violates the law by selling to them. Onondaga County Comrs. v. Backus, 20 How. Pr. 83. In that case the board of commissioners were prosecutors, and the defense was that they could not recover because they were particeps criminis. The court says this is not a good defense, and while the question of the solicitation to commit the crime was not distinctly raised as a defense, the court says of that question: "Even if inducements to commit crime could be assumed to exist in this case, the allegation of the defendant would be but the repetition of the plea as ancient as the world, and first interposed in Paradise: 'The serpent beguiled me and I did eat.' That defense was overruled by the great Lawgiver, and whatever estimate we may form, or whatever judgment pass upon the character or conduct of the tempter, this plea has never since availed to shield crime or give indemnity to the culprit, and it is safe to say that under any code of civilized, not to say Christian, ethics, it never will."

A city is not estopped from prosecuting a liquor bond by the fact that the evidence of the violation of it was procured by a police officer who was sent by the chief of police to ascertain if the defendant was selling unlawfully and to purchase some liquor if he was so doing, which instructions were obeyed. Tripp v. Flanagan, 10 R. I. 123.

The fact that the liquor was purchased by one who was hired to procure it for the purpose of a prosecution will not prevent a conviction if no public officers were concerned in sending to the defendant for the liquor. People v. Murphy, 98 Mich. 41.

Wharton in a note in 10 Fed. Rep. 92, cites two cases on the subject which seem to take opposite sides of the question. In Rex v. Titley, London Law Times, July 30, 1881, a conviction was sustained where the sale was induced by the adroitness of the detective, while in Blakie v. Linton, 18 Scott, L. R. 538, a similar conviction was set aside, on the ground that the offense was the production of the solicitation.

Offenses against the mails.

Decoy letters have been so largely used to detect the commission of offenses against the mails that cases have become numerous in which the question of their effect has been considered.

The use of decoy letters by government inspectors is justifiable for the purpose of ascertaining depredators upon the mails. United States v. Dorsey, 40 Fed. Rep. 752.

The fact that a letter which is stolen from the mail was a decoy letter is no defense. United States v. Cottingham, 2 Blatchf. 470.

A mail carrier cannot escape prosecution under the United States statute prohibiting the stealing of letters committed to the post, by the fact that the letter for the taking of which he was indicted was placed in the mail by the post-office authorities as a decoy to determine who was responsible for the disappearance of letters while passing over that route. United States v. Foye, 1 Curt. C. C. 364.

The fact that circulars concerning lotteries are sent in response to decoy letters will be no defense to the one sending them. United States v. Moore, 19 Fed. Rep. 39.

The fact that letters containing information as to where lewd pictures can be obtained were sent in response to inquiries by government detectives does not relieve the act of its criminal character if the inquiries did not solicit defendant to send the information through the mails. United States v. Grimm, 50 Fed. Rep. 523.

But a conviction for sending unmailable letters through the mails cannot be had when they are sent in answer to a decoy letter written by a government detective which invited correspondence and enclosed stamps for a reply. United States v. Adams, 59 Fed. Rep. 674.

door, and were arrested in the house by the police,—held, that there could be no conviction of burglary." In the case of Speiden v. State, 3 Tex. App. 156, 30 Am. Rep. 126, the defendant was indicted for burglary by breaking into a bank with intent to commit theft. The court says: "In the case at bar the detectives cannot be considered in any other light than as the servants and agents of the bankers, Adams & Leonard. They (the detectives) had the legal occupancy and control of the bank. Two of them made arrangements with defendant to enter it, and defendant, when arrested, had entered the bank at the solicitation of those detectives, who were rightfully in possession, with the consent of the owners. This cannot be burglary in contemplation of law, however much the defendant was guilty in purpose and intent." In Dodge v. Brittain, Meigs, 88, it is said: "Receiving goods, with the owner's consent, from his servant, is not larceny, it being of the essence of the offense that the goods be taken against the will of the owner, ex vi domini." Of the same purport are Kemp v. State, 11 Humph. 320; State v. Chambers, 6 Ala. 855; Zink v. People, 77 N. Y. 114, 38 Am. Rep. 589; United States v.

Whittier, 5 Dill. 35; State v. Covington, 2 Bail. L. 569; and numerous other cases that might be cited.

Counsel for the people concede the soundness of the doctrine as above announced, but seek to escape its application upon the ground that the plaintiffs in error were not prosecuted for stealing from the railway company, and therefore the attitude of the company made no difference. In other words, it is contended that the conspiracy to do an act constitutes a crime, although the act to accomplish which the conspiracy is formed would not be unlawful if committed. To state the proposition is to refute it. We think the law applicable to this case is clearly and correctly stated in the case of Johnson v. State, 3 Tex. App. 598. The court says: "The fact of such conspiracy once being established, the subsequent consent of the owner (or those acting for him) for the conspirators to enter the building will not affect their guilt in the least, unless the evidence shows that Higgins and Garwood, or the detective employed by them, suggested the offense, or in some way created the original intent or agreement to commit the offense as charged." In the case of Saunders v. People, 88 Mich.

There has been some dispute as to how far a letter directed to a fictitious address was within the protection of the statutes.

In United States v. Denicke, 35 Fed. Rep. 407, it was held that a letter addressed to a fictitious address was not within the provisions of the United States statutes.

But the weight of authority upon that question is the other way.

In Bates v. United States, 11 Biss. 70, it was held that the mere fact that the letters to a person who had assumed a fictitious name were addressed to such name was no defense, but the effect of the decoy letters which were used to induce them to do so is not stated.

The case is within the provisions of the statutes although the letter was a decoy and was addressed to a person having no existence. United States v. Bethea, 44 Fed. Rep. 803.

In Reg. v. Gardner, 1 Car. & K. 623, to test the honesty of a post-mistress an officer of the post-office placed marked money in an envelope and directed it to a fictitious address, the post-mistress took the money and was indicted for larceny and for stealing a post letter contrary to the statute, and it was held that the count for stealing a post letter would not lie, but that she was guilty of larceny. That case, however, seems not to be in accord with that of Reg. v. Newey, stated in a footnote to page 623, in which money was put into a folded paper and directed to a fictitious address and not postmarked. It was stolen by the defendant and he was given a punishment greater than the indictment for larceny would have warranted. And in Reg. v. Young, 2 Car. & K. 466, 1 Den. C. C. 194; Reg. v. Gardner, supra, was overruled, and it was held that a letter would not be prevented from being a post letter because it contained a fictitious address.

The latter case further held that a letter regularly dropped in a box with postage paid is a post letter within the protection of the English statutes.

There has also been considerable uncertainty as to when a letter was a post letter within the meaning of the statutes.

Where, while an employé who was engaged in sorting letters had turned away for a moment, a decoy letter was placed in the package and he subsequently took it, it was held that he could not be convicted of stealing a post letter, but that he could be convicted of larceny of the money contained in it. Reg. v. Rathbone, Car. & M. 220, 2 Moody, C. C. 310.

Where the letter was passed into the post-office by inspectors in an irregular way for the purpose of testing the honesty of an employé and secretly put in his way, it was held not within the protection of the English statutes. Reg. v. Shepherd, 2 Jur. N. S. 96, 25 L. J. M. C. 63, Dears. C. C. 606.

A decoy package which is not intended to be mailed, but to be put into a receptacle for unmailed matter which it was the duty of employés to examine and forward to the dead-letter office if it contained anything of value, is not within the provisions of United States statutes relating to the punishing of offenses against the mails. United States v. Rapp, 30 Fed. Rep. 818.

The letter is not intended to be conveyed by mail within the meaning of the statute, when the postal authorities acting in co-operation with the sender intended after the letter was put into the mail to resume possession of it themselves or to permit the sender to do so before it reached the hands of any carrier or messenger, or other postal employé for delivery to the proper person. United States v. Matthews, 1 L. R. A. 104, 35 Fed. Rep. 800.

But if there is no intention to intercept a letter before it is delivered to the one to whom it is addressed, it is immaterial that it was not posted at the office where it is postmarked, but was delivered by the inspector at the delivery office and placed by the postmaster with other mail to be sorted. Walster v. United States, 42 Fed. Rep. 891.

In United States v. Whittier, 5 Dill. 35, 18 Alb. L. J. 110, it was held that the provision of the United States statute which prohibits the use of the mail for sending obscene literature was not violated by sending addressed to a fictitious person in reply to a decoy letter, information as to where could be obtained the means of preventing conception, but which on its face gave no information as to what such means were. The decision is, however, expressly put upon the ground that the particular act charged in the indictment did not come within the language of the statute.

H. F. F.

218, the defendant was convicted of breaking and entering by night a court-room, and feloniously taking therefrom certain bonds. The defendant Saunders was a lawyer, and it was shown in evidence that he asked Webb, a policeman, to leave the door of the court-room unlocked in order that he might get the bonds, and that Webb, after consulting with his superior officer, consented, and then lay in wait, and caught one Moylan removing the papers. The supreme court of Michigan, composed of Judges Campbell, Cooley, Marston, and Graves, reversed the conviction, and severely denounced the conduct of the officers in conniving with persons suspected of criminal designs, for the purpose of arresting them in the commission of the offense. Judge Marston, concurring in a separate opinion (pages 221, 222), says: "The course pursued by the officers in this case was utterly indefensible. Where a person contemplating the commission of an offense approaches an officer of the law, and asks his assistance, it would seem to be the duty of the latter, according to the plainest principles of duty and justice, to decline to render such assistance, and to take such steps as would be likely to prevent the commission of the offense, and tend to the elevation and improvement of the would-be criminal, rather than to his further debasement. Some courts have gone a great way in giving encouragement to detectives in some very questionable methods adopted by them to discover the guilt of criminals, but they have not yet gone so far, and I trust never will, as to lend aid or encouragement to officers who may, under a mistaken sense of duty, encourage and assist parties to commit crime, in order that they may arrest and have them punished for so doing. The mere fact that the person contemplating the commission of a crime is supposed to be an old offender can be no excuse, much less a justification, for the course adopted and pursued in this case." Campbell, Ch. J., also concurring (at page 228), said: "Assuming that there is not in the record full evidence of such an invitation to enter the clerk's office as would conclusively show there was no breaking, the encouragement of criminals to induce them to commit crimes, in order to get up a prosecution against them, is scandalous and reprehensible." We feel warranted in quoting thus fully from these opinions because the views therein expressed are specially pertinent to the facts in this case, and because of the universally recognized learning and ability of the eminent jurists who announced them. In the case under consideration, the only evidence of the inception of the scheme to rob the express company is that of Holliday, who states that it was instigated by his superiors at St. Louis, and by him suggested to the plaintiffs in error. It further appears that before the consummation of the conspiracy the officers of the express company were informed of and consented to the scheme; hence, under the foregoing authorities, the prosecution cannot be sustained. We do not wish to be understood as intimating that the services of a detective cannot be legitimately employed in the discovery of the perpetrators of a crime that has been, or is being, committed, but we do say that when, in their zeal, or under a mistaken sense of duty, detectives suggest the commission of a crime, and instigate others to take part in its commission in order to arrest them while in the act, although the purpose may be to capture old offenders, their conduct is not only reprehensible, but criminal, and ought to be rebuked, rather than encouraged, by the courts. And, accepting the version of the witness Holliday as true, it shows a state of facts that can have no place in the decent administration of justice.

The witnesses Farley and Newcome were permitted, over objection, to testify to statements made to them by the witness Holliday, not made in the presence of plaintiffs in error, or either of them. This was hearsay evidence, and clearly inadmissible. Counsel for the people attempt to justify the admission of this testimony upon the ground that the testimony of Holliday was attacked on cross-examination, and his credibility questioned, and therefore the people had a right to corroborate him in this manner; asserting that such procedure was in conformity to well-established authorities. No authority is cited, and upon a full and careful research we feel safe in asserting that no authority can be found that will sanction the admission of this evidence. In the language of Buller, J. (King v. Parker, 3 Dougl. 244), "It is now settled that what a witness said, not upon oath, would not be admissible to confirm what he said upon oath." Greenleaf, in his work on Evidence (volume 1, § 409), says: "But evidence that he has, on other occasions, made statements similar to what he has testified in the cause, is not admissible." In Robb v. Hackley, 23 Wend. 50, Bronson, J., in a very exhaustive opinion on this subject, says: "But as a general, and almost universal, rule, evidence of what the witness has said out of court cannot be received to fortify his testimony. It violates a first principle in the law of evidence to allow a party to be affected, either in his person or his property, by the declarations of a witness made without oath. And, besides, it can be no confirmation of what the witness has said on oath, to show that he has made similar declarations when under no such solemn obligation to speak the truth. It is no answer to say that such evidence will not be likely to gain credit, and consequently will do no harm. Evidence should never be given to a jury which they are not at liberty to believe." The only exception to this rule, as stated by Greenleaf in the section above cited, is "where a design to misrepresent is charged upon the witness in consequence of his relation to the party or the cause, in which case it seems it may be proper to show that he made a similar statement before that relation existed." At the time of the admission of the testimony the plaintiffs in error had made no attempt to impeach the witness Holliday, nor did they at any time do more than to deny his statements, when on the stand as witnesses in their own behalf. The witnesses Farley and Newcome testified that they had no personal knowledge of the facts stated by

Holliday, and were simply repeating the story told by him. The harmfulness of this can be readily seen. The witness Farley was at the time holding an important official position. He was a respectable citizen, and possessed the confidence of the community, and the repetition by him of Holliday's story might give it a weight and credibility greater than would have attached to it when told alone by Holliday. However this may be, the admission of this testimony was so violative of every rule of evidence that in itself it would compel a reversal of the case, and it becomes unnecessary to notice the further objections so fully argued by counsel.

For the reasons given, the judgment will be reversed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania

Herschel H. HOLLISTER, Appt.

(187 Pa. 13.)

1. Active participation in planning a felonious taking of money followed by an actual taking by a part of the confederates in pursuance of the plan will warrant a conviction of larceny, although accused was not present when the crime was actually committed.
2. A conviction of larceny will not be prevented by the fact that one of the supposed confederates in the plan had informed the police and the intended victim and was acting with them for the purpose of detecting and punishing the guilty parties, if the latter had no knowledge of it and performed all the acts necessary to consummate the crime.
3. The testimony of one who pretended to act with others in the commission of a crime for the purpose of detecting and punishing them is alone sufficient to sustain a conviction.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Oyer and Terminer for Lackawanna County convicting him of the crime of larceny. Affirmed.

Defendant and three other persons were put on trial under an indictment charging them with larceny. Two of the defendants pleaded guilty, and defendant and his brother pleaded not guilty. The brother was acquitted and defendant convicted. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the charge given to the jury by the court below, which, after stating the general law on the subject of presumption of innocence continued with a statement of the evidence as follows:

"At high noon, on October 17, last, an attempt was made upon the pay office of Spencer Brothers, at Dunmore, in this county. The purpose was to secure the money which was then there ready to be paid out to the men that afternoon. The plan, as arranged and carried out, was a daring one. The office, according to the evidence, is somewhat removed from the rest of the works, and from other points in the borough. Charles Engle, a former employé of the firm, that day first approached the office to see that the way was clear, and that there was only the one man in charge of the office, as was expected. It was found that there was but the one man there, — Mr. Brady. Brown and Snow followed Engle for the purpose of actually committing the robbery, Brown, however, according to his own testimony, and the testimony of the police and Mr. Spencer, being merely there as an informer, participating only for the purpose of bringing the others who were involved in the crime to conviction. They entered the office, Brown and Snow masked. Snow pointed his revolver at Brady, who was in charge, and ordered him to throw up his hands. That they seized, bound, blinded, and gagged him, and took the money lying out upon the table, and put it into bags and left, going from there to Engle's for the purpose of disposing of their plunder. The police, who have been all the while informed, and on the watch, closed in upon them, and arrested the three offenders with the plunder in their grasp. The charge is made by the commonwealth here that others were involved in this offense, and not alone those who were there immediately participating in it; that the commission of this crime was incited and planned by the present defendants, E. B. and H. H. Hollister. If this be true, — if it be established by the evidence, — the defendants here are just as guilty of an offense against the law as if they were actually present and participated in it. While in such a case they are not called 'principals,' but only 'accessories before the fact,' yet they may, under our law, be tried and convicted on the present indictment, which charges them as principals. Morally, we are inclined to feel that men who incite and plan a crime, and allure others into it, pushing them forward into the actual commission of the offense, while they keep themselves behind and away from it, are, in fact, the greater villains than those whom they make merely their instruments and tools.

"At this point we may as well dispose of a question with regard to the nature of the offense, which I have said to you I will discuss later on. It is claimed by the defendants that whatever was done that day was not a robbery. Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property of another by violence or putting in fear; or, perhaps, we may say, it is the felonious taking of the personal property of another by subduing him by actual violence, or a show of it. It is not simply stealing from the person of another, and it is different from all stealing. We might steal from the person of another,—for instance, from one who was asleep. That would be larceny, and not robbery. If the person were awake, and violence were threatened or actually inflicted upon him, and in that way property was taken from his person, that would be robbery. I hope that illustrates the distinction. In this case with which we are now dealing there is one element of robbery wanting. The evidence is that the commission of the offense was known in advance, and preparations made to meet it. The money which was there at that office was divided, only sufficient being put in sight to make a proper showing, and the rest being away under the table. Brady, the man in charge, was told that these men were coming, and that he should make no resistance, and he made none. There was such an understanding between the owners of the property, the Spencers, and the party who was in charge of it, Brady, and Brown, one of the participants, as reduced the offense from robbery to either mere larceny or an attempt to commit a robbery. In this connection I will read the defendant's sixteenth point: 'That there is not sufficient evidence in the case to support a verdict of guilty of robbery.' Answer of the Court: That I affirm. You are not, however, gentlemen, to mistake the effect of what I say in this immediate connection. That there was not crime there I do not instruct you, but I only say that the crime there committed was not what is technically known in the law as 'robbery.' Morally, we may feel that there was just as much guilt as if there was an actual robbery, and that the offense is just as deserving of punishment, though it amounted merely to an attempt to commit the crime. The precautions taken merely relieved the case of one element peculiar and essential to the crime of robbery. In popular saying there was a robbery, but in legal sense not.

NOTE.—As to consenting to crime for the purpose of detection, see note to the case immediately preceding this one.

"Turning, now, to the indictment, we find that there are four counts in it. The first and second counts charge that a robbery was committed with a weapon; with an offensive weapon,—a revolver. The weapon on that occasion, which was in the possession of Snow, according to the evidence, was furnished by Brown, and was not essential to carry out the plans which had been previously made, although not unnatural to it. But as the offense was planned by the Hollisters, according to the evidence of the commonwealth's witnesses, the robbery was not to be accomplished by means of arms, and for that reason, and out of abundant caution, I instruct you that there can be no conviction on the first and second counts of this indictment, which charge a robbery as committed upon Brady with an offensive weapon. The third count in the indictment charges a simple robbery. The fourth count charges a larceny. Now, although I have said to you that there was no robbery committed there that day, yet upon the third and fourth counts, if you are satisfied by the evidence to that effect, you may convict the defendants on the third count of an attempt to rob, and on the fourth count of a larceny, according as you are satisfied and convinced by the evidence in the case.

You are merely, then, to confine yourselves to considering the third and fourth counts in the indictment, and you are to remember that there can be no conviction, in any case, of robbery, although there may be a conviction of an attempt to rob.

"Engle says that he was first approached with regard to the commission of this robbery by 'Squire E. B. Hollister, as they were together on the Erie and Wyoming train coming from Maplewood some time late in the winter of last year. He says they sat in the seat together in the smoking car, sitting in the front seat. That on the first occasion no one was in front of them. Hollister approached the subject by asking Engle about the place of the Spencers at Dunmore. He asked whether Engle had not worked there, and then expressed the idea that it was quite an easy place to rob. He asked how it was protected, and Engle said there was a small building and only one paymaster, and generally only one there when they paid; that they generally paid on the 17th of each month. Hollister then said he could get a couple of men to do the job, and ended the conversation by saying that he would see Engle later. They had a second meeting and conversation upon this same subject on the cars at another time, and from this time on there were several interviews between the witness Engle and E. B. Hollister upon the subject. Once Hollister came to Engle while he was cutting ice at the Maplewood pond, merely saying on that occasion that he had heard nothing from the parties who had been approached with regard to actually doing the robbery. Then from time to time, at one time E. B. Hollister, and at another time H. H. Hollister, came to him at Dunmore, and discussed this question. On the first occasion H. H. Hollister came there, and professed a knowledge with regard to it, although prior to that, according to Engle's story, he had not talked with H. H. Hollister at all. H. H. introduced the subject as though he knew about it, although before that the only conversation had been with E. B. Hollister. Once an unnamed stranger was brought to Dunmore, and was introduced as some one from Philadelphia by H. H. Hollister. This matter was talked over, and the man without any name was introduced as one who had been brought there to arrange for the robbery. H. H. said at that time that he was the one who was going to make the arrangements in place of 'Squire Hollister, whom the men did not trust. It was on that occasion, I believe, that this stranger said something about his partner not being free, being in jail at that time, and I don't know whether it was then, or at another time, that there was some discussion about not undertaking it until there was a particular phase of the moon. Finally, we come down in Engle's story to the point where Wallace Snow was brought up to Dunmore by H. H. Hollister, and they went out by night into the field. Then, after that, Snow and Brown came with Hollister. This was within a week of the time that the offense of the 17th of October was committed. After this there were several meetings of importance, according to Engle's statement. On one occasion they met at Harris' saloon, although this amounted to nothing, as one of the parties was not there, but H. H. Hollister, Snow, and Engle were there. Probably some time along here there was a meeting which Engle speaks of, and which the others also speak of, as occurring on Sunday at a place called 'The Delmonico', on Spruce street, when H. H. Hollister, Snow, and Engle were present. The final meeting, according to Engle's testimony, was at Harris', on Friday night, I think, just before the robbery. H. H. Hollister, Snow, Engle, and Brown were all there. The whole detail of how the robbery was to be committed was gone over, and also the division of the plunder spoken of, and in that connection H. H. Hollister said that there was another party who would have to come in for a division of the money, and mentioned his brother, 'Squire. H. H. Hollister then and there said that he himself would not be present at Dunmore when the robbery was committed, but would be somewhere else, so that he could prove an alibi, leaving his shop at twelve or half-past twelve o'clock, noon. Now, we have the further testimony of Wallace Snow upon this subject. It, of course, covers all the points that Engle testifies to when Snow was present, as well as others, of course, when Snow alone was there, and Engle not. We find from the testimony of H. H. Hollister that he first became acquainted with Snow at Dunning's, some four years ago, and that he saw him gambling there; that is to say, when Snow testifies that Hollister first approached him with regard to this subject, he knew that Snow was a gambler. He knew somewhat of the nature of the man, at least to the extent that his being a gambler was involved and drawn in it. Snow says that he was approached by Hollister one Sunday, as he was standing upon the street along in September. That he had a pitcher of hot water which he was carrying to a sick friend. The temptation was there held out to him in an adroit way, if his story be true, and Hollister pictured how he and Snow were getting too old to make their living by day's work, and that he knew where some money could be very easily made, and that it was the easiest and prettiest thing that he had ever seen. An appointment was then made for the next night at the Forest House stoop, and the parties met according to appointment, and walked around the streets talking about it. This time more particulars were given. The place was mentioned as a little building, a short way off from others, and that only one man was in charge. Snow said that he had never undertaken such business, but, having listened to the tempter, we may feel and see from the sequel, if his story be believed, that he was in his power. On this occasion, according to Snow's testimony, he wanted him to get some one to assist, so that there might be two, and at this point Denny seems to come in, because we find that Snow saw Denny, and arranged for a meeting with H. H. Hollister, and introduced Hollister to him, according to Denny's statement. Just when this was is not clear from the evidence, but the two parties or three parties took a walk together, and, among others, came up here to this court-house square, and sat down on one of the settees here, and, if this testimony is believed, right here, almost in the shadow of these walls, discussed and planned this robbery. The matter was explained and pictured to Denny in the same way Snow says it was pictured to him, and he promised to take it under consideration, but at a subsequent time, fortunately for him, he refused to go into it. Then the matter ran along for some time, as Snow says, until it came along to the 10th of October, and on that occasion H. H. Hollister came to Snow's house, and left word with his wife to come to his (Hollister's) house on Sunday. On Sunday, Snow did go to Hollister's and Hollister there said that he was anxious not to have the matter go over another month. They talked the whole thing over from the beginning. Snow told him that the other party—I presume meaning Denny—had dropped out, but Hollister said he had another man. Next we have an interview on the Forest House steps, and then again we have a meeting at Dunmore, when Engle was present, corresponding in that to the testimony of Engle himself. Then we have a meeting at Harris' on Thursday night, when H. H. Hollister, Engle, Brown, and Snow were present, and where there was a discussion of how the robbery was to be accomplished,—the whole thing talked over and arranged. Friday they met again at the same place; the same parties there, and the arrangements gone over and discussed very much as Engle testifies.

"We have the testimony of Brown. . . .

"He does not begin in this offense where Engle did nor where Snow did, because he says that he was approached upon the 13th of October, a few days before the crime was committed; but he does say that, when he was approached, he was approached by H. H. Hollister, who was introduced by Snow, and the place was in front of Charles Tropp's former saloon. He says, further, that they met again the next night at Harris' saloon, and there the particular point of attacking a pay office as the offense to be committed was discussed. On Wednesday night Brown says he went up to Dunmore with Snow and Hollister, or at least Snow and Hollister and Engle were there when he got there, and while they were together the whole matter in regard to this robbery was talked over, and the witness agreed to take it up with the others. He even went out with one party, and walked around to the office. The next day he met Snow and Hollister at Harris' again, and arranged for a further meeting on Friday night, the night before the day of the crime. On Friday he met Snow, Hollister, and Engle. Then it was that Hollister spoke about going to Blatter's saloon at the time the crime was to be committed, so that he could prove an alibi, and Brown says he objected to this, and said that all must go to the one place, up there in Dunmore. The division of the money was also spoken of, and there Hollister spoke of there being three besides Snow and Brown, and said that 'Squire' Hollister was the fifth one of the party. Brown says, however, after he was spoken to, the night of the first meeting at Harris', where some of the details of the crime were first developed to him, that he reported the matter to the chief of police, and from that time until the crime was actually committed he kept the chief informed of what was being planned, and, between Wednesday night and the Friday night meeting, Brown says he went to Dunmore with the chief of police to look over the ground. He says that he took part in the robbery on the day that it was committed, not as an accomplice in the crime, but merely as a decoy, or words to that effect. Now, if Brown is believed, he does not stand at all in the light of an accomplice, and we have in his evidence corroborating evidence of the testimony of Snow, so far as it implicates H. H. Hollister, and of Engle, so far as it implicates H. H. Hollister. In fact, Brown's evidence of itself would be sufficient to convict H. H. Hollister of complicity in this crime. The defendants, however, call and put him in the light of an accomplice, and in that way seek to destroy the effect of his evidence, and they point to an indictment which has been produced, and which has been found against him, and pending in this court. They say that he has the same motive to pervert the truth, and to put off this offense in which he was caught, upon somebody else, so that he may escape by apparently joining in with the prosecution started by the commonwealth. It is, however, very difficult to my mind, gentlemen, to reconcile any such suggestion as this with the other clear facts in the case. How could the chief of police lay the effective counterplan to catch these parties, unless some information was furnished, as he says—as Brown says he gave? And we have not only the testimony of Brown upon this; we have the testimony of Mr. Spencer and the chief of police. Now, Mr. Spencer is a man whose testimony will hardly be assailed or impeached, and he swears that he met Brown and Chief Simpson on Thursday night, and heard that this robbery was proposed, and was hardly able to believe it. We see, also, what Mr. Spencer swears that he did on the strength of this information, how he gave notice to Brady, and how he and Chamberlain put up and arranged the money, all upon the strength of information which he testifies he received in this connection through the medium of Brown. . . . The chief's conduct is also made the subject of criticism. I must say I cannot see that this is warranted. You may judge about him differently, and your judgment must be independent of mine, but I cannot see that he has done other than what is discreet and satisfactory, in that which he has been called upon to do in this case, and in any event his conduct, however you may view it, however adversely you may regard it or criticise it, only affects his own credibility. . . .

"Now, as to H. H. Hollister. He says that he first met Engle at Kinback's, and interested him in the model of a harrow which he had, and which he produces here. He next says that he went to see Engle at his home in Dunmore, to get him to take an interest and operate a stone quarry, which belonged to a certain Mr. Mitchel, near Wimmer's Summit. Engle said, according to Hollister, that he would see about it, and would have a talk with George Watson, with whom he was associated in the stone flag business. Upon a later occasion H. H. Hollister says that he met Engle at Harris', and went in and took a glass of lager with him there. On a still later occasion Hollister says that he was inside Harris' saloon, sitting by a table reading, and that he met Engle there, and talked about the stone business and about the harrow, and, while they were there talking, Snow and Brown came in, and they asked Engle upstairs, and himself. He hesitated about going up, but finally went, and they had some beer there together. He said he never saw Engle or Brown at any other time; that he did not meet Snow or Denny; never saw Engle or Brown at any other time; that he says that at these times when he admits that he met these parties nothing but what was natural and innocent was spoken of. He denies that the robbery, or any robbery or crime, was ever spoken of or discussed. . . .

"I should not pass from the testimony of H. H. Hollister without referring to that part of his testimony which goes to trace his conduct at the time of the actual commission of this crime. If the evidence of the commonwealth was that H. H. Hollister was present, had participated in the commission of the offense, then the evidence as to where he was at the time would be important, because it would go to establish what we know in the law and commonly speak of as an alibi. But this is not the character of the offense against him. The commonwealth does not pretend to say that he was right there where the crime was committed. This evidence, therefore only has a legal bearing upon the case, so perhaps furnishes a basis for the argument that at the time when this offense was going on, when he, if he was near, must have known that it was, that he was about his ordinary and natural business, and that would not be likely of a man who was really interested, with his mind intent upon that which was happening at a distance. It is said, on the other side, that this would be just what a guilty man would do, if his purpose was to shield himself, and make out an alibi, and they point to the testimony of Brown and Snow, who swear that Hollister suggested that he would go to Blatter's saloon, and would not be present, but would go to Blatter's saloon for the purpose of making out an alibi. We also find, as a mere circumstance, — scintilla, — that Chief Simpson went to Blatter's to see if Hollister was there, which would be quite natural if he had received this information from Brown with regard to Hollister's purpose. On the other hand, it may be said on the part of Hollister that a complete alibi could have been made out, perhaps the best of all, by his keeping steady at his work, rather than by his leaving it."

Sterrett, OA. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment on which appellant and his brother were tried contains four counts, respectively charging the defendants therein named with (1) aggravated felonious assault and robbery; (2) aggravated felonious assault with intent to rob; (3) robbery; and (4) larceny. Two of the defendants—Engle and Snow—had pleaded "Guilty." Appellant and his brother, protesting their innocence, went to trial. The latter was acquitted. The former was found "guilty of larceny as charged in the fourth count of the indictment," and recommended to the mercy of the court. The circumstances attending the commission of the alleged crime, as shown by the testimony, are fully stated in the charge of the court. It is unnecessary for us to do more than refer to a few of them incidentally. If the learned president of the oyer and terminer was correct in his view of the law applicable to the undisputed facts, there cannot be any doubt that the crime of larceny, at least, was committed. It was not shown that appellant was present when the money was taken. On the contrary, the proof of an alibi appears to have been very clear and uncontradicted. If, however, the taking, in the circumstances disclosed by the commonwealth's testimony, amounted to larceny, and the evidence tending to prove that appellant was an accessory before the fact was believed, the jury was warranted in finding as they did. The substance of that evidence is that a robbery was adroitly planned by him, but the execution thereof was intrusted to Engle, Snow, and Brown. The latter informed the chief of police and Mr. Spencer, one of the intended victims, of the contemplated robbery, and they arranged with Brown that he should co-operate with the others in the commission thereof, and report to them. Part of that arrangement was that Spencer should put up $500 in several envelopes, and place them on the paymaster's desk in the pay office, and notify the paymaster that Snow and Brown would attempt to take the money, but without injuring him; that he should submit to being bound, blindfolded, and gagged, and not forcibly resist the taking of the money. Spencer explained this to the paymaster, and the latter acted his part accordingly. At the time set for commission of the robbery, Engle went to the pay office to see that the way was clear. Finding that the paymaster was there alone, Brown and Snow, following him, entered the office masked. Snow covered the paymaster with a revolver, and ordered him to hold up his hands. Then Brown and Snow seized, bound, blindfolded, and gagged him, and, taking the money from his table, put it in bags and carried it in the direction of Engle's stable, for the purpose of there disposing of it, as had been prearranged by the confederates. At that point the police, who meanwhile had been waiting developments, closed in on and arrested Engle, Snow, and Brown with the money in their possession.

This mere outline of the more prominent facts which the commonwealth's testimony tends to prove will be sufficient for the purpose of disposing of the specifications of error, the first and second of which complain of the following extracts from the learned judge's charge: (a) "You may convict the defendants on the third count of an attempt to rob, and on the fourth count of a larceny, according as you are satisfied and convinced by the evidence in the case." (b) "As to the third count, you will say whether the defendants are guilty or not guilty of an attempt to commit a robbery, and, on the fourth count, whether they are guilty or not guilty of a larceny." The remaining specification charges error generally "in submitting to the jury the question of defendant's guilt or innocence of the crime of larceny as charged upon him in the fourth count of the indictment, there not being sufficient evidence to warrant the submission of that question." The first and second counts of the indictment were practically eliminated from the case by instructing the jury that there could be no conviction on either of them, and the third was disposed of by the verdict. That left nothing of which appellant could possibly complain except the instruction as to the charge of larceny contained in the fourth count, on which, alone, he was convicted and sentenced. As to that his counsel, in their brief of argument, say: "The vice of all the specifications of error is in the learned court submitting to the jury the question of larceny, as set forth in the fourth count of the indictment." That alleged error is grounded on the unwarranted assumption that there was no evidence in the case to justify a conviction of larceny. If believed by the jury, as it evidently was, the testimony tending to show appellant's active participation in planning a felonious taking of the money, and what was done in pursuance thereof by some of his confederates, was quite sufficient to warrant his conviction under the fourth count. While, as stated by appellant's counsel, "the evidence, if believed, is full and clear to the effect that Brown had informed the chief of police of the purpose and plan of the alleged confederates, and of the time they had fixed for the consummation of the offense, and that Brown and the chief had fully informed Spencer of the whole matter," etc., and further, that Brown was co-operating with the police and the intended victims of the plot for the purpose of detecting and punishing those engaged therein, etc., it does not follow that Engle and Snow, two of said confederates, were any the less guilty of feloniously taking and carrying away the packages of money. It does not appear that they had any suspicion that Brown was acting the part of detective and informer. The jury was properly cautioned as to the danger of convicting on the testimony of accomplices. But the case did not rest on the testimony of Engle and Snow alone. They were corroborated by other witnesses. Brown was a competent witness, and, if believed, his testimony alone was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that a larceny was committed. In Campbell v. Com., 84 Pa. 187, we held that one who joins a criminal organization for the purpose of exposing it and bringing criminals to punishment, and honestly carries out that design, is not an accessory before the fact, although he may have encouraged and counseled parties who were about to commit crime, if in so doing he intended that they should be discovered and punished; and his testimony, therefore, is not to be treated as that of an infamous witness. See also Taylor, Ev. § 971; Whart. Crim. Ev. § 440. So far as Engle and Snow participated in taking the money, the testimony all tends to show that they did so animo furandi, in pursuance of the preconcerted scheme to rob, etc., and were therefore guilty, at least of larceny. Com. v. Eichelberger, 119 Pa. 254.

The case against appellant turned upon questions of fact which were exclusively for the determination of the jury. To them it was fairly submitted, with very full and adequate instructions. If there was any error, it was on the part of the jury, and the only remedy for that was in the court below. Neither of the specifications is sustained.

The sentence of the Court of Oyer and Terminer is affirmed, and the record is remitted to the court for the purpose of fully executing said sentence; and to that end it is ordered that appellant do forthwith surrender himself into the custody of the sheriff of Lackawanna county.

APPPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to prevent defendants from interfering with the possession which had been acquired by the sheriff of certain property of a corporation under a writ of attachment. Writ granted.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinions.

Messrs. Greene & Turner, for relators:

Creditors in whose suits the sheriff holds for them by virtue of attachments or executions a possession acquired prior to the appointment of the receiver have an absolute right to have the sheriff retain possession and sell and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of their judgment notwithstanding the receiver demands and claims to have possession surrendered to him.

Messrs. M. J. Cochran and J. B. Bridges for respondents.

Hoyt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Only one substantial question is presented by the return of the respondents to the alternative writ of prohibition heretofore issued in this cause, and that is as to the respective rights of the relators as attaching creditors of a certain corporation, and a duly appointed receiver for said corporation. The relators obtained a lien upon the property in question by virtue of attachment proceedings, and have maintained such lien by causing the sheriff to retain the actual possession of the property in question from the date of the initiation of such lien. The receiver was appointed in a suit instituted by a stockholder of the corporation for the purpose of winding up its affairs. Such suit was commenced long after the lien of the relators to the specific personal property had attached, and they were not made parties thereto. Under this state of facts, the relators contend that their right to have the sheriff retain possession of the property, and subject it to the payment of their judgment, is not affected by the appointment of the receiver. This question was before this court in the case of State v. Snohomish County Super. Ct., 7 Wash. 77, and, after able argument and careful consideration, a decision in accordance with such contention was reached. The question, having been once decided in this court, should not be reopened until it is made affirmatively to appear that such decision was not in accordance with correct legal principles. We have carefully investigated all the authorities cited by the respondents, and the result of such examination has made it unnecessary that we should bring to the aid of our former decision any of the numerous authorities cited in the able brief of the attorney for the relators. The respondents contend that the authorities cited by them establish the doctrine that, whenever a receiver is appointed, he is entitled to the possession of all the property of the corporation for which he is appointed, regardless of the question as to whether the actual possession of such property is in such corporation or in that of a third person, a stranger to the suit in which such receiver had been appointed. We are unable to find anything in any of the cases so cited which warrants this contention. The general proposition is laid down in Gluck & Becker on Receivers, Beach on Receivers, High on Receivers, and in the American & English Encyclopedia of Law, that a receiver only takes such rights in the property of the corporation as it had at the date of his appointment, or at most at the date of the commencement of the action in which the appointment is made; and the author of each of these works cites abundant authority to sustain such general proposition. Among the numerous cases cited by respondents we have been unable to find a single one which goes to the extent of holding that a receiver, without other authority than that of the order appointing him, had the right to interfere with personal property in the actual possession of third persons under claim of right. There are some cases which hold that, by making such persons parties to the suit in which the receiver was appointed, they may be compelled to surrender the property to him and adjudicate their rights in that action; and in some cases the order appointing the receiver has directed him to take possession of certain specifically designated property, and in such cases it has been held that the person holding such property could not question the authority of the receiver under such order; but none of these cases aid the contention of the respondents. The order in this case, in general terms, directed the receiver to take the property of the corporation, and required such corporation to surrender possession thereof, but said nothing as to any specific articles, or as to the rights or duties of those not parties to the action; hence, under the general rule referred to, the receiver only took such rights as the corporation had, and, as the corporation had no right to interfere with the property in question, it must follow that the receiver could not rightfully assert any claim thereto not subject to the lien of relators, and the right of the sheriff to retain possession, and proceed in the enforcement of the process in his hands.

There are many cases which hold that a receiver once in possession of property cannot be disturbed in such possession, even by one who has a superior lien thereon. Not only are there many cases which establish this doctrine, but, so far as we know, there is an unbroken line of authority going to that extent. The reason why the possession of a receiver must not be disturbed is that it is the possession of the court, and its dignity will not allow any one, without its permission, to interfere with that of which it has possession. But the research which we have been able to give to the subject has not brought to our notice a case in which it has been held that property in the actual possession of a third person, under claim of right, came into possession of the court upon the appointment of a receiver in a suit to which the person in possession of the property was not a party. The case most relied upon by respondents, and which comes nearer to sustaining their contention than any other that has been brought to our attention, is that of Winnell v. Sampson, 55 U. S. 14 How. 52, 14 L. ed. 822. An examination of that case, and of the briefs of counsel, will show that it went no further than to establish the well-recognized doctrine that a court will brook no interference with property in the actual possession of its receiver. It is contended on the part of respondents that, in the case just cited, the possession of which the court speaks in its decision was simply the constructive possession in the receiver, growing out of the fact of his appointment. But it appears clearly, from the briefs of counsel, that the property was in the actual possession of the receiver. This also appears from the opinion of the court, as the following quotation will show: "The receiver was appointed on the 27th June, 1845, and on the same day Ticknor, who was in possession of the premises, attorned to him, who held possession until the sale was made in pursuance of the decree. . . . At the time, therefore, of this sale, the receiver was in the possession of the premises under the decree of the court of chancery." Such being the status of the property as to which the court was speaking in deciding that case, it has little weight in support of the contention of respondents. Besides, there was another reason given by the court for its decision, aside from that growing out of the actual possession of the property by the receiver, and that was that the parties attempting to assert a legal right as against his title had been brought into the action; and from what is said by the court it is probable that the case would have been decided differently if the one claiming the adverse title had not been made a party to the suit in which the receiver had been appointed. Upon that subject the court speaks as follows: "We agree that the person holding the prior legal lien or incumbrance must have notice, and an opportunity to come in and claim his prior right to the property or interest in the fund, before his legal right can be affected; and the proper way is by summons or notice upon the order or direction of the court." In a similar manner, every case cited by respondents can be analyzed, and abundant reasons for the decisions found, without invoking the harsh rule contended for by respondents,—that one in the actual possession of property under claim of legal right may be deprived of such possession without any opportunity to be heard in defense of his rights. That the affairs of a corporation can be so changed, by the appointment of a receiver at the instance of one of its own stockholders, as to take a legal right from one claiming property adversely to it, without his being brought into court for the purpose of having his right thereto adjudicated, is so contrary to our understanding of what constitutes due process of law that we cannot yield assent to such a doctrine. It is laid down, by the text-writers to whom we have referred, that under such circumstances a receiver must resort to an action at law to obtain possession. The corporation could only assert its rights to the possession of property thus situated in an action at law, and, except when aided by statute, the receiver can do no more. In many states there are express statutory provisions which require all those claiming property of a corporation to yield the same to a receiver or assignee when proceedings for the appointment of such receiver or assignee have been instituted by or on behalf of such corporation; but we have no such statutory provision in this state, and without some aid of this kind we are unable to see any sufficient reason for holding that the appointment of a receiver should authorize him to take possession, without legal process, of property in the adverse possession of another under claim of right. We are satisfied with what we held in the former case, and, applying it to the facts in this one, it follows that the receiver was not justified in interfering with the possession of the property in controversy, nor with the right of the sheriff to proceed against the same, as required by the process in his hands.

The alternative writ must be made perpetual.

Anders, Scott, and Stiles, JJ., concur.

Dunbar, Ch. J.:

I am unable to agree with the conclusion reached by the majority. I think, in the first place, the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained; and, in the second place, the answer of the receiver and the return of the court conclusively show to my mind that no injury or damage was threatened to the petitioners by the court or the receiver. The opinion of the majority starts out with the proposition that the receiver only takes such interest in the property of the corporation as it had at the date of his appointment, or, at most, at the date of the commencement of the action in which the appointment was made; and the case of State v. Snohomish County Super. Ct., 7 Wash. 77, is cited to sustain this proposition. The decision of this point was not necessarily involved in the case above referred to, and the opinion expressed in that case, in my judgment, was wrong, and not borne out by the authorities, and is not consistent with the orderly administration of courts of equity in settling insolvent estates. This question was, however, before this court in the case of Meeker v. Sprague, 5 Wash. 242, and there it was flatly decided that the party having a mortgage lien must foreclose his lien in the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the insolvent estate, even where the mortgagee alleged that the property upon which he had a first lien would be charged with a greater proportion of the expenses of the receivership than would be just. In that case all the right that the receiver could take, according to the doctrine announced in the majority opinion in this case, was the right of the equity of redemption, which was all the right that the insolvent corporation had under the law. It is true that the property involved there was real estate; but the doctrine that the receiver only takes the right to the property that the corporation had at the date of his appointment, if tenable at all, must be applied to all the property. Nor was there any attempt made, in Meeker v. Sprague, supra, to distinguish this lien from the lien on personal property, but the decision was based upon the theory that the court would respect the lien, and that it would do exact justice in the premises. "It cannot for a moment be presumed," said the court in that case, "in aid of the contention of the appellant, that the lower court will not do as full and exact justice to each person or corporation claiming a lien upon any of the property of the defendant corporation, when presented in such original suit, as it would when presented by means of an independent action. It would be the duty of such court to determine each of the claims presented in said original action by the same rules, and grant to them the same rights, as it would if each of the claimants were the plaintiff in an independent action. While each of them will be adjudicated in the original action, they will be so adjudicated upon the facts of the particular claim, as related to the entire property of the corporation. And in the adjustment of the expenses incident to such suit, and of the services of the receiver, the principles of equity will, of course, be applied; and if any of the liens are upon property over which the receiver has but a nominal control, it will, of course, be the duty of the trial court to see that the holders thereof are protected from having their security in any material degree decreased by the costs and expenses incident to the receivership. And, upon the question of the effect of the deed from the corporation to the receiver, it seems to us clear that it can in no manner affect the rights of the appellant. Such corporation could not convey to the respondent any of its rights, and the court will see to it that, in the final adjustment of the rights of all the claimants, the appellant, together with all others like situated, is protected against any diversion, or attempted diversion, of the property upon which he had a first lien, to the payment of subsequent liens, of whatever nature or kind they may be." The reading of the return of the court to the alternative writ issued in this case would seem to justify the action of the court, considered with reference to the opinion of this court just quoted. A portion of the return is as follows: "And respondent further says that it was not, nor is it now, doing the things complained of for the purpose, and with the intent, of destroying and making worthless the said executions of the relators, but that the same should be respected by the said receiver; that the receiver should take and hold the said property subject to whatever right, title, and interest in and to the said property the relators had or have by virtue of such executions; that the said receiver should take the said property subject to any and all liens or levies; that the property of the said company should be sold under the direction of this court, and managed, under its direction, by said receiver; and that any and all moneys coming to the said receiver from or out of the said property should go towards discharging and satisfying the executions of relators, if the court should finally decide that the said executions were valid and prior liens thereon." The doctrine announced in Meeker v. Sprague, supra, is in harmony with the doctrine that the creditor has no vested right in methods or remedies. In this case the creditor has a right to make his money out of the property which is the subject of the lien, but he has no right whatever in the particular manner in which the money is to be made. Taking the return of the court to be true (which this court must do), it is seen that the method is all that is contended for here by the petitioners; and it is elementary that the writ of prohibition should not issue unless some right is invaded or threatened; and all the right the petitioners have here is the right to be paid out of the first proceeds of the sale, which right will not be denied them by a court of equity. The court will simply direct its receiver to act in the premises, and this court will not, as it said in Meeker v. Sprague, supra, assume that the property upon which the first lien exists will be charged with a greater proportion of expenses by reason of its settlement by a court of equity. The receiver is appointed for the benefit of all concerned,—the judgment creditor, as well as the other creditors, and the corporation itself; and it is the duty of the court, in the interest of all of the creditors, as well as in the interest of the corporation which is deprived by the law of the right to settle its own estate, to see that the property is sold in such a way that the best results will be obtained. So, in this case, the creditor is not threatened with loss of any right, but the court, merely to prevent harmful confusion and additional costs, which would be the inevitable result of clashing acts of authority, and for the benefit of all parties concerned, proposes to prescribe the method which in its judgment will obtain the best results. The citation of authorities on this proposition by the majority I do not think fairly sustains their contention. The rule laid down by Gluck & Becker on Receivers (page 180) is as follows: "Persons having liens upon the property, acquired before the receiver's appointment, have no right to interfere with its possession by the receiver, and, without any application to, or adjudication of, the court, sell and dispose of it; and sale of property so made is illegal and void,"—citing Winnall v. Sampson, 55 U. S. 14 How. 52, 14 L. ed. 822, a case of which I will hereafter speak. It is very plain, from an investigation of the authorities, that the possession of the receiver referred to is a constructive, and not an actual, possession, the theory of the law being that, when the receiver is appointed to administer upon the estate, the possession immediately vests in him. The same author (on page 184) says: "The title to property in the hands of a receiver is not in him, but in those for whose benefit he holds it. Nor, in a legal sense, is the property in his possession. It is in the possession of the court, by him as its officer." And again, in section 45: "The receiver of an insolvent corporation, while, as a general rule, he is to be regarded as the representative of the corporation, asserting its rights, taking its title, and subject to its liabilities, in one respect occupies a broader position, and represents, not only the corporation, but also the creditors; and when, in any proceeding, he occupies exclusively the latter status, he may do, and under some circumstances must do, many things which, if his acts were strictly limited to those of a representative of a corporation, he could not do." It is plain that, if he represents the corporation as well as the creditors, he represents all the interests, and must necessarily have possession of all the property.

It is contended that, if possession is yielded up to the receiver, the result will be that the lien will be destroyed; and the establishment of the truth of this proposition is really the only logical ground upon which the writ in this case can issue. But I think that the doctrine cannot be established, either on reason or authority; especially it cannot obtain here, where the answer of the court affirmatively shows that the lien will be respected and maintained until the question of priority is adjudicated. There is, in my mind, a great deal of fanciful importance attached to this idea of possession. It is true that, under our statutes, an attachment levy creates a lien. But it is not the object of the lien to create any right of possession in the creditor. The sole object is to keep the property in statu quo to prevent the debtor from disposing of it, or any one else obtaining it, until it can be made to respond to the judgment. When the creditor is sure of this result, he has no cause for complaint whatever, and should not be allowed to interfere with the orderly procedure of the court by captious or arbitrary insistence upon any particular method or mode of procedure. Wiswall v. Sampson, supra, is a well-considered case, which, in my opinion, sustains the contention of the respondent. It does not very clearly appear in this case whether the court is speaking of the actual or constructive possession of the receiver, but it does appear that the court intended to lay down the broad doctrine that the estate of an insolvent debtor, where a receiver had been appointed, must be administered by direction of the court, and that, where a lien had been obtained, it was not necessary for its perpetuation that the property be sold by legal process, but that such lien would be protected by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate; and the court lays down the doctrine that the party having a lien must apply to the court for the protection of his rights. "The effect of the appointment," says the court, "is not to oust any party of his right to the possession of the property [and here it must evidently appear that the court was not referring to property in the possession of the receiver at the time he was appointed but in the possession of the other party], but merely to retain it for the benefit of the party who may ultimately appear to be entitled to it; and, when the party entitled to the estate has been ascertained, the receiver will be considered his receiver, and the master will usually be directed to inquire what incumbrances there are affecting the estate, and into the priorities, respectively." The italics in the quotation are my own. If the receiver is to be considered the creditor's receiver, then it is all folly to talk about a creditor's losing his lien by reason of the possession of the receiver. "When," the court, continuing, says, "a receiver has been appointed, his appointment is that of the court, and any attempt to disturb it, without the leave of the court first obtained, will be a contempt on the part of the person making it. This was held in Angel v. Smith, 9 Ves. Jr. 835, both with respect to receivers and sequestrators. When, therefore, a party is prejudiced by having a receiver put in his way, the course has either been to give him leave to bring an ejectment or to permit him to be examined pro interesse suo. And the doctrine that a receiver is not to be disturbed extends even to cases in which he has been appointed expressly, without prejudice to the rights of persons having prior legal or equitable interests; and the individuals having such prior interests must, if they desire to avail themselves of them, apply to the court, either for liberty to bring ejectment, or to be examined pro interesse suo; and this, though their right to the possession is clear,"—citing Bryan v. Cormick, 1 Cox, Ch. 422; Anonymous, 6 Ves. Jr. 287. It would seem that this expression by the Supreme Court of the United States was sufficiently convincing that it was not attaching any great importance to the question of physical possession. Further, quoting Chancellor Kent in Codwise v. Gelston, 10 Johns. 507, the court says: "But, when the law gives a priority, equity will not destroy it; and especially where legal assets are created by statute, as in case of a judgment lien, they remain so, though the creditors be obliged to go into equity for assistance. The legal priority will be protected and preserved in chancery." And still further, showing that the question of possession was not the basis of this opinion, the court, proceeding, says: "It has been argued that the sale of the premises on execution and purchase occasioned no interference with the possession of the receiver, and hence no contempt of the authority of the court, and that a sale, therefore, in such a case, should be upheld. But, conceding the proceedings did not disturb the possession of the receiver, the argument does not meet the objection. The property is a fund in court, to abide the event of the litigation, and to be applied to the payment of the judgment creditor, who has filed his bill to remove impediments in the way of his execution. If he has succeeded in establishing his right to the application of any portion of the fund, it is the duty of the court to see that such application is made; and, in order to effect this, the court must administer it independently of any rights acquired by third persons pending the litigation; otherwise, the whole fund would have passed out of its hands before the final decree, and the litigation become fruitless. It is true, in administering the fund, the court will take care that the rights of prior liens or incumbrances shall not be destroyed; and will adopt the proper measures, by reference to the master, or otherwise, to ascertain them, and bring them before it. Unless the court be permitted to retain the possession of the fund, thus to administer it, how can it ascertain the interest in the same to which the prosecuting judgment creditor is entitled, and apply it upon his demand?" There can be but one interpretation of this case, and that is that the court, under all circumstances, is entitled to the possession of all of the property of the estate; that the receiver, as an officer of the court, represents not only the creditors, but the estate; and that the whole settlement of the estate, both property that is subject to liens and that which is not, devolves upon the receiver as an officer of the court; and that all priorities will be ascertained and protected by the court.

This was also the doctrine announced by he court of appeals of New York. Walling v. Miller, 108 N. Y. 178. This was a case where the property involved was personal property, and levy was made under execution on the 13th day of May. Two days thereafter a receiver was appointed. On the day of his appointment he took possession of the property. According to the theory of the majority, if the sheriff had yielded up the possession of the property to the respondent, the lien would have been lost; but the court there seemed to be of a different opinion, for it says: "The lien of the execution was not destroyed by the appointment of a receiver, but the rights and interests of all parties in the property were thereafter to be adjusted by the court which appointed the receiver; and the property could not be taken out of the possession of the receiver, and sold upon the execution, without leave of the court. The execution creditor could bring his lien to the attention of the court in the action in which the receiver was appointed, and ask to have the execution satisfied out of the proceeds of the property; but persons having liens upon the property had no right to interfere with its possession by the receiver, and, without any application or adjudication of the court, sell and dispose of it, and thus dissipate it, and deprive the court of jurisdiction to administer it." So that it will be seen that the court, instead of holding that the yielding up of the possession to the receiver would destroy the lien, hold exactly the reverse, viz., that the creditor had no right to retain the possession, thus interfering with the possession of the receiver, but, by yielding up to the receiver, the lien of the execution would be protected. In this case the court went so far as to hold a sale of the property made under an execution void, where the levy was made prior to the appointment of the receiver. But that is just what the petitioners in this case are striving to do, and what this court has said by the majority opinion they have a right to do, viz., to interfere with the possession of the property by the receiver, and sell and dispose of it without any application by the court. "When a party is prejudiced by having a receiver put in his way, the course has either been to give him leave to bring an ejectment, or to permit him to be examined pro interesse suo. The rule that the possession of a receiver is not to be disturbed extends even to cases in which he has been appointed expressly, without prejudice to the rights of persons having prior estates, and the individuals having such prior estates must, if they wish to avail themselves of them, apply to the court either for liberty to bring an ejectment, or to be examined pro interesse suo; and this, although their right to take possession is clear." 3 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. p. 2057. That author states that the same rule applies where an estate has been sequestered. Turning to section 1269, we find the rule laid down thus: "The proper course to be pursued by any person who claims title to an estate or to property sequestered, whether by mortgage or judgment, lease or otherwise, or who has a title paramount to the sequestration, is to apply to the court to direct the plaintiff to exhibit interrogatories before one of the masters, in order that the party applying may be examined as to his title to the estate. . . . The mode of proceeding is the same where the property is in the possession of a receiver. Anonymous, 6 Ves. Jr. 287. . . . An order for the examination of a party pro interesse suo may be obtained as a matter of course by the party claiming, but it cannot be granted till after the sequestrators have made their return, because, till then, it cannot appear to the court what is sequestered. Ibid."

The whole theory of the law and of the authorities simply is that a court of equity which has jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate will protect the liens and priorities of every kind, when they are brought to its attention, but that it will do it in the manner best calculated to preserve the interests of all parties concerned; and this doctrine is expressed very concisely in Glines v. Supreme Sitting Order of Iron Hill, 50 N. Y. S. R. 748, where it was decided that the fact that one, before the appointment of a receiver, levies an attachment upon certain funds, does not give him a preference enforceable generally against the receiver as to the judgment obtained, but only a preference in the funds themselves. A recent case cited from the supreme court of Texas (Ellis v. Vernon Ice, Light & Water Co. 86 Tex. 109), very fully and forcibly sustains the respondent's contention. The court there said: "It is well established, we think, that, after property has been placed in the hands of the receiver, it is not subject to levy and sale under execution. Being in the custody of the law through the appointment of a receiver by a court of competent jurisdiction, it cannot be interfered with by process from another court. A party having a claim upon it must intervene in the court of the receivership, and in the case in which the receiver has been appointed, and establish his right in that tribunal, or must obtain leave of that court to bring an independent action. But the question here is, Can the sheriff who has made a levy upon real estate before the appointment of a receiver over it proceed to sell, and pass the title, after the receiver has been appointed?" The very statement of this case shows that it is the constructive possession of the receiver that the court is talking about, and that his possession is presumed to follow his appointment. After reviewing some cases where it was held, as the majority hold in this case, that the receiver only took such title as was conveyed to the receiver by the deed of the party over whose property he was appointed, and that this conveyance passed the property subject to the lien of the judgment under which it was sold, and that, therefore, the purchaser at execution sale took the superior title, the court sums up as follows: "However that may be, we think Wisswall v. Sampson lays down a doctrine that is founded upon good reason and sound policy. To permit the control of the receiver to be interfered with by virtue of process from another court would be a practice fraught with injustice and productive of confusion; and that remark applies with especial force to the receivers of insolvent corporations. After all the assets of a corporation have been taken from the hands of its managers, and placed under the control of a receiver, is it just to allow the property to be sold under execution? The court, having deprived the corporation of the power of paying the debt and of avoiding the sale, should, in the interest of all concerned, protect its property from the sacrifice. The receivership does not destroy any liens that may have been acquired before the appointment, but the remedy for their enforcement should be sought in the court in which the whole estate is being administered." In view of the logic of this case, and of the others which we have cited, it must be seen that the question of actual physical possession cuts no figure whatever, but that the broad and equitable doctrine is that the interest of the insolvent corporation, the interest of the unsecured creditors, and the interest of the attaching creditors must all be taken into consideration (giving due consideration to the rights of priority), and equitably protected, by the court administering upon the estate; and that it is not the policy of the law, and that no good reasons can be given for the division of the settlement into the hands of different tribunals or officers; and in the case at bar all the interest that the petitioners can have is the interest in the fund which is to be obtained from the sale of the property upon which they have a lien, and that the procedure or manner of obtaining that fund, and of applying it, can be safely intrusted to the discretion of the court. The writ should be denied.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

Sylvester FESTORAZZI et al., Exrs., etc., of Joseph Peter, Deceased, Appts.,

ST. JOSEPH ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH OF MOBILE et al.

(....Ala....)

A bequest to a church "to be used in solemn masses for the repose of my soul" is invalid.

(November —, 1893.)

APPPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Mobile in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to obtain construction of the will of Joseph Peter, deceased, and to have certain clauses therein declared invalid. Reversed.

The particular clauses which were alleged to be invalid were as follows: (2) I give and bequeath to the Roman Catholic Cathedral in the city of Mobile the sum of $8,000, the same to be used in solemn masses for the repose of my soul. (3) I give and bequeath to the Roman Catholic Church of St. Joseph in the city of Mobile the sum of $2,000, also to be used in solemn masses for the repose of my soul.

The further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

NOTE.—Validity of bequest for masses.

In England bequests and devises for the purpose of having masses said for the soul of the deceased are void as superstitious use, or as creating perpetuities. Atty-Gen. v. Fishmongers Co. 2 Beav. 151, 5 Myl. & C. 11; Atty-Gen. v. Vivian, 1 Russ. 276; Pele's Case, 4 Coke, 113b; Read's Case, and Tate's Case, 4 Coke, 113b; Cailey's Case, and Gregory's Case, 4 Coke, 114a; Colborn v. Dale, Duke, 89, 4 Coke, 116a; Adams & Lambert's Case, 4 Coke, 104a; Re Fleetwood, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 594; Heath v. Chapman, 3 Drew. 417, 23 L. J. Ch. 947.

So a deed of trust providing that the income should be paid to the officiating priest of the church of C—for masses for the soul of grantor, was void. Re Blundell's Trusts, 31 L. J. Ch. 52, 30 Beav. 380.

So a devise by a Chinese woman for the purpose of having a memorial house maintained where the family at certain periods could place before a memorial tablet savory food for the spirit of the departed was held void, as creating a perpetuity and akin to devises for masses, although not a charitable use. Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo, L. R. 6 P. C. 804.

But in Re Michel's Trusts, 28 Beav. 32, 6 Jur. N. S. 573, 29 L. J. Ch. 547, it was held that a devise by a Jew to pay to three persons chosen by the executors out of testator's family "to learn in their Beth Hammadras or college, two hours daily forever, and on every anniversary of my death, to say the prayer called in Hebrew 'Candish,'" not indicating that it is for the soul of the dead, was valid.

In this country the doctrine seems to be that a bequest to a definite person or to a definite church for masses will be sustained, but not if it is simply a request to the executor to have the money expendent without naming a definite pastor or church, but in the case of FESTORAZZI v. ST. JOSEPH CATHOLIC CHURCH, while the bequest named a particular church, the court refused to uphold it on the ground that "the form of the bequest repels the idea that a gift to a church for its own general uses was intended."

In Pennsylvania a bequest to a definite pastor or church for masses for soul of testator, has been sustained as valid. Selbert's App. 18 W. N. C. 278; Dougherty's Estate, 5 W. N. C. 556; Power's Estate, Id. 52.

And it was said in Shriber v. Rapp, 5 Watts, 282, that a grant of a Roman Catholic to purchase post-mortem masses would not be necessarily fraudulent in Pennsylvania, but this was not the question involved in the case.

But under Penna. law, Act 1885, section 11, providing that a devise in trust for religious or charitable use, made within a month prior to decease of testator, shall be void, a bequest to a church, to be expended in masses for his soul, is for a religious use, and is void if made within that time. Rhymer's App. 93 Pa. 142, 39 Am. Rep. 736.

A devise to B. and H. in trust for the benefit of the Catholic church on my farm in T county to be invested for said church, "and that service be held in said church for my soul yearly" is not void as it is not conditioned on the services, and the beneficiary is definite although not incorporated. Seda v. Huble, 75 Iowa, 429.

A devise being to L. "for funeral expenses, and the residue for charitable purposes, masses, etc." where the trustee L. died before the will was proved, this did not defeat the trust. Masses are religious ceremonies and come within the religious

Messrs. Overall & Bester, for appellants: The legacies to the churches are void because they contain no element of a charitable use.

The uses in the bequests, being the soul of a deceased person, is not such a use or trust as any court can enforce and is void in law.

The testator not having defined the trust sufficiently to enable the court to execute it, the next of kin must take the property by way of resulting trust.

Nichols v. Allen, supra.

A use or trust must be for some valid purpose clearly defined.

or pious uses which are upheld as public charities, "etc." means other purposes of like character, and another trustee was appointed to take the fund and apply it as devised. Schouler, Petitioner, 184 Mass. 426.

It was held in Kehoe v. Kehoe, in chancery, in circuit court of Cook county, Ill., 12 Abb. N. C. 427, note, that a deed of personal property with oral directions to use the fund for masses for the soul of donor was not invalid,—following Read v. Hodgkins, 7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 17, infra.

In New York it was held that a bequest to be expended for masses was void as there was no beneficiary in existence or interested. Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 812; O'Connor v. Gifford, 117 N. Y. 275, affirming 6 Dem. 71; Schwartz v. Bruder, 6 Dem. 102. See also Re O'Hara's Will, infra.

But in Gilman v. McArdle, 90 N. Y. 451, 52 Am. Rep. 41, reversing 12 Abb. N. C. 414, where the undertaker before the death of the donor received a sum to be used in funeral expenses and the balance for masses, the court refused to interfere with the use of the remainder after death.

In the case of Re Howard's Estate, 5 Misc. 296, it was held that bequests to designated persons for masses for donor's soul were not invalid on the grounds of a dictum in Holland v. Alcock, supra; but that the trust failed as to one of the priests as he had died before performance, and the other was not entitled to any until he had showed performance, as the soul of the deceased had been without solace for four years.

In Holland v. Smyth, 40 Hun. 372, a bequest to be applied for masses was sustained as akin to funeral expenses.

And in Re Hagenmeyer's Will, 12 Abb. N. C. 434, a definite bequest to a definite church for masses was sustained, adopting the doctrine in Read v. Hodgkins, 7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 17, infra.

Since the case of Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 812, it was held in Vanderveer v. McKane, 26 Abb. N. C. 5 L. R. A.

Our supreme court holds that English statutes passed before the emigration of our ancestors to this country and not inconsistent with our institutions constitute a part of the common law and are in force in all the states.

Carter v. Balfour, supra; Williams v. Pearson, 88 Ala. 299.

When the charity which is appointed is superstitious, the court will not carry it out, and it stands on the doctrine of cy pres and the prerogative of the crown to enforce indefinite charities, those principles not being in force in this country.

Williams v. Pearson, 88 Ala. 807.

The English cases clearly place this bequest among those defined to be for superstitious uses, and where it is of that character our supreme court says the courts of this state will not carry it out.

The "soul of the deceased," being a use not recognized in law, and the donor and use being the same and not in life, the bequest should be held void.

Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 812; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 599; Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 27 L. ed. 897.

Messrs. Gaylord B. Clark & F. B. Clark, Jr., for appellees:

In this country of religious liberty any form or act of worship, or the solemnization of any religious rite or sacrifice, is lawful unless its character and manner of execution be such as would interfere with rights and privileges be-

105, and in Ruppel v. Schlegel, 55 Hun. 188, without referring to Holland v. Alcock, that definite bequests to a definite church or pastor for masses was valid. In the case of Ruppel v. Schlegel, the request for masses was held to be only a suggestion in a general way and was included with other requests.

In Read v. Hodgkins, 7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 17, a bequest of a residue to be expended in masses for the soul of testator was held valid, on the strength of Charitable Donations and Bequests Comrs. v. Walsh, reported in the opinion, decided in 1823, holding that such a bequest was valid.

And in Dillon v. Reilly, 1 R. 10 Eq. 152, a bequest to a clergyman conditioned on saying masses was sustained as a personal gift to the clergyman.

But in Dorrian v. Gilmore, L. R. 15 Ir. 62, it was held that a residuary bequest to be divided between two priests as long as they officiate at K for the purpose of having masses said for testator's soul, was void as a perpetuity, and not for charitable purposes, and not for the benefit of the clergyman, but for the performance of a religious duty, and the court questions the case of Dillon v. Reilly, supra.

This case of Dorrian v. Gilmore, supra, is directly in conflict with Read v. Hodgkins, supra, and now it is very questionable whether such a bequest would be sustained in the Irish courts.

Secret trusts to use for masses.

A devise made absolutely to the devisee, but in reality in connection with a secret trust requiring masses to be said for the testator's soul, are void as superstitious. Rex v. Porington, 1 Bal. 162, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 96.

Or as creating perpetuities. Re O'Hara's Will, 96 N. Y. 403.

And a will with letters intending to be construed all together directing that masses should be said for decedent, was held invalid for want of proper execution. Smart v. Prujean, 6 Ves. Jr. 560. L. T.

longing to other citizens of the commonwealth or be contrary to good morals or the public welfare.

No religious exercise which is not in its conduct a public or private nuisance, or immoral or treasonable in tendency, can be held as illegal; and it cannot be doubted that money given for any such religious purpose is, under American law and American institutions in general, and the constitution of Alabama in particular, a gift or donation for a lawful purpose, whether made to take effect during the lifetime or upon the demise of the donor.

Section 4 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of Alabama declares that "no religion shall be established by law; that no preference shall be given by law to any religious sect, society, denomination, or mode of worship; that no one shall be compelled to attend any place of worship nor to pay any tithes, taxes, or other rate, for building or repairing any place of worship, or for maintaining any minister or ministry; that no religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under this state; and that the civil rights, privileges, and capacities of any citizen shall not be in any manner affected by his religious principles."

Gifts to procure masses to be said for the souls of the dead were condemned by the Statute of Henry VIII., and held void by the common law of England because obnoxious to the doctrines of the "state church," but in America have been sustained as valid trusts irrespective of state statute.

2 Perry, Tr. 715; Beach, Wills, 129.

In Gass v. Wilhite, 3 Dana, 170, 26 Am. Dec. 446, after holding that the trusts under discussion would not since the revolution be obnoxious to the public policy and statutes of England, says: "With much less reason, therefore, could it be denounced here as a superstitious use, where we have no established religion, and where, by our constitution, all religions are viewed as equally orthodox."

It is neither for the legislature nor the judiciary, in this state, to discriminate and say what is a pious, and what is a superstitious use. To do so would necessarily infringe upon the great constitutional guaranty of a perfect freedom and equality in all religions.

In Schouder, Petitioner, in equity for the construction of a will, 184 Mass. 426, the court sustained a similar bequest.

In Re Hagenmeyer's Will, 13 Abb. N. C. 484, the judge said: "It appears to me that such bequests cannot be said to be for superstitious uses when we find that it is one of the articles of the Roman Catholic faith, which has been adopted by millions of people through the civilized world as a part of their religious belief."

In Read v. Hodgins, 7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 17, it was held that the bequest for masses for the testator's soul was valid and not void as a superstitious use.

The opinion in the above case was based upon the decision of Lord Manners in the case of Charitable Donations and Bequests Comrs. v. Walsh, 7 Ir. Eq. 84 note.

In Kehoe v. Kehoe (Ill.) 23 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 656, the trust was created by deed to take effect ante mortem and was for the purpose of procuring masses to be said for the soul of the decedent and for the soul of his mother then also deceased.

The court said, p. 660: "In the United States, where no discrimination is made in law between the professions of any particular religious creeds, where there is an absolutely free toleration of all religious opinions and modes of worship, can any such thing as superstitious use be said to exist? Who is to decide whether or not a use, as connected with the religious belief of the donor, is or is not superstitious? Must it be decided according to the sectarian views of the chancellor?"

In Sibert's App., 18 W. N. C. 276, it was held that a bequest to the pastor of a church for masses for the repose of testator's soul is valid, and that it was the duty of the executors to pay it to the legatee who had full discretion as to the number of masses.

The bequest could not fail because of any inability on the part of the church, as taker, to perform the conditions annexed to the trust in accordance with the ritual of the church. There can therefore be no failure because of the inability of the donee to fully perform its duty according to the exact wishes of the testator.

This court will judicially know that the money appropriated for the so-called purpose of masses in reality is used and expended in the maintenance of the church and its priesthood, and is a source of revenue for the support of the church.

9 International Encyclopedia, p. 565, title Mass.

In the case of Gilman v. McArde, 99 N. Y. 451, speaking of a trust created by contract for the expenditure of money for masses for the soul of the testatrix and her husband according to the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church, of which the testatrix and her husband were members, the court says, p. 460: "There was no indefiniteness about this contract and it was easy of performance. There certainly can be no legal objection to a person contracting in his lifetime for his funeral, his coffin and his monument and even for the solemnization of masses, and paying for them in advance, and if so, what reason can there be for denying him the power of paying a sum of money to a third person on his agreement to procure these things."

This is a legal and pious use and as such can be sustained as a direct trust without regard to the doctrine of charitable uses.

Under English chancery jurisprudence prior to the Statute of Henry VIII., the court did have ample jurisdiction to enforce this as well as other trusts; and moreover, not only was such a trust valid and enforceable in chancery, but its violation was the predicate for a legal distraint or action for damages.

Co. Litt. 95 B, §§ 135, 137.

Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312, fails wholly to sustain appellant's contention in any respect.

Head, J., delivered the opinion of the court: The validity of the bequest brought to our view, in this case, must be upheld, if at all, upon one of three propositions, viz.: (1) That it is a direct bequest to the church for its general uses. (3) That it creates a charitable use. (3) That it creates a valid private trust.

1. The form of the bequest repels the idea that a gift to a church for its own general uses was intended. The bequest is to the church "to be used in solemn masses for the repose of my soul." Similar bequests have been many times before the courts in England and this country, and in all the cases, so far as our research extends, they were treated as having the form and nature of the declaration of a use or trust, and not as direct gifts to, and for the general uses of the church. An application of the fund to other uses than securing masses to be said for the repose of the donor's soul would contravene the intent and purpose of the testator. In England, by statute, as well as the general policy of the law, uses or trusts like this were denounced as superstitions, and held void accordingly. Under our political institutions which maintained and enforced absolute separation of church and state, and the utmost freedom of religious thought and action, there is no place for the English doctrine of superstitious uses, and if such dispositions could be otherwise supported, under recognized rules of law, they would not be assailed here as giving effect to the religious superstitions of the donor. But the authorities, whether English or American, are potent to show that these bequests partake of the nature of trusts, and cannot be treated as gifts to the churches themselves.

2. Charitable uses whether arising out of the English statute of charitable uses, in force, in a qualified sense, in Alabama, or sustained upon the general principles of equity, (Williams v. Pearson, 88 Ala. 307) do not include dispositions of the kind in question. To constitute a charitable use it must confer a public benefit open to an indefinite number of persons. 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 123, 126, 127, 130; 3 Perry, Trusts, 3d ed. §§ 693, 697, 710. In an extended note to the case of Dashiel v. Atty-Gen., 9 Am. Dec. 577, will be found a full disposition of the whole subject, collating the authorities. We need only to refer to what is there said. The bequest in the present case is, according to the religious belief of the testator, for the benefit alone of his own soul, and cannot be upheld as a public charity without offending every principle of law by which such charities are supported.

3. It is not valid as a private trust for the want of a living beneficiary. A trust, in form, with none to enjoy or enforce the use, is no trust. Argument is unnecessary to show that there is no imaginable being possessing power to enforce the use declared in this bequest. The executor cannot do it, for he succeeds only to the property rights of the testator. His powers and functions do not, and cannot extend to the well being of the soul of his testator. As said by appellant's counsel, "if the church should receive this bequest and apply it to paying its debts, repairing its building, supporting its priests and paying the expenses of their ceremonies, the purpose of the bequest would be clearly violated. But what living person is authorized to call the trustee to an account for the misuse of the fund?"

The authorities upon the several propositions discussed will be found in the briefs of counsel which will be reported.

Upon no principle are we able to sustain this bequest. The decree of the chancellor must be reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

Samuel D. FLAGG, Resp't.,

v.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 70 OF BARNES COUNTY, Appt.

(.....N. Dak. ....)

*1. An instrument providing for the payment of exchange on a point other than the place of payment, in addition to principal and interest, is not a negotiable instrument; and one who purchases the same before maturity, for value, and without notice of any defense thereto, nevertheless takes it subject to the defense of want of consideration good as between the original parties to the instrument.

2. Defendant was authorized to issue bonds to fund its outstanding indebtedness in case certain statutory prerequisites were complied with. A record of the proceedings culminating in the decision to issue bonds was to be made in the district, and a certified copy thereof was to be filed with the county clerk, and preserved as a record in his office. It was made the duty of the county clerk to examine such record in his office, and if satisfied, from such examination, that all the requisites of the act with respect to the preliminary proceedings had been complied with, and that the bonds were authorized to be issued as provided for in the act, he was to register the bonds, and indorse upon each of them his certificate in the form prescribed in the statute. The bonds in question were so registered and certified. Held, that a purchaser of such bonds, for value, before maturity, and without notice that any of the conditions of the statute relating to proceedings to authorize the issue of the bonds had not been complied with, could rely upon the certificate of the county clerk as finally settling all such matters, and that the court below did not err in rejecting defendant's offer to prove that such conditions had not been complied with.

NOTE.—As to rights of bona fide purchasers of municipal bonds, see in connection with the above case, Suffolk Sav. Bank v. Boston (Mass.) 4 L. R. A. 516; Hainsburg v. Ryan (Pa.) 4 L. R. A. 536; Brownell v. Greenwich (N. Y.) 4 L. R. A. 635.

3. By an amendment to the act it was provided that no district, in which the title to the school site was not in the school board, should bond its debt until it had obtained such title. But it was declared in such amendment that, after the bonds had been registered and certified, their validity should not be questioned in any tribunal, but should be and remain valid and binding. Held, that this provision made it the duty of the county clerk to pass upon this question of title before registering and certifying the bonds, and that, therefore, his decision, evidenced by registering and certifying the bonds, that such condition as to title to the school site has been complied with, was final on the point, as against the district, in favor of one who purchased the bonds in good faith, for value, without notice that this condition had not been complied with.

4. The right of a bona fide purchaser of municipal bonds to rely upon a recital or certificate as to facts which the person making the same had authority to determine does not depend upon the bond being a negotiable instrument. It exists in the case of a bona fide purchaser of a non-negotiable bond as well.

5. The statute declared that a committee should audit the claims against the district, and determine the amount of indebtedness to be funded. Held that the auditing by the committee of claims against the district, and the vote of the district to bond to pay such claims, and the issue of bonds accordingly, would preclude an inquiry as to the validity of such claims as a consideration for such bonds, as against a bona fide purchaser of such bonds; that, as against such purchaser, the district could not show, to prove a want of consideration between the original parties, that the bonds were in fact paid for by the one to whom they were originally issued by the district, by the surrender of void claims held by him against the district, provided such claims had in fact been audited and canceled, and bonds voted and issued under the provisions of the statute.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Barnes County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of interest coupons which had been attached to certain bonds issued by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. G. K. Andrus, for appellant:

Is the recital of the county clerk on the back of these bonds sufficient to estop the district from now setting up that these conditions had not been complied with?

The recital simply says that this bond is issued in accordance with law and by authority of the majority of the legal voters of said district.

When the holder relies upon a recital, the recital must be clear and unambiguous.

An instrument may be a promissory note although payable with exchange on New York. At one time, only bills of exchange were negotiable. Promissory notes and bonds were not, but in modern times the old rules have been relaxed.

In Leggett v. Jones, 10 Wis. 84, it is said: "We have no doubt such instruments have everywhere been treated as commercial paper, both by the business world and by the courts." See also Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 28 A.

Corliss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Judgment has been recovered and entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant upon interest coupons of certain bonds issued by defendant. The appeal is from such judgment. The court below directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and it was upon this verdict that the judgment was entered.

Among other errors assigned is one based upon the refusal of the trial court to allow the defendant to prove that the bonds in question were issued without consideration. It cannot be doubted that a want of consideration would have constituted a perfect defense to the bonds in the hands of the original taker. But it is urged that the plaintiff is a bona fide holder, for value, before maturity, of the bonds, and their interest coupons. As a matter of fact, this contention of the plaintiff is fully sustained by the record; but he can derive no protection therefrom unless the bonds or coupons are negotiable instruments, within the rule which entitles the bona fide purchaser of such paper to protection, as against defenses to the same in the hands of the original holder. Are the bonds or the coupons negotiable instruments? If not, we must reverse the judgment, and allow the defendant to make proof, if it can, of its defense of want of consideration. The only provision in the bonds and coupons which it is claimed affects their standing as negotiable instruments is that they shall be paid at St. Paul, Minn., with New York exchange. The rule is familiar to all that the amount to be paid must be certain,—must be ascertainable from the face of the instrument, and from the law which governs the contract. No resort to extrinsic evidence is allowed. Our statute establishes no different rule. "A negotiable instrument is a written promise or request for the payment of a certain sum of money to order or bearer in conformity to the provisions of this article." Comp. Laws, § 4456. That the provision that the maker, in addition to the sum specified, shall pay an indefinite sum, called "exchange," renders it impossible to ascertain how much money is needed to extinguish the obligation at maturity, without resort to evidence of a fact outside of the paper, cannot admit of a moment's doubt. No court has ever challenged the truth of this proposition. But it is insisted by those courts which uphold the negotiability of instruments embracing such a provision that the amount to be paid is substantially certain; that it can be readily ascertained, as it is fixed by the rate of exchange among bankers the day the paper falls due; that the amount of the exchange is usually very small; and that the spirit of the rule requiring certainty is therefore not violated by this exception to the letter of the rule. Indeed, it is asserted that the provision amounts to no more, in effect, than a requirement that the paper be paid at the place on which exchange is to be paid. The argument is made that, when the maker is called upon to pay exchange on a specified place, he is really compelled to do no more than pay out the same sum to satisfy the obligation that he would be forced to pay had it been payable, without exchange, at the place on which the exchange is to be paid. This reasoning is fallacious. There is a marked difference, both to debtor and creditor, with respect to the amount to be paid and received, between cases where the paper is payable at one place, with exchange on another, and cases where the paper is payable, without exchange, at the last-named place. Suppose, when the money is payable in this state, the creditor wishes to use the money here. He is doubly benefited by the provision to pay here, with New York exchange. Had the paper been payable in New York, without exchange, he might be compelled to pay exchange on some western point, to bring the money to this state. But by having it paid here he saves this sum, and, in addition, places in his pocket the amount of New York exchange paid him by the debtor. In times of great financial fright, like those through which we have been passing, the difference might be equal to a considerable sum. Nor is the effect the same upon the debtor. Should his money be in New York, he must pay the costs of bringing it west, and also pay the creditor the further cost of sending it back, although the creditor may not desire it remitted, whereas, had the debt been payable in New York, without exchange, he would have saved both of the items of exchange.

But even if it should be conceded that the effect, in dollars and cents, would be the same to both parties, under all circumstances, it would not follow that the courts would be justified in ingrafting this exception upon the law merchant. An agreement to pay a sum of money equivalent to the market price of a specified amount of a certain commodity at a particular time and place is, in its effect upon the parties, the same as an agreement in terms to pay that sum of money. But it would not be seriously urged that the former agreement would constitute a negotiable instrument. It would not be negotiable, because resort would have to be had to extrinsic evidence to settle the amount due, whereas, in the case where that amount (although precisely the same) is fixed by the terms of the paper, certainty exists upon the very face of the contract itself. It is this certainty which the lawmerchant requires. To ingraft upon this rule the exception contended for by respondent would be open to serious objections. In analogous cases, there would be no escape from further modification of the doctrine requiring certainty. When once the strict letter of the rule is departed from, the business world is wholly at sea. No one can tell in advance what other analogous provisions, introducing uncertainty into the contract, will be disregarded, as not falling within the spirit of the rule. The spirit of the rule is too vague and intangible for the guidance of business conduct. The commercial world needs, and must have, the certainty of the rule itself, in its plain interpretation. When a departure from its strict letter is once tolerated, the whole subject is removed from the realm of simplicity and certainty, and transferred to the domain of construction, confusion, and doubt. What the business world needs with reference to such matters is not so much a rule based upon principle as a rule simple, definite, and permanently fixed. All these elements will be destroyed by the adoption of the exception that resort may be had to outside evidence to fix the amount of exchange, without affecting the negotiability of the instrument providing for the payment of exchange. And what need is there for an exception? What great benefit will accrue to the commercial world from its adoption? It is said that the business world has practically agreed that the words "with exchange" do not destroy the negotiability of the paper containing them. But it is not within the power of the people to modify or abrogate by usage a settled rule of law. The people must change fixed rules by legislation. It is by no means certain that there is a consensus of opinion on this subject. In the eastern states there will doubtless be found many who would take issue with those who assert that such paper is negotiable. But there is no need for this usage.

The only theory upon which the creditor can justify inserting a provision for the payment of exchange is that he desires the money remitted to the point specified, to be used by him there. To insert a provision for exchange for any other purpose would be requiring the payment of something which the creditor cannot, in fairness, exact. All he can justly demand is the principal and interest. If he is paid more, it is to enable him to remit the money, or to have it remitted, without expense to himself. In other words, it is contracted for and received by him that he may receive in full the amount of principal and interest at the place on which exchange is paid, without diminution because of being compelled to pay such exchange himself. The creditor can always accomplish this purpose by specifying in the contract, as the place of payment, the place to which he desires the money remitted. He will still receive the full sum, without deduction for exchange, as the debtor must pay it there; and the instrument will not be open to the objection that it is not negotiable, by reason of the fact that the exact sum to be paid cannot be ascertained without resort to extrinsic evidence. If, as has been stated, there is a large amount of paper in the market, containing a provision for the payment of exchange, which is regarded and is being treated by business men as negotiable paper, those who so believe and act are not entitled to have the law strained to protect them, for they must have known that such a provision did in fact introduce into the contract an element of uncertainty, and they also were bound to know that many cases treated such paper as not negotiable. Moreover, most of such paper will be paid or renewed, or be in some way disposed of, in a few months, and in transactions entered into subsequently to this decision the people can conform to the elementary rule that certainty must appear upon the face of the paper. We are asked to protect the few holders of such paper to which there may be some defense good as between the original parties. That we may do this, we are requested to take from the rule that which, above all other elements, renders it beneficial to the commercial world,—its simplicity and certainty. It is said that the amount of exchange is very small. But the amount is uncertain, within the meaning of the rule, whether a dime or a dollar is to be added to the sum by extrinsic proof. If the amount of the exchange is to determine the negotiability of paper containing provision for exchange, some of it would, and some of it would not, be negotiable, for there are times when that amount of exchange is much more than nominal. To escape such a dilemma the courts must hold that where the uncertain sum to be so added is equivalent to many dollars, as was frequently the case during the past summer, paper is nevertheless negotiable, within the rule which requires certainty upon the face of the paper as to the amount to be paid. Many cases support the view expressed in this opinion. Windsor Sav. Bank v. McMahon, 88 Fed. Rep. 268; Love v. Bliss, 24 Ill. 168, 76 Am. Dec. 749; Hughitt v. Johnson, 28 Fed. Rep. 865; Read v. McNulty, 12 Rich. L. 445, 78 Am. Dec. 467; Carroll County Sav. Bank of Uniontown v. Strother, 28 S. C. 504; Palmer v. Fahnstock, 9 U. C. P. 172; Santon v.

Russell*, 1 McArth. 268; Fitchharris v. Leggatt, 10 Mo. App. 529; Christian County Bank v. Goode, 44 Mo. App. 129; Cass v. Kirk, 4 Allen (N. B.) 548; Nash v. Gibbon, Id. 479.

An agreement to pay the principal sum and interest, and in addition the cost of sending the money to New York by express, would have been more definite, because those charges remain fixed for a long period, and there would have been certainty from the outset how much money it would take to pay the debt. But, as exchange may vary from day to day, the amount to be paid therefor is uncertain, down to the very day of payment. Yet no one would contend that an instrument containing a provision for the payment of the cost of sending the money to New York by express would be negotiable. While it would have been practically certain from the start how much money it would take to comply with the contract, the certainty would have resulted, not from an inspection of the contract alone, but from the evidence of an extrinsic fact, not liable to change, which, however, must be proved, the same as any other extrinsic fact, by evidence outside of the paper. An agreement to pay exchange between points in this country, where the money standard is the same throughout, is only an agreement to pay for the cheaper mode of remitting funds, resulting from the more refined and complex system under which financial transactions are carried on.

We are aware that there are decisions opposed to our view. In Michigan it was held by a divided court that such instruments are negotiable. Smith v. Kendall, 9 Mich. 242, 80 Am. Dec. 88. The dissenting opinion of Judge Campbell is much more satisfactory to our minds than the prevailing opinion. In the latter case of Johnson v. Frisbie, 15 Mich. 286, it is evident that the judges did not intend to express their views upon the question, as an original one, both from the language of the opinion in that case, and from the fact that Judge Campbell, who had so strongly dissented in the first case, wrote the opinion in the second. This opinion merely states that the law was settled by a majority of the court in the prior case, and we have therefore no means of ascertaining from the case of Johnson v. Frisbie what Judge Cooley's views were on the question, looking at it from the standpoint of principle and business expediency. In a late case in that state (Cayuga Nat. Bank of Auburn v. Purdy, 56 Mich. 6), that court has held a note to be non-negotiable which contains a provision for exchange in connection with a provision for the payment of expenses of collecting if sued upon, and further provisions waiving exemptions, and increasing the rate of interest, if not paid at maturity. These three last-named provisions have been held by many authorities (although there is conflict) not to destroy the negotiability. The case may, therefore,—and in some jurisdictions must,—have turned on the question whether the prevision for the payment of exchange destroyed its negotiability. The court said: "The modern tendency to interpolate into such instruments engagements and stipulations not recognized by the lawmerchant, affecting the certainty as to the amount due and payable thereon, or the time of maturity, or superadding duties to be performed by the maker of additional obligations, other than the payment of a sum certain at maturity, should be discountenanced, and held to destroy their negotiability, and deprive them of the character of promissory notes, and they should be relegated to the domain of ordinary contracts." In neither of the Wisconsin cases was the question involved. In the later case of Morgan v. Edwards, 58 Wis. 599, 40 Am. Rep. 781, there is a statement that what was said by the court in the former case (Leggett v. Jones, 10 Wis. 85) on the point was obiter; and while the court, in the later case, reiterates the former dictum in even stronger language, it is nevertheless the fact that in neither case did the court settle the question authoritatively, as one necessarily involved. In Bradley v. Lill, 4 Biss. 478, Fed. Cas. No. 1,788, the reasoning of the learned judge is clearly unsound. The opinion exemplifies the truth of the common observation that the use of an illustration is often a dangerous mode of enforcing a point. He likens the case of a note payable with exchange to one payable, with interest, in England, and sued on in New York. He asserts that in the latter case the note would be negotiable. But the court, he says, must, in such case, take proof of an extrinsic fact to fix the amount of interest. The answer to this sophistry lies so plainly on the surface that it is hardly necessary to state it here. The note, in the case put by way of illustration, is negotiable because in England, where it is payable, the amount of interest is ascertainable by an inspection of the note itself. Nothing is uncertain or extrinsic, which the note and the law disclose and establish. The suit being brought, in the case put by way of illustration, in a foreign country, the court must have proof of the laws of the country where the note was payable, to ascertain the rate of interest, because such laws are not judicially noticed; but when the proof is made the court ascertains the amount due, from the face of the note and the terms of the statute, without further evidence. And in England, by whose laws the rate of interest is fixed, and where the note was payable, there has at all times been an absolute certainty as to the amount needed to pay the note at maturity. The test is whether the amount due is certain from the face of the paper at the time and place of payment. Suing on the instrument in a foreign country cannot destroy its negotiability. The only discussion of this question, in favor of the view that such paper is negotiable, which is worthy of that name, is to be found in the opinion of Judge Mitchell in Hastings v. Thompson, 54 Minn. 184, 21 L. R. A. 178. It embodies all that can be said on that side of the question. It is a position not utterly destitute of strength, but, for the reasons we have already stated, we do not regard it as tenable. It is to be regretted that the federal supreme court has not passed upon the point. There should be only one rule for the nation, and it is to be hoped that, whatever conclusion is ultimately reached by that court, it will be adopted in all of the states. In this circuit it is settled by the decision of Judge (now Mr. Justice) Brewer, in the case of Hughitt v. Johnson, 28 Fed. Rep. 865, that such paper is not negotiable. Had this suit been instituted in the United States circuit court for this district, that court would have applied and enforced this rule. Therefore, for us to establish a different doctrine would make the rights of the parties depend upon the court in which the action should be brought. While the decision which we have cited from Pennsylvania (Philadelphia Bank v. Newkirk, 2 Miles [Pa.] 443) is a decision of the district court, it is quite evident what views the supreme court of the state would entertain on the question, should it come before that tribunal. In Woods v. North, 84 Pa. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 201, that court said that "it was a necessary quality of negotiable paper that it should be simple, certain, unconditional,—not subject to any contingency. It would be a mere affectation of learning to cite the elementary treatises and the decided cases which have established this principle. It is very important to the commercial community that it should be maintained with all its rigor." In a recent case in the same court this language is quoted with approval. Iron City Nat. Bank v. McCord, 139 Pa. 52, 11 L. R. A. 559.

A majority of this court holds that the bonds and coupons were not negotiable, and were therefore open to the defense of want of consideration. Hence, it was error for the court to exclude the evidence offered to substantiate this defense. The chief justice, who agrees with me, rests his decision upon the terms of our statute. Comp. Laws, §§ 4456, 4462.

It is claimed that the court erred in another particular: The defendant offered to prove that the land on which the school building for which the bonds in suit were issued was situated was not owned by the defendant, or its school board; that it had never been conveyed to the district, or its school board; that proceedings to condemn it as a school site had never been instituted; and that it was, in fact, the property of a third person. This offer was rejected. Would these facts have constituted a defense? The act under which defendant derived its authority to execute bonds is a special act, and is not to be found in the printed volumes. It was approved March 13, 1885. On the same day the act was amended, and in this amendment it was expressly provided that the indebtedness of no school district mentioned in the original act should be bonded until the land on which the school building was located should have been conveyed, by good and sufficient warranty deed, to the school board of such district, or the title to it should have been obtained by the school board by proper condemnation in the manner provided by law. The existence of this fact of ownership of the site on which the school building was situated was a condition precedent to the existence of any power to issue bonds. Until this fact existed, the district was as powerless to bond as if no statute on the subject had been passed.

The only possible escape of the plaintiff from this conclusion is by invoking another doctrine,—the doctrine of estoppel from recitals in the bond, or in a certificate attached to it. Upon each bond was indorsed a certificate signed by the county clerk certifying that such bond "is issued in accordance with law, and by authority of a majority of the legal voters of said district present and voting at an election duly held May 11, 1885, for that purpose, and is duly registered in this office." We will assume at first that this certificate is in terms broad enough to embrace the fact that the title to the school site was in the school board. The question then arises whether this fact is such a fact as the county clerk had authority to investigate, and settle by his certificate, so as to preclude an inquiry with respect to the same, as against a bona fide purchaser of the bonds. This doctrine rests upon legislative intent. Did the legislature intend to commit the determination of certain facts to the judgment of the officer making the certificate, or the officers issuing the bonds, where the facts are recited in the body of the bond, so that purchasers of such bonds might rely upon such certificate or recital? As we said in Cole v. Dwight School Twp. (N. Dak.) 55 N. W. Rep. 587, 591, "It is not necessary that the power to determine these facts should have been expressly conferred upon the district officers by statute." And in that connection we added in that case (quoting with approval) the language of Mr. Justice Brewer in Bernards Twp. v. Morrison, 188 U. S. 523, 33 L. ed. 726: "It is enough that full control in the matter is given to the officers named." We stand by this statement of the rule, but the language of section 6 does not bring this case within its purview. The county clerk derives his power to make the certificate upon the bonds from section 6 of the statute. But, as a consideration of section 5 is essential to a right understanding of section 6, we quote them both in full:

"Sec. 5. No bond shall be issued under this act until the question of issuing the same shall be first submitted to a vote of the district at a school meeting called for that purpose of which school meeting at least ten days' notice shall be given by notices posted in at least three public and conspicuous places in said districts, stating the time and place of meeting and that the said meeting is for the purpose of auditing and settling the indebtedness of said district and issuing bonds to provide for the payment thereof. The notice of such meeting may be signed by any member of the school board or in case of the absence of all the members of the school board or their inability, refusal or neglect to sign the same, by three resident electors of such district; provided that no meeting shall be called for such purpose until the district school board shall have been petitioned therefor in writing by at least one third of the resident electors; a majority of the legal voters present and voting at such meeting shall first appoint a committee of three from their number, resident freeholders and possessing other qualifications of electors of the district, to audit and settle the indebtedness of the district. Said committee shall at once cause notice to be given of their appointment, and shall in said notice set a time during which the outstanding indebtedness shall be presented to them. Said time shall not be less than thirty days nor more than ninety days, and said notice shall be published in some newspaper of general circulation published in each of the counties of Barnes and Griggs and shall also set forth the time when the committee will make a full report of their duties to the electors of such district, whereupon the electors shall meet at such time and place to receive said report and submit the question of the issuing of bonds to provide for the payment of the indebtedness as audited and settled, and the auditing or settling by said committee shall not be in any manner construed to be binding on said district or be construed as an admission of the legality of any claim or alleged claim against said district, and no bonds shall be issued until the claims for which they are issued shall be delivered up and canceled, and a full record shall be kept of all of the proceedings of said meeting, and the acts of said committee and of the vote cast in the names of all of the persons who voted at said meeting and shall be preserved as a record in the district, and a certified copy of such record shall be filed with the county clerk which shall be kept in his office as a public record. The ballots in favor of or opposed thereto shall contain the words respectively 'For issuing bonds' and 'Against issuing bonds' and if a majority of all the votes cast be in favor of issuing bonds, the school board shall forthwith proceed to issue bonds to the amount of the indebtedness as audited and settled and running for such length of time as shall be determined by the further vote of the resident voters present within the limits prescribed by this act. Sec. 6. Before said bonds are issued, sold or disposed of, they shall be presented to the county clerk, and the said county clerk shall carefully examine the notices of election and the proof of posting or publishing the same, and shall also carefully examine all returns of the election and all proceedings of said committee and of said district meetings, and the settlement, auditing and vote authorizing the issuance of said bonds, which examination shall be made from the records filed in his office, as provided for in the preceding section, and if satisfied therefrom that such bonds are authorized to be issued, as provided for in this act, and the claims for which they are issued are delivered up and canceled, he shall, in a book kept for that purpose, preserve a registry of each bond, showing in separate columns and entries, the number of the school districts issuing a bond, the denomination thereof, the date of issue and other facts, and upon each bond shall endorse the following certificate: I hereby certify that the within bond for ——— dollars of school district number ——— county, territory of Dakota, is issued in accordance with law, and by authority of a majority of the legal voters of said district present and voting at an election duly held —, 188—, for that purpose, and is duly registered in this office. The blanks shall be filled according to the fact, and the certificate officially signed by the county clerk and attested by the seal of the county."

It will be noticed that the county clerk is not given full control of the matter by section 6. He is merely to settle the questions whether the provisions of section 5 have been complied with. That he has nothing, under the terms of section 6, to do with the determination of the question whether the school board has title to the school site, is apparent from the fact that that matter is not referred to in section 5; from the further fact that his decision is to be based upon the examination of a certified copy of the record of the proceedings referred to in section 5, which requires such record to be kept; and from the still further fact that, at the time section 6 was passed, section 15 had not been amended, and therefore the law did not at that time contain any provision requiring the ownership of the school site, as a condition precedent to the power to issue bonds. It is thus made apparent that the county clerk was given no authority over this matter by section 6; that no decision touching it was committed to his judgment by that section. Under such circumstances, it is too clear to justify further argument that, under the language of section 6, his certificate constitutes no estoppel. The public has no more right to rely upon it, so far as this matter was concerned, than the certificate of any utter stranger. We are not without express authority upon this point. Coffin v. Kearney County Comrs. 57 Fed. Rep. 143; German Sav. Bank of Davenport, Iowa v. Franklin County, Ill. 128 U. S. 526-540, 32 L. ed. 519-525; Lake County Comrs. v. Graham, 180 U. S. 674, 32 L. ed. 1065; Northern Nat. Bank of Toledo v. Porter Twp. Trustees, 110 U. S. 608, 28 L. ed. 258; Kelly v. Milan, 21 Fed. Rep. 842; National Bank of Commerce v. Granada, 54 Fed. Rep. 100; McClure v. Oxford Twp. 94 U. S. 429, 24 L. ed. 129; Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 83, 28 L. ed. 360; Brown v. Bon Homme County, 1 S. Dak. 216. In this last case the court said: "There were no recitals in these bonds of the existence of any fact which the chairman and clerk of the board were authorized to ascertain and determine." In Dixon County v. Field, the court said: "If the officers authorized to issue bonds upon condition are not the appointed tribunal to decide the fact which constitutes the condition, then recital will not be accepted as a substitute for proof. In other words, where the validity of the bonds depends upon an estoppel claimed to arise upon the recital of the instrument,—the question being as to the existence of the power to issue them,—it is necessary to establish that the officers executing the bonds had lawful authority to make the recitals, and to make them conclusive. The very ground of the estoppel is the recitals and the official statements of those to whom the law refers the public for authentic and final information on the subject."

Nor could there have been any hardship in requiring those dealing with the bonds to ascertain whether the district had title to the school site before issuing the bonds. This title, whether under deed or condemnation proceedings, would ordinarily be a matter of public record. We do not think, however, within the meaning of the cases holding that an assessment roll must be examined despite recitals in the bonds, that the bona fide purchasers of these bonds bought at their peril, if the legislature has given the county clerk authority to determine this question, and embody his decision in his certificate. These cases relate to facts which are necessarily matters of record: Sutliff v. Lake County Comrs. 147 U. S. 230, 37 L. ed. 145; Lake County Comrs. v. Graham, 180 U. S. 674-682, 32 L. ed. 1065-1067; Chaffee County Comrs. v. Potter, 149 U. S. 355-363, 35 L. ed. 1040-1043; Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 83-92, 28 L. ed. 360-363; Nesbit v. Riverside Independent Dist. 144 U. S. 610, 36 L. ed. 563; Francis v. Howard County, 50 Fed. Rep. 44; Citizens Bank of Texarkana v. Terrell, 78 Tex. 450; Nolan County v. State, 88 Tex. 183. But the title to the school site might be in the school board by an unrecorded deed.

We now come to a provision in the amendment to the act which, in our judgment, requires us to hold that the county clerk's certificate was broad enough to include the fact of title, and that it was the purpose of the legislature to make this certificate final on this point, so far as innocent purchasers were concerned. That amendment, after providing, among other things, that the title must be in the school board before bonds can be issued, declares that "the validity and obligation of any school bond registered and certified as herein provided . . . shall not be questioned in any tribunal, but every such bond shall be and remain binding." While this does not, in terms, vest in the county clerk the power, or make it his duty, to investigate and determine this question of title, the language can have no effect unless it be so construed. It is not necessary that the power to decide and settle such matters be vested in the officer, in express terms. Burroughs, Public Securities, p. 821; Coler v. Dwight School Twp. (N. Dak.) 55 N. W. Rep. 587; Bernards Twp. v. Morrison, 133 U. S. 523, 33 L. ed. 726. After the bond is registered and certified in the manner prescribed by the statute, this question of title is no longer open to litigation, as against bona fide purchasers. It was therefore the duty of the county clerk to investigate this matter before registering the bonds and making the certificate. A threatened violation of this duty could have been restrained by injunction, and the district protected. This provision clearly gives the county clerk full control over the matter with respect to the question of title, as well as regards the matters specified in sections 5 and 6. Where the statute declares that the validity of a bond shall not be questioned after it has been certified by an officer to have been issued in accordance with law, and that same law provides what is essential to the validity of such bond,—i. e. that the district issuing should own its school site,—it does not admit of doubt, in the judgment of the court, that such officer, by necessary implication, is vested with the power to decide such matter, and that it is his duty to decide such matter, before making the certificate. Says Burroughs in his work on Public Securities: "The power of the officer to determine whether such conditions have been complied with need not be expressed; it being deduced from the provisions of the statute, and the supposed necessity of the case, that such questions must be determined before the issue of the bonds." Page 821. That the power to decide questions, and thereby estop the municipality, need not be expressly conferred, is clear from other authorities. Judge Dillon says it is sufficient "if, upon a true construction of the legislative enactment conferring the authority, the corporation, or certain officers, or a given tribunal, are invested with power to decide whether the condition precedent has been complied with." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 528. In Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 484, 23 L. ed. 579, it is said that the rule of estoppel by recitals applies "where it may be gathered from the legislative enactment that the officers of the municipality were invested with power to decide whether the condition precedent has been complied with." In few, if any, of the cases, has there been an express delegation of the power to decide whether conditions precedent to the exercise of power existed, or had been complied with. "It is not necessary that the power to determine these facts should have been expressly conferred upon the district officers by the statute." Coler v. Dwight School Twp. (N. Dak.) 55 N. W. Rep. 587-591. In Coffin v. Kearney County Comrs., 57 Fed. Rep. 143, the court said that the recitals, to estop the municipality, must relate to matters of fact "which it may fairly be presumed that the officers of the municipality were left to determine."

It has been urged that to construe the provisions in the amendment that the bonds shall not be questioned in any tribunal after they have been certified or registered by the county clerk as giving the county clerk authority to settle the question of school site would defeat the amendment. The proposition is not sound. The amendment was made to withhold from a district, which did not own its school site when the act was passed, power to bond its floating indebtedness until it has secured such title. Because the county clerk can decide whether in fact it had such title does not take away this restriction upon its power. The county clerk, it is to be presumed, will do his duty. Ordinarily, this presumption accords with the fact. Here is a complete check upon the illegal issue of bonds. The county clerk, doing his duty, refuses to certify and register the bonds, because the district has no title to the site, and they, therefore, cannot be issued. Will the power to decide this question defeat the amendment, in such a case? Again, suppose the county clerk is corrupt, or is deceived. Have not the taxpayers the right to enjoin the illegal issue of bonds? The style of reasoning which we have been answering would in every case defeat the effect of a recital as an estoppel. The argument would invariably be that to hold that it created an estoppel would abrogate the restrictions upon the power to issue bonds, or sweep away the conditions essential to the existence of such power.

Unless we construe this declaration as relating to the question of title to the school site, it is an idle provision in the statute. If it refers to any such defenses as are shut out by the certificate of the county clerk,—i. e. those arising under section 5,—then it is merely declaratory of a settled rule of common law, which would have been just as operative without the declaration as with it. Before this clause was enacted, such defenses were foreclosed by the county clerk's certificate. Why, then, enact it, if that was the only purpose in enacting it? That the legislature did not intend to enact a meaningless provision is apparent from the fact that in the act, as it was originally adopted before amended, no such provision is found. It was unnecessary. The common law declared that, as to matters which were expressly intrusted to the clerk for decision, his decision was final. But in the amendment a new condition is introduced. With respect to this the clerk had not already been given authority to determine whether it had been fulfilled. If his certificate was to settle this question as to good-faith purchasers, some declaration to that effect would be necessary. The common-law rule would not apply, for without such declaration the clerk would have no power to decide this question. Hence, if a good-faith purchaser was to be protected with respect to this question, it became necessary to declare so in the amendment itself; and what declaration could be more comprehensive than that which makes the certificate of the clerk final as to the validity of the bond? This declaration was not made in the statute, as originally framed and passed, when it could have no effect. It was made for the first time in the amendment, when it could have some effect, i. e. the effect we have given it, to foreclose the defense that the district had no title to the school site when the bonds were issued. And yet we are asked to strip it of all significance. We are asked to limit, and further limit, its broad meaning, until it shall mean only what it was unnecessary for the legislature to declare. The construction which we place upon this provision is in harmony with the language in which it is couched. It recognizes that the legislature intended to make a declaration which would have some effect, and it is sustained by the general trend of legislation in such cases, which is almost uniformly in the direction of having all questions as to conditions precedent settled by some officer or tribunal, that a good-faith purchaser may rely thereon without being compelled to investigate, at remote points, questions that are more or less difficult of ready solution. It may be true that the comprehensive significance of the language of the amendment must have some limitation,— that all defenses will not be foreclosed by the county clerk's certificate. But because the clause must be limited in its meaning is no reason why it should be so limited as to render it an idle provision. It can be restricted in its operation so as not to violate any constitutional provision, and yet be construed to embrace the defense that no title to the school site had vested in the district when the bonds were issued.

It cannot be said that the district was without power to bond until it had acquired title to the school site, in any other sense than it would have been without power to bond had it owned its school site, but had taken no proceedings under section 5 to obtain a popular vote on the question of issuing bonds. In both cases, after the law had been complied with, the power would be derived from the statute. After a district had obtained title to its school site, no new enactment would be necessary to vest it with power to issue bonds. The act confers the power on the performance of several conditions precedent. Among these conditions is the one requiring the district to own its school site. But it is no more a condition precedent to the exercise of power than a popular vote on the question of issuing bonds. It applies to all districts within the statute, just as the requirements of section 5 do. In all districts there must be a compliance with section 5, and also with the amendment as to title to the school site, to confer power upon the district to issue bonds. The issue of bonds without complying with section 5 would be just as illegal as the issue thereof without complying with the condition as to title to the school site. The language of the amendment is that the indebtedness shall not be bonded "until" the district has acquired title to its school site.

The issue of bonds without a popular vote could be restrained, the same as an issue thereof without obtaining title to the school site. In either case the bonds would be illegal, would be issued without authority, and would be void in the hands of those who were not in position to rely upon recitals in or on the bonds. If it was competent for the legislature to authorize the county clerk to estop the district by recitals in one case, it was also competent for them to vest the same power in him in the other case. We are therefore brought back, directly and inevitably, to the inquiry whether such power was intended to be vested in the county clerk as to the fact of ownership of the school site. Nor would we reach any different conclusion, could we see any distinction between a condition precedent in the nature of a popular vote and a condition precedent of a different character.

There are many cases to be found where the municipality has been held to be estopped by recitals, although the bonds were in fact issued in the very face of statutory prohibition, or where there has been a positive restriction on the power to issue them in excess of a certain percentage of the assessed valuation of the property of the municipality, or to issue them for so large an amount that the levy of a tax of a certain per cent would not suffice to pay the annual interest thereon. Chafes County Comrs. v. Potter, 143 U. S. 868, 85 L. ed. 1048; Marcy v. Oswego Twp. 92 U. S. 637, 28 L. ed. 748; Humboldt Twp. v. Long, 92 U. S. 642, 85 L. ed. 752. These cases hold that, although the bonds are issued in excess of the power of the municipality (issued for an amount forbidden by statute), the municipality will be estopped, by recitals made by a person or body having power to determine the question, from setting up such want of power,—from showing that the prohibitions of the law have been violated. These cases go far beyond the necessities of the case, for they were cases where there was such an utter want of power that a new act of the legislature would have been necessary to confer it, whereas in this case the power had been conferred subject to the performance of a condition precedent,—i. e. the acquiring of title to the school site,—and no new act was needed to make perfect the power after this condition had been complied with. On principle, these cases are sound. To the extent that the legislature can dispense with certain conditions,—can give unrestricted power,—it may authorize some one to decide finally whether the restrictions it imposes have been observed, so that innocent holders of the bonds may be protected. If the legislature has the power in this particular case to delegate to a person, officer, or board the authority to decide whether the facts exist which warrant the issue of valid bonds, and does in fact delegate such power, the certificate of such person, officer, or board estops the municipality from asserting the invalidity of such bonds, or all such matters of fact which the legislature could and did intrust to such person, officer, or board for decision. The certificate does not, in terms, state that the facts as to title to the school site are such as to warrant the issuing of bonds; but the form of certificate used is the precise form designated by the statute, and it is that certificate which the statute, in effect, declares shall preclude inquiry into the question of title, as well as other matters. But, independent of this consideration, there would be much force in the contention that the language would be broad enough to embrace all facts submitted to the officer for decision. He certifies, not only as to the fact that a majority of the legal voters voted for the issue of bonds, but also that the bond "is issued in accordance with law." Without discussing or attempting to settle this point, we refer to some authorities bearing upon it. Levis v. Barbour County Comrs. 105 U. S. 789, 26 L. ed. 998; Comanche County Comrs. v. Lewis, 138 U. S. 198, 33 L. ed. 604; Bernards Twp. v. Morrison, 133 U. S. 523, 33 L. ed. 736; Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147, 27 L. ed. 481; Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 83, 28 L. ed. 360; Moultrie County v. Rockingham Ten Cent Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 631, 28 L. ed. 681; Marcy v. Oswego Twp. 92 U. S. 637, 28 L. ed. 748; Knox County Comrs. v. Aspinwall, 62 U. S. 21 How. 589, 16 L. ed. 203; Coler v. Dwight School Twp. (N. Dak.) 55 N. W. Rep. 587-591.

Some cases appear to hold that a mere recital that the bond was issued in pursuance of a particular statute is a sufficient recital of performance of all the conditions precedent prescribed by the statute. See Bernards Trp. v. Morrison, 133 U. S. 523, 33 L. ed. 726; Montclair v. Ramadell, 107 U. S. 147, 27 L. ed. 481; Knox County Comrs. v. Aspinwall, 62 U. S. 21 How. 539, 16 L. ed. 208. We used language in Culer v. Dwight School Trp. (N. Dak.) 55 N. W. Rep. 587-591, indicating that such a recital would be sufficient to estop the municipality. What was said there was not necessary to the decision of the case, and the writer of this opinion in fact intended to say that a recital that the bond was issued in conformity with a particular statute would be a sufficient recital that all the terms of the statute had been complied with, so far as the officer making the statement had power to pass upon such questions. It might with much force be urged that a bare recital that the bond was issued in pursuance of a particular act would constitute no more than a mere reference to the law under which the bond was issued, and not a declaration that the terms of that law had been complied with. If such construction were to be placed upon these words, there would be nothing to estop the municipality, except the mere fact of issuing the bonds. This is not sufficient to render the municipality liable, against proof that the conditions of the statute have not been complied with. Lake County Comrs. v. Graham, 130 U. S. 674, 33 L. ed. 1063; Buchanan v. Litchfield, 103 U. S. 278, 26 L. ed. 188; Carroll County Suprs. v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 517; Marsh v. Fulton County Comrs. 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 676, 19 L. ed. 1040. In order that no one may be misled by your inadvertent language in that case, we have decided it best to make this explanation. We leave this question open to discussion whenever it arises, expressing no opinion upon it.

It is not necessary, to estop the defendant, that the certificate should be that of an officer of the municipality issuing the bonds. This power may be vested in any officer or body. Burroughs, Public Securities, p. 321; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (8d ed.) § 528. But it seemed to be intimated on the argument that, the negotiability of such bonds being destroyed by the provision for exchange, they did not come within the rule of estoppel by recitals. If this view is sound, then the defendant would not be estopped by the certificate of the county clerk, as a majority of the cases have concluded that the bonds are not negotiable. But we are clear that there is no connection between the two doctrines. The municipality is estopped by recitals on the ground that, for the convenience of the business world, the legislature has designated some one who shall settle the question whether the law has been complied with in certain particulars. Persons who pay value, who act in good faith, and have no notice that there was any failure to comply with the statute, have the right to rely upon the decision of the person to whom the legislature has for that purpose intrusted the decision of such matters. The estoppel depends, not upon the form of the security, but upon the facts that the person was authorized to decide such matters, and that the holder of the bonds, or some one under whom he claims, has paid value for the bonds, in good faith, without notice of any irregularity or illegality in the proceedings. The fact of the negotiability of the security has never entered into the consideration of the question of estoppel, and has never been regarded as forming an element in building up the doctrine of estoppel by recitals, although, in most of the cases, it is true that it appears that the bonds were in fact negotiable. Mr. Burroughs, in his work on Public Securities, says on this subject: "The doctrine, however, is one that is entirely independent of the question of negotiability. If it is correct, it applies equally to non-negotiable paper." Page 322. He reiterates this statement at pages 327 and 354. What we have said with reference to the defendant being estopped by the certificate of the county clerk from showing that the title to the school site had not been vested in the school board applies with equal force to several defenses which the defendant sought to prove on the trial. Defendant offered to prove that the question of issuing the bonds was never submitted to a vote of the resident electors of the district at any school meeting called for that purpose; that no notice, as required by section 5 of the Act, was ever given, by posting in three conspicuous places in the district stating the time, place, and object of the meeting, and that it was for the purpose of auditing and settling the school indebtedness of the district, and issuing bonds to provide for payment thereof; that the school board of the defendant was never petitioned in writing by at least one third of the resident electors of said district to call a meeting to audit and settle the indebtedness of the district; that a committee was never appointed to audit and settle the indebtedness of the district; that the same was never audited and settled by a committee from the district, or the school board; that the claims for the bonds in suit were never given up to the defendant, or canceled; that the resident electors of the defendant never authorized or sanctioned, or in any manner ratified, the issuing of the bonds. All of these matters were settled against the defendant by the certificate of the county clerk that the bonds were issued in accordance with law. They were matters which the statute made it his duty to decide before he appended his certificate to the bonds, as will be seen by reference to sections 5 and 6 of the statute, and upon his decision the plaintiff could confidently rely, he being a purchaser in good faith, for value, and without notice of any irregularities in the proceedings. There was therefore no error in excluding proof of these defenses. Defendant also offered to prove that the persons who signed the bonds as director and as clerk were not the qualified director and clerk of the defendant. If the offer had been to prove that they were not director and clerk, either de jure or de facto, the court would have been obliged to receive the evidence. Even a bona fide purchaser of a negotiable municipal bond must take the risk of the signatures being forged, or that the persons signing are not in fact officers of the municipalities issuing the bonds. Coler v. Cleburne, 181 U. S. 162, 38 L. ed. 146; Anthony v. Jasper County, 101 U. S. 698, 25 L. ed. 1006; 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 1292. But the offer was not to prove that the persons who signed these bonds were not actually exercising the functions of these offices, respectively, even as de facto officers. Defendant merely proposed to prove that they were not qualified officers of the district. There was no error in rejecting this proof. A de facto director and a de facto clerk could bind the district the same as de jure officers could.

The defendant also offered to prove that the assessed valuation of all of the property in the defendant district in the year 1888 was only $4,000, and that the legal voters of the district never designated a site for the school district house at any meeting; that they never authorized the school board to build a school-house, or to issue any warrants for which the bonds in suit were given; and that they never ratified or sanctioned the matter in any manner. These offers, by themselves, would not have constituted a defense to this action. Perhaps the purpose of the defendant was to show that the debts which were founded by the issue of those bonds were void, under the decision of the territorial supreme court and of this court in the cases of Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank of Valley City v. School Dist. No. 53, 6 Dak. 265; and Capital Bank of St. Paul v. Barnes County School Dist. No. 53, 1 N. Dak. 479. But it would not follow from the fact that the warrants were void that the bonds themselves would also be void, in the hands of an innocent purchaser. This would not necessarily establish a want of consideration. The bonds might have been sold originally for cash, as the statute authorizes, and the subsequent application of the proceeds to pay void claims would not operate to the prejudice of the one who had paid value for them. Indeed, a majority of the court are of opinion that defendant cannot establish a want of consideration for the bonds by showing that they were issued in exchange for void warrants, provided the warrants had in fact been audited, surrendered, and canceled. This ruling will control the trial court on the new trial of this case. From this view, however, I am compelled to dissent. The statute, in express terms, declares that the auditing of the claims against the district shall not render valid such of them as may be invalid. They remain as void in the hands of the holder of them after they are audited as they were before. The holder of them cannot enforce them against the district; and, when he surrenders them in exchange for bonds, it is clear that he has parted with nothing of value, and therefore has paid nothing for the bonds. It is the same as though he had paid counterfeit money for them. The bonds in his hands are not the bonds of the district, not because there was not power to issue them, but because the district has received no consideration for them. Not being negotiable, the plaintiff would take them subject to this defense of want of consideration, unless the district should be held to be estopped from insisting that warrants, after they have been audited and canceled, are void, as against a purchaser who pays value for the bonds. In other words, the district must be held to be estopped, not only as to the existence of power to issue the bonds, but also as to the fact whether they were sold for a valuable consideration. To so hold is to go beyond all authority, and to extend the doctrine of estoppel by recitals to matters which have been governed by other rules.

At this point it becomes necessary to make an important distinction. It is necessary to a correct solution of this problem to keep constantly in mind the distinction between the defense of want of power and the defense of want of consideration. The bonds not being negotiable, the defendant will be successful if either defense is established. But it cannot prove the invalidity of the indebtedness audited to establish want of power, because the certificate of the county clerk is a final decision by an authorized officer that a sufficient amount of district indebtedness has been audited and canceled to warrant the issue of the bonds so certified. It was for this purpose that this certificate was required to be made. Power to bond to fund indebtedness would depend upon the existence of debts to be funded, and would be only commensurate with such indebtedness. Such bonds could not be negotiated if this question as to the existence of sufficient indebtedness to warrant the issue of the bonds actually issued were left open to future investigation and decision. To preclude all inquiry into it, as against innocent holders of the bonds, the legislature provided for the indorsement upon such bonds of the certificate of the county clerk, who is charged with the duty of ascertaining such fact, and this was done that the question of power should not thereafter be open to investigation. But the utmost scope of the legislative intent was by the certificate to settle the question of power, and no other question. This is always the object of recitals in such bonds. The sole purpose is to foreclose inquiry into the question of power, by estopping the municipality from showing that certain conditions precedent to the issue of bonds have not been complied with, or do not exist, and no case can be found where they have been held operative to estop the municipality from showing want of consideration. The certificate of the county clerk is not an assurance to the public that the bonds have been in fact sold for value. The sale does not take place until after the certificate is indorsed thereon. No one would buy them before. No one ever does purchase such securities in advance of their being put in such shape that he can buy them with safety, so far as the question of power is concerned.

The statute, in express terms, provides that, before the bonds are sold, they shall be so certified. This certificate, from the very nature of the case, cannot embrace a fact which must occur after the certificate is made, which is not intrusted to the county clerk for decision, and of which he cannot be expected to have any personal knowledge; the bonds being subsequently sold by other officers, i. e., the proper officers of the school district. It is not a certificate that the bonds were sold for cash, or for audited warrants, or that they were sold at all. It is a statement to the public that, if the bonds are sold, the one who buys them may confidently rely upon there being power to issue them. If this certificate creates an estoppel, not only as to power, but also as to consideration, then it follows that it cannot be shown, as against one who has bought them as non-negotiable paper, and therefore subject to the defense of want of consideration, that they were sold for void warrants, which had never been audited. Indeed, upon this theory, it cannot be shown that, as a matter of fact, they were given away. But it is said that while the purchaser must take the risk of their being given away, or issued in exchange for void warrants, which had not been audited, yet, if they were in fact issued for warrants which have been audited, the validity of such warrants cannot be inquired into. Right here is the pivotal point of this case, so far as this question is concerned. What is there in the statute to warrant a purchaser of such bonds in assuming that any warrant which has been audited is a valid warrant? There is nothing. On the contrary, the statute explicitly declares to the world that a void warrant is still void, although it may have been audited; that the holder of it cannot enforce it; and that, if he surrenders it in exchange for bonds issued by the district, he has paid nothing of value for the bonds so issued. The lawmerchant declares to the one who subsequently buys such bonds that the fact that the bonds were void in the hands of the first holder, for want of consideration, can always be shown as against him (the subsequent purchaser). Whence comes this guaranty to the public that the audited warrants are valid? It does not come from the certificate of the county clerk, for that merely asserts that the auditing committee have adjudged enough warrants to be valid to authorize the issuing of the bonds in question. What particular warrants have been decided to be valid is not stated. What effect this decision of the auditing committee is to have upon the warrants themselves, we must look into the statute to determine. The statute, in express terms, declares that it shall not have the effect to validate such warrants as were before void. So far, however, as the question of power is concerned, the decision of the auditing committee is final, because the statute expressly authorizes the issue of bonds, to the extent that such claims are adjudged to be legal by such committee. The language of the statute is that the "school board shall forthwith proceed to issue bonds to the amount of the indebtedness as audited and settled." There is power to issue bonds to that extent, whether such claims are valid or not; and the certificate of the county clerk is final, that claims enough have been audited to authorize the issue of the bonds on which the certificate is indorsed. But right here the statute draws the line, and declares that, while the question of power cannot be assailed by showing that not enough valid warrants were audited to justify the issue of bonds issued, yet, nevertheless, such warrants as were void before they were audited are still void for all other purposes; and, if they are declared to be void for all other purposes, how can a purchaser of bonds, who takes subject to the defense of want of consideration, insist that the district is estopped from showing that they were void, for the purpose of proving that nothing was paid for the bonds which were issued in exchange for them? The estoppel cannot rest upon the certificate, because it may be shown despite the certificate that the bonds were given away, or issued in exchange for void warrants, which had not been audited. The estoppel must rest upon the circumstance that the warrants in exchange for which the bonds have been issued had in fact been audited. As to such warrants, what representation does the statute make to the public? It declares to the purchaser that these warrants, although audited, may in fact be void, and that auditing them does not make them valid; that, if void, he who surrenders them for bonds gives nothing of value for such bonds, and therefore cannot enforce them. The lawmerchant here steps in, and informs the purchaser of such bonds, when they are not negotiable, that, if they were issued in exchange for such void warrants, he takes them subject to the same defense as was effectual against them in the hands of the first holder.

I fully agree with the majority of the court in the view that, if the bonds were originally sold for cash they cannot be invalidated by showing that the audited claims are illegal. The certificate of the county clerk settles the question of the necessity of issuing the bonds on which such certificate is indorsed. Section 5 of the Act, in terms, submits to the committee therein referred to the decision of the question of the fact of indebtedness for the purpose of funding, and the amount thereof. It is true that this decision is not to be binding upon the district as an admission of the legality of any claim. But the obvious purpose of this provision is to save the district from being bound by their decision, as against the holders of such claims. So far as the public were concerned, they had a right to rely on the decision of this board as to the amount of bonds necessary to fund the indebtedness of the district, and to purchase the bonds relying upon the correctness of such decision. The authorities amply sustain this proposition. Sherman County v. Simonds, 109 U. S. 735, 27 L. ed. 1093; National Bank of Commerce v. Grenada, 41 Fed. Rep. 87, 92, 93. See also Hackett v. Ottawa, 99 U. S. 86, 25 L. ed. 368; Ottawa v. First Nat. Bank of Portsmouth, 105 U. S. 343, 26 L. ed. 1127. But, speaking for myself, I do not think that they have any right to rely upon the auditing of such warrants as establishing their validity, so that the surrender of them constitutes a sufficient consideration for a bond issued in exchange for such warrants. But, on the question of power, we are all agreed that the recitals in the bonds estop the district. The bond, upon its face, recites that it was issued "for the purpose of liquidating indebtedness incurred for building school-house." Section 6 requires the county clerk, before registering the bond and making his certificate, to ascertain whether the provisions of section 5 have been complied with, and whether the bonds are authorized to be issued as provided for in the act. The county clerk has decided this question in the affirmative by registering the bonds, and by making the certificate to which we have already referred. He has thus certified that the committee have decided that the bonds are necessary to fund the indebtedness of the district, and that such indebtedness has been surrendered up and canceled. We all hold that one who paid cash for these bonds at the time they were originally issued would be protected, as against the defense that there were in fact no outstanding debts of the district to fund. So would a purchaser from him. There was no attempt to prove that the record in the district or in the county clerk's office failed to show a compliance with the law. Whether a bona fide purchaser is bound to take notice of such records, or either of them, or the absence of any such records, it is not necessary for us to decide. While the statute requires these records to be kept, there is authority for the doctrine that such a purchaser can rely on the recitals in the bond, or on the certificate indorsed upon it. Lewis v. Comanche County, 85 Fed. Rep. 843; Rock Creek Twp. v. Strong, 96 U. S. 371, 24 L. ed. 815; Gibbs v. Colfax Twp. School Dist. No. 10, 88 Mich. 834.

We hold that the district is estopped by the certificate of the county clerk from proving as a defense that it had no title to its school site at the time the bonds were issued. A majority of the court (the Chief Justice and the writer of this opinion) hold that the bonds are not negotiable, and are therefore open to the defense of want of consideration in the hands of the plaintiff. But a majority of the court (the Chief Justice and Judge Wallin) hold that want of consideration cannot be shown by proving that the bonds were paid for by void warrants, if such warrants were in fact audited and canceled under the provisions of the statute. And all the members of the court are agreed that all the other defenses referred to in the opinion are foreclosed by the certificate of the county clerk. Because the court below refused to allow defendant to prove want of consideration for the bonds the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Bartholomew, Ch. J.:

A proper disposition is made of this case in the opinion prepared by Judge Corliss. But, to avoid any possible misconception, I desire to state my individual views more fully upon one point than they are stated in the opinion of the court. It will be noticed that Judge Corliss and myself hold that the bonds in suit are not negotiable by reason of the additional contract to pay exchange on New York. This holding, of course, in the absence of any other controlling circumstances, opens the bonds to the defense of want of consideration, even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser before maturity, as plaintiff is shown to be. Judge Wallin, on the contrary, holds that the bonds are negotiable; hence, in his view, all inquiry into the consideration is barred. But, while I believe the bonds to be non-negotiable, yet I believe the inquiry into the consideration is, to a large extent, limited by the terms of the statute under which the bonds were issued, and the recitals in the certificate of the clerk. Judge Corliss finds nothing in the statutes and recitals which should, in his judgment, restrict the inquiry into the consideration; hence, he holds that no restriction exists. The judgment below is reversed solely because the learned trial court refused to permit any inquiry whatever into the question of consideration. The error in that ruling goes only to the extent to which a majority of this court can unite in saying that the question of consideration was open. For the guidance of the trial court on the new trial, it is necessary that the line be clearly defined, and the holding of this court understood.

These bonds were issued under unusual conditions. The statute which authorized their issue proceeded upon the theory that the school districts of Barnes county had a large amount of outstanding indebtedness, and that the validity of a portion or all of this outstanding indebtedness was questioned, and the power to fix the amount of indebtedness for the payment of which bonds should be issued was left entirely with the district itself. The first step required by the statute was the calling of a meeting of the voters of the district, at which meeting the voters selected three of their own number to act as a committee to audit and settle the indebtedness of the district. This committee was required to give public notice of the time and place where it would meet to audit and settle such indebtedness, and also of the time and place where it would make a full report to the district, at which time and place the voters were required to meet to receive such report, and vote upon the question of issuing bonds for the payment of the indebtedness, as audited and settled. If there was an affirmative vote, under the terms and provisions of the statute, then the school board was required forthwith to issue bonds to the amount of the indebtedness, as audited and settled; but, before the bonds could be disposed of, they must be presented to the clerk for the certificate, as set out in the foregoing opinion. A provision in the statutes declared that the auditing and settling by the committee should not be construed to be binding on the district, or as an admission of the legality of any claim or alleged claim. Upon this provision my Brother Corliss builds an able argument to show that, where bonds were issued and delivered in exchange for such claims, a recovery on the bonds may be defeated by showing that such claims were in fact invalid, and hence no consideration was given for the bonds. I fully agree with him that the action of the committee, alone, could not bind the district, or estop it from disputing the validity of the claim; but I entirely disagree with him as to the result that follows from that circumstance, when bonds have in fact been voted and issued, and exchanged for such claims. In my judgment, that provision in the statute was intended to meet a case where, after the committee had audited and settled certain claims, the district, by vote, refused to issue bonds for the payment of such claims. If then suit should be brought against the district on the original claims, the action of the committee could not be shown to establish the legality of the claims, or to estop the district. But if we are to go further, and after the tribunal authorized by law and appointed by the district has declared certain claims valid, and after the district, with full knowledge of all the facts, has ratified the action of that tribunal by voting to issue bonds for the payment of the claims thus allowed, and after the bonds have been in fact issued and exchanged for the allowed claims, if then we permit the district, when sued on the bonds, to declare them worthless because the claim for which they were exchanged was invalid, then we may well ask why was the act ever passed? Why this expensive and protracted preparation for the enactment of so light a farce? An examination of the statute will show that it expressly authorizes and contemplates a direct exchange of the bonds for the allowed claims. True, the district is not limited to that. It may sell for cash. But the exchange is expressly authorized. Does it not involve a contradiction to say that when the amount of bonds, and the purpose of their issue, have been fixed as the law directs, and when the bonds have been voted and issued as the law directs, and when they have been exchanged for the exact consideration that the law directs, nevertheless the bonds are without consideration, and worthless? Did the law intend to direct the issuance of worthless bonds? The certificate does not foreclose the question of consideration in this case, more than in any other. But it establishes certain facts, to wit, that the committee had audited and settled certain claims; that the district had, by vote, ratified that settlement, by directing the issuance of bonds to pay such claims, as audited and settled; that the bonds had issued; and that the original claims (presumably resting in warrants) had been delivered up and canceled. Under these circumstances, when the claim owner receives the promised bonds in exchange for his surrendered and canceled claim, I contend that the district is estopped, by every principle of the law of estoppel, from saying that such bonds are without consideration. But whether or not the claim owner ever received the bonds in exchange is not fixed by the certificate. When the certificate was made the bonds were in the hands of the school board. They were yet to be disposed of by them. If they sold them for cash, as the law directs, or if they exchanged them for surrendered claims, as the law directs, the question of want of consideration cannot be successfully raised. But if the bonds were given away, or if, through fraud or favoritism, they were sold for less than their value, or less than the statute directs, such facts might be shown, to establish want of consideration. The offer of defendant was broad enough to cover any wrongful or fraudulent disposition of the bonds by the school board, and for that reason, and that alone, I consent to a reversal in this case.

Wallin, J.:

I concur in what is said by the Chief Justice upon the question of consideration.

Henry W. K. CUTTER, Appt.,

vs.

(.....N. Dak.....)

- *1. An insolvent debtor may pay or secure one creditor in preference to another, except in cases where he executes an assignment for the benefit of his creditors.
2. Such a debtor, in this case, executed three chattel mortgages on substantially all of his property, securing certain creditors to the exclusion of others. The mortgages at once took possession, and commenced foreclosure of the mortgages. Held, even assuming that the debtor himself knew that the consequence of giving the mortgages would be to prevent his continuing his business, that such transactions did not constitute an assignment for the benefit of creditors, within the meaning of section 4660, Comp. Laws, rendering void all preferences contained in such an assignment.
3. When a receiver is appointed in an action, and continues to act as receiver down to the time of final judgment, the court should embody in its decision and final judgment all matters relating to the receiver's fees and expenses: how they should be paid,—whether out of the funds in his hands, or by the parties to the action; and whether, if paid out of the funds in the hands of the receiver belonging to one party, the other should not be compelled to make good this depletion of the fund in whole or in part. Held, error for the court, without investigating and settling such matters, to direct that all of the receiver's fees and expenses should be taxed as costs against the unsuccessful party to the suit.

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to declare certain property upon which James R. Pollock had executed chattel mortgages to be a trust fund to be distributed proportionately among all his creditors, and from an order directing the costs of a receiver, who had been appointed in the proceeding, to be paid by plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Newman, Spalding & Phelps and Bartlett & Lovell, for appellants:

The defendant Pollock had determined to quit his business and yield dominion of substantially all his estate for the benefit of the creditors mentioned in these mortgages, and the court should have so found.

A finding upon this issue was requested by plaintiffs. They did not waive it, and were entitled to it.

If at the time of the execution of the mortgages in question the defendant Pollock had the intention to quit business, and yield dominion over, and surrender substantially all his property for the benefit of the creditors named in the mortgage, then the transaction was an assignment, and void under the statute.

Where an insolvent makes a conveyance of his property for the benefit of a portion of his creditors, the question whether such conveyance would be regarded as an assignment for the benefit of creditors, or a mortgage for the security of a part, is to be determined by the intention of the parties as it may be ascertained from the circumstances of the transaction.

Cobbey, Chat. Mortg. § 101.

Such intention can only be determined from the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, and not from the testimony of the debtor himself, which is inadmissible as evidence of his intention.

The statutes in force in this country providing for assignments by insolvents and which prohibit preferences may be divided into three general classes:

1. Those which avoid the assignment and leave the estate in statu quo subject to the attacks of diligent creditors.

2. Those which avoid the preferences, leaving the assignment, and the trust thereby created, to stand, and directing the distribution of the estate among the creditors under the assignment, according to their respective claims.

3. Those which avoid the assignment, but direct that the estate shall thereupon become a trust fund to be distributed in equity among all the creditors in proportion to their respective claims.

There is a corresponding division of the decisions.

1. Those which hold no instrument an assignment unless it is intentionally and technically executed under the assignment laws of the state, and preferences given by its terms. King v. Gustafson, 80 Iowa, 207; Kendall v. Bishop, 76 Mich. 634.

2. Those which hold any instrument an assignment which transfers all the insolvent debtor's property in trust for the benefit of a portion of his creditors.

3. Those which hold that no matter what the form of instrument or whether on its face it purports to create a trust, if it effects a voluntary transfer of substantially all the debtor's property for the benefit of a portion of his creditors, it is within the statute.

The pleadings make the case proper for the appointment of a receiver. The appointment was made upon notice and full hearing. No appeal was taken from the order, which was acquiesced in, and the receivership continued under the supervision of defendant's attorneys. No objection was made to the appointment on account of want of jurisdiction. The only objection was based upon a traverse of the facts alleged in the complaint and affidavits.

In such cases the receiver must be paid out of the fund.

Straw v. Jenks, 6 Dak. 414, has no binding force over the court, more than would a decision of any court from any foreign state.

Defendant Pollock, at the time of the execution of the mortgages in question, did not intend to quit business, and yield dominion over and surrender substantially all of his property for the benefit of creditors named in the mortgages.

Cobbey, Chat. Mortg. § 101; citing Cadwell's Bank v. Crittenden, 66 Iowa, 237; Kohn v. Clement, 58 Iowa, 589.

The legislature, in doing away with all preferences, and laying down the statutory rule that a trust should be established, has simply taken away the possibility of debtors making bargains for themselves, at the expense of honest creditors; but has not, in any sense, changed the exact conditions required for an assignment under the old law.

Covles v. Ricketts, 1 Iowa, 532; Lampson v. Arnold, 19 Iowa, 481.

A party in failing circumstances may prefer one or more creditors by conveying or mortgaging a portion, or the whole, of his property to him or them, to the exclusion of all other creditors, provided the transaction be bona fide.

Crawford v. Taylor, 6 Gill & J. 823, 26 Am. Dec. 584, note and cases cited.

The giving of a chattel mortgage to secure a bona fide debt is not considered an assignment, as provided in paragraph 4600, and is, therefore, not in conflict with the provisions prohibiting preferences.

Stanford*, 10 Cal. 269; Warner v. Littlefield, 89 Mich. 329.

The receiver's fees and expenses were allowed from the fund and defendants given judgment therefor against the plaintiffs.

The fund can be charged with the costs of a receivership in cases where: (1) the appointment is found to have been proper; or (2) the estate is benefited, or at least not injured; or (3) the parties consent to the appointment.

In the case at bar the receiver was appointed at the instance and request of the plaintiffs and over the opposition and objection of the defendants.

No interest of the mortgagees was considered or sought to be advanced or protected. The plaintiffs sought to gain an advantage, in which they were unsuccessful, and there seems to be no more reason for requiring the mortgagees to bear the expenses of the receivership than there would be for taxing the ordinary costs of suit to the successful party.

The costs and expenses of the unwarranted proceedings should be paid by the parties instituting such proceedings.

Corliss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves a question of statutory construction. The contention on the part of the plaintiffs and appellants is that the transaction to which we will refer constituted an assignment for the benefit of creditors containing preferences, and that therefore the transactions are without any other legal effect than to make the property to which they relate a trust fund to be distributed proportionately among all creditors of the owner of such property. The plaintiffs claiming to be creditors of James R. Pollock, commenced this action in equity to have the property referred to declared a trust fund, under the provisions of section 4860, Comp. Laws. That section provides as follows: "An insolvent debtor may, in good faith, execute an assignment of property to one or more assignees, in trust towards the satisfaction 23 L. R. A.

of his creditors, in conformity to the provisions of this title; subject, however, to the provisions of this code relative to trusts and to fraudulent transfers, and to the restrictions imposed by law upon assignments by special partnerships, by corporations or by other specified classes of persons; provided, moreover, that such assignments shall not be valid if it be upon, or contain any trust or condition by which any creditor is to receive a preference or priority over any other creditor; but in such case the property of the insolvent shall become a trust fund to be administered in equity, in the district court, and shall inure to the benefit of all of the creditors in proportion to their respective claims or demands." Pollock was a merchant engaged in business at Casselton, in this state. October 2, 1889, he executed three chattel mortgages upon his stock of goods and his store fixtures to secure claims held against him by the defendants Straw-Ellsworth Manufacturing Company, Eveline Pollock, and the Cass County Bank. These mortgages were executed and delivered to these defendants, respectively, and were successively filed for record in the office of the register of deeds of Cass county, N. D., the same day. They were all executed as part of one transaction. The value of the mortgaged property was $12,000. The debts so secured did not amount to $7,000. While it appears from the record that Pollock owned at the time some other property, we will assume for the purposes of this case that these mortgages covered substantially all of his property not exempt from execution. Pollock appears to have been insolvent at this time. A few hours after these mortgages were given and delivered, the mortgagor turned over all the mortgaged property to the mortgagees, who at once proceeded to foreclose the mortgages by advertising the property for sale thereunder. Each contained a provision that the mortgagee might immediately take possession of the mortgaged property. While these foreclosure proceedings were being had, the plaintiffs instituted this action, and had a receiver appointed to take and hold possession of the mortgaged property or its proceeds pending the action. Judgment having been rendered against the plaintiffs, adjudging that the mortgages were valid liens upon the property, and that plaintiffs had no right or interest in the mortgaged property, the plaintiffs have appealed to this court from such judgment.

It is here urged that the facts of this case bring it within the decision of the territorial supreme court in Straw v. Jenks, 6 Dak. 414, and that that decision should be followed by this court. We are by no means satisfied that Pollock, when he executed these mortgages, had considered that he would no longer continue in business, and had decided to yield up dominion of his entire property. But we will again assume a state of facts as favorable to plaintiffs as the record will justify. We will take it for granted that Pollock intended to give these mortgagees a preference, knowing that the consequence of the execution of such mortgages, and the abandonment to the mortgagees of the possession of the mortgaged property, would be to force him to abandon his business. But it is very clear that he did not intend to surrender control over the mortgaged property, except so far as was necessary to accomplish the payment of the mortgagees named therein. The mortgages created mere liens. The legal title to the property remained in the mortgagor. After these preferred creditors had been paid, the possession of the remaining property would revert to him; and at all times any of his creditors could have levied upon his interests in the mortgaged property, and sold it to pay such creditors' claim. To assert that a mortgagor who has created a mere lien on property (especially where, as in this case, the value of the property is largely in excess of the claims secured by the mortgage) has parted with all control over the property, is to ignore the character and legal effect of the instrument under which he has surrendered possession. Despite the mortgage, it is still his property. He may sell it. He may mortgage it. It may be seized for his debts. How such a transaction can be held to be an assignment for the benefit of creditors is inexplicable to us. An assignment for the benefit of creditors creates a trust, vesting the legal title in the assignee, placing the property beyond the control of the assignor or the reach of any of his creditors, except as they have a right, under the assignment, to share in the distribution of the assigned estate. It is for this reason that assignments for the benefit of a portion of the assignor's creditors have been held void under the statute invalidating all transfers which delay creditors. In such a case the debtor would, if the transaction were valid, be able to place for a time his property beyond the reach of the creditors who have no rights under the assignment, because that portion of the assigned estate which would come back to him after the trust is executed would, during the existence of the trust, be withheld from the reach of such creditors. But a mortgage creates no trust. It creates a mere lien. It is in no respect assimilated to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and yet, by the express terms of the statute, it is in only such an assignment that the law condemns a preference. The common law recognized the right of a debtor to secure or pay one creditor in preference to all others. The general rule is embodied in our statute. Section 4654, Comp. Laws, declares that "a debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another or may give one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another." Section 4660 takes a certain class of transactions out of this general rule. But we must not lose sight of the fact that preference is the rule in this jurisdiction, and that he who questions the right of a debtor to make a preference must lay his hand upon the law which takes away this right in a given case. The legislature has seen fit to draw the line at instruments which constitute assignments for the benefit of creditors. Such instruments must not contain preferences. If they do they are void, and the property becomes a trust fund for the equal benefit of all creditors. But this statute does not attempt to prevent the giving of security to one or any number of creditors in preference to others, and section 4654, in terms, allows this to be done. To hold that a chattel mortgage is an assignment for the benefit of creditors, that the creation of a mere lien is the creation of a trust, that retaining title to property is surrendering all control over it, displays an utter disregard of well-settled legal distinctions. To extend the construction of the statute to embrace a transaction of the character disclosed by this record, under the specious pretext of following the spirit of the law, is downright usurpation of legislative functions. To us the fallacy of the reasoning in the case of Straw v. Jenks, and in the other cases in which the rule there enunciated is laid down, is in the assumption that preference is the exception, and not the rule, whereas the general rule permits preference, and he who claims that a preference is illegal must bring the case within the particular exception embodied in section 4660. The statute does not declare that one who has decided to apply all his property in payment of his debts, as far as it will apply, must distribute it among his creditors ratably. This he must do if he executes a general assignment. But the law does not compel him to make a general assignment, and it does permit him to pay or secure any creditor in preference to another. Of course, this statute allowing preferences relates to insolvent debtors. When a debtor is solvent there can arise no question of preference. It is only when he is insolvent that the right to prefer is of any value to him, or to the creditor preferred. An insolvent debtor may therefore pay one creditor in preference to others, although it takes every dollar of his property to make the payment. It is only when he executes an assignment for the benefit of all of his creditors that he cannot discriminate and favor. Then he must place all creditors on an equal footing. If he does not, the law and the courts will do it for him. The argument in Straw v. Jenks and similar cases is that the object of the law will be defeated if the rule there enunciated is not adopted. This reasoning assumes that the object of the statute is something other than it is therein expressed to be. The purpose of the law, if the language in which that purpose is couched is to be our guide, is that the general rule permitting preferences shall be abrogated in a single class of cases, i. e. where a debtor executes such an assignment for the benefit of creditors as the act embraced in the title in which section 4660 is found refers to. An analysis of this act (sections 4660-4680, both inclusive) discloses a legislative intent therein to deal with assignments for the benefit of all the assignor's creditors. In such an instrument there shall be no preference. In every other transaction the debtor may prefer. The case of Straw v. Jenks has been overruled by the South Dakota supreme court in an opinion whose logic, to our mind, is unanswerable. Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Mas (S. Dak.) 24 L. R. A. 524; Straw v. Jenks, merely followed White v. Cotschhausen, 129 U. S. 829, 32 L. ed. 677. This case merely followed what the court regarded as the rule in Illinois, as laid down in Pro- ton v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208. In a later case the federal supreme court has ruled differently in a case arising in Missouri, following a different rule adopted in that state. Union Bank of Chicago v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 285, 84 L. ed. 845. In this case, Mr. Justice Gray expressly declares that all the court intended to do in White v. Cotschhausen was to construe the Illinois statute in accordance with what it understood to be the decision of the supreme court of that state. That the federal supreme court, in White v. Cotschhausen, did not correctly interpret the decision of the Illinois supreme court in Preston v. Spaulding, is evident from later decisions of that court. See Farwell v. Nilsson, 183 Ill. 45; Weber v. Mick, 181 Ill. 520. And see Moore v. Meyer, 47 Fed. Rep. 99; Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 408. There is nothing in Farwell v. Cohen, 188 Ill. 216, 18 L. R. A. 281, opposed to the views expressed in Farwell v. Nilsson.

In many of the cases there was in fact a general assignment for the benefit of creditors executed. When a debtor, with the purpose of executing such an assignment, makes transfers of property or gives security or pays money before executing the assignment, for the express purpose of evading the provisions against preferences, — when his purpose, known to the favored creditor, is to accomplish by independent instruments what could not be accomplished in the assignment itself, — and, thus deliberately attempting to evade the law, thereafter executes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, it is impossible that the instruments giving the preferences should be regarded as part of the assignment, and that, therefore, the preference should be held to be contained in the assignment itself, and consequently of no effect. But in such cases the transactions ought not to be too far apart, and certainly the preferred creditors should be proven to have had knowledge of the debtor's purpose to make an assignment at the time of giving the preferences. See, in this connection, Manning v. Beck, 129 N. Y. 1, 14 L. R. A. 198; Lake Shore Bkg. Co. v. Fuller, 110 Pa. 156.

We hold that these chattel mortgages did not constitute a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, and that the debtor had a perfect right to execute them to the creditors therein named, to secure his obligations to them. It therefore followed that the mortgaged property was not a trust fund in which all the creditors of defendant Pollock had an interest, but was his property, on which there were mortgage liens held by such of the defendants as were named in the three mortgages as mortgagees. As sustaining our conclusions, we cite Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Maz (S. Dak.) 24 L. R. A. 524; Harquads v. Henderson, 97 Mo. 375; Union Bank of Chicago v. Bank of Kansas City, supra; May v. Tenney, 148 U. S. 60, 37 L. ed. 868; Farwell v. Nilsson, Weber v. Mick, and Schroeder v. Walsh, supra; Tompkins v. Hunter, 24 N. Y. Supp. 8; Cross v. Carlens, 49 Ohio St. 548; Moore v. Meyer, supra; Orow v. Beardley, 68 Mo. 435; Gilbert v. McCorkle, 110 Ind. 215; Wattman v. Silberberg, 67 Tex. 100; Warner 35 L. R. A.

Other cases might be cited, but this question has been so often discussed, and the decisions so many times reviewed, that we feel that it would be a waste of time for us to travel again over the same ground. With the exception of Straw v. Jenks, White v. Cotschhausen, and a few other cases, all of the decisions which have struck down preferences have been in cases in which it appeared that an assignment for the benefit of creditors was in fact executed; and the courts in those cases held that the instruments creating the preferences were so connected in point of time, and by the circumstances of the transactions, with the subsequent general assignment, that they were a part of it, and that, therefore, the preferences were, in contemplation of law, embodied in the assignment itself. Such, among others, were the cases of Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208; Berger v. Varrelmann, 127 N. Y. 281, 12 L. R. A. 808; Clapp v. Nordmeyer, 25 Fed. Rep. 71; Burnham v. Haskins, 79 Mich. 85.

The judgment of the district court was therefore right, in so far as it adjudged that the mortgaged property or its proceeds, in the hands of the receiver, should be turned over to the defendants entitled thereto under such mortgages. But the judgment is attacked by this appeal in another particular. On motion of the plaintiffs, and against the opposition of the defendants, a receiver was appointed to take possession of the mortgaged property pending the litigation. In one of its conclusions of law the court held that the fees and expenses of the receiver, which were not settled by the court, should be taxed by the clerk of the court as costs in the case, and that the amount of such costs should be inserted in the judgment. It does not expressly appear that this was done, but we think it is a fair inference that it was done, as the judgment against the plaintiffs is for nearly $5,000 costs, and we know that no such bill of costs could have been taxed against the plaintiffs unless the fees and expense of the receiver were embodied therein. This fact strengthens the natural inference that the rule of law laid down in the court's decision was followed by the clerk, at the instance of the defendants, in taxing the costs, and entering the amount thereof in the judgment. These items, we are clear, have no place in a bill of costs. If they belong there at all, it is only as disbursements, and such disbursements the statute does not authorize to be taxed against the unsuccessful party. Section 5189, Comp. Laws. It is obvious that the clerk is not the proper officer to settle the question of a receiver's compensation. That is a judicial question. Nor should it be left to him to determine what expenses are reasonable and proper. A receiver may be so extravagant in his expenditures that it would be highly unjust to allow him credit for all the moneys he has paid out. Had such state of facts existed in this case, the clerk nevertheless must have inserted all the items of disbursements in the bill of costs, provided he was satisfied that they had in fact been incurred. Again, we think it is not the proper practice for the court to determine, in advance of a hearing on the different items of a receiver's account, that all his disbursements should be paid by one party or the other to the litigation. An examination of his account in connection with surrounding circumstances might disclose the fact that some of the items ought to be paid by the successful party. They might embrace expenditures which the successful party would have been compelled to make himself, had it not been for the receivership, but which he was saved, by such receivership, the necessity of making himself. The proper practice, where a receiver has been appointed, is for the court, after it has reached its conclusion, to order the receiver to account, on notice to all parties interested; and upon such accounting all questions can be settled, and the findings of fact and conclusions of law relating to such matters can be embodied in the decision of the court on the merits of the action. The final decree should settle what compensation the receiver is to have, what expenditures he shall be reimbursed for; how he shall be paid,—whether out of the funds in his hands, or by one of the parties to the action, or whether part of his fees and expenses shall not be paid out of such funds and the rest by one of the parties to the case, or whether such amount shall not be apportioned so that some of it shall be paid by one party, and the balance by the other. If the receiver is allowed to pay, and reimburse himself out of the moneys in his hands, the decree should provide whether the owner of such moneys shall be indemnified by the recovery of judgment against some other party to the case for this invasion of his property. Ordinarily, it would seem to us (but we do not decide the point) that the receiver should be protected by being permitted to look to the funds in his hands to save him against loss. This appears to have been done in this case. Such rule may, however, work great hardship in particular cases; and in some instances the receiver has, on this account, been compelled to look for indemnity to the party at whose instance he was appointed. See Weston v. Watts, 45 Hun, 219; French v. Gifford, 81 Iowa, 428; Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 2 Paige, 438, 2 L. ed. 979. Certainly, if the court, in such a case, allows him to pay himself out of the funds, it should compel the other party to the action to make good the loss thus occasioned to the successful litigant. It is impossible for a court to make an intelligible decree when property is in the hands of a receiver, and is to be disposed of by the decree, without settling in advance the rights of the receiver with respect to compensation and expenditures, and whether he shall be allowed to pay himself out of the funds in his hands. The decree should determine whether the whole fund, or only the balance after paying the receiver, should be turned over to the successful party. In this case the court has directed the receiver to pay over every dollar that he has received, without making any deduction for his fees and expenses, and yet the defendants are allowed to tax up as costs against the plaintiffs the amount of such fees and expenses, on the theory that they have been paid by the defendants out of their property. The court seems to have proceeded on the theory that the receiver would retain the amount of his fees and disbursements without any authority from the court so to do, and without any investigation as to the reasonableness of his charges and expenditures, and that then the clerk must tax up against the plaintiffs, as costs, whatever amount appeared to have been thus retained by the receiver, out of the funds in his hands belonging to defendants. None of these things were settled by the decree. They were left to the decision of the clerk and the receiver himself. Under the system of practice prevailing at the time the case was decided, findings were required to be made in equity cases as well as in actions at law. This must be taken into consideration in establishing the proper practice in cases like the one before us on this appeal. There can be only one final judgment, and this should settle all matters involved in the litigation, as well the rights of the receiver and the rights and liabilities of the parties to the action growing out of the receivership as the rights of the parties to the litigation on the merits of the case independently of the receivership. This final judgment must rest upon findings of fact and conclusions of law, and these, therefore, should embrace all matters essential to a full determination of the rights of the receiver with respect to compensation and indemnity, and the rights and liabilities of the parties to the suit, growing out of the payment to the receiver of his fees and expenses, as well as all matters relating exclusively to the merits of the controversy. Until all questions touching the receivership are settled, it is impossible finally to determine the rights of the parties to the case. The scope of the judgment awarding the fund to the successful party cannot be prescribed by the court until it decides whether any of this fund shall be retained by the receiver for his compensation and expenditures. The exact judgment which the victorious litigant shall recover against the defeated suitor cannot be ascertained until the court has determined whether, in the first instance, the fund belonging to the former shall be depleted by payment of the receiver's fees and expenses, and if so, whether the unsuccessful party shall make it good to his antagonist in whole or in part.

We conclude that it was error for the court to render final judgment without passing upon the receiver's account, and settling all matters connected with the receivership. These questions should not have been left to the clerk.

The judgment is reversed, and the district court is directed to enter a new judgment after all matters connected with the receivership have been investigated and settled. But the case will not be reopened for a new trial on the merits. The question of the right of the defendants to the funds in the hands of the receiver is settled, subject to such modification. The district court, without reopening questions touching the merits, will inquire into the amount of property and money in the hands of the receiver, or for which he is properly chargeable; will ascertain what compensation is proper, what disbursements actually made were necessary; will determine whether the receiver shall be paid and reimbursed out of the fund in his hands, and what proportion of his fees and expenses ought to be borne by the plaintiffs and defendants, respectively, or whether the plaintiffs ought ultimately, or in the first instance, to pay all of such fees and expenses. All these matters should be embodied in the findings and the final judgment. We do not wish to be regarded as holding that the decision of the district court upon these various questions will be final. It is possible they may be subject to review. There is also an appeal from an order of the district court made on appeal from the taxation by the clerk of the receiver's fees and expenses as costs, which order affirms such taxation. This order is reversed for the reasons already stated.

Benjamin W. HOSMER, Resp't.,

v.

SHELDON SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 2 of

(.....N. Dak.....)

1. A contract duly executed between the proper officers of a school district and another person, by the terms of which said person is employed as a teacher in a public school in said district, is void where such person, at the time of making the contract, holds no certificate of authority to teach in the county where the district is located.
2. The subsequent procurement of such certificate will not enable such person to recover against the district damages for the breach of such contract.

Clarendon School Dist. No. 9 v. Brown, 55 Vt. 61.

Bartholomew, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 7, 1891, Sheldon school district No. 2, the appellant herein, being at that time a duly organized school district in Ransom county, in this state, by its proper officers, and by written contract in due and legal form, hired Benjamin W. Hosmer, the respondent herein, to teach one of its schools for the period of ten months, commencing September 1, 1891, for $60 per month, payable at the end of each month. At the time specified, respondent commenced teaching. On November 21st following he was discharged, for some reason that does not appear of record. After the full term of his employment had passed, he brought this action to recover the wages for the time during which he was not permitted to teach. At the trial below, appellant moved for judgment in its favor on the pleadings. The motion was denied, and, after a hearing on the merits had before the court, respondent had judgment for amount of his claim, less certain sums which he had earned at other employment during the time. From this judgment the appeal is taken, and the only errors assigned relate to the denial of the motion for judgment on the pleadings. The basis for this contention is found in the following statement, which appears in the complaint: "That on the 7th day of August, 1891, at Ransom Co., in the state aforesaid, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a mutual written agreement that the plaintiff should serve the defendant as a school teacher in the public schools at the village of Sheldon, in said school district No. 2, in the county of Ransom, and state aforesaid, and that the plaintiff should and did employ the defendant as such for the term of ten months from and after the first day of September, 1891, and pay him for such services $80.00 per month. The particulars of such written agreement more fully appear by the duplicate original contract, hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this complaint. That on the first day of September, 1891, the plaintiff entered upon the service of the said defendant, under said agreement, and has ever since been, and was, during the entire life and continuance of said contract, ready and willing to continue such services. That the plaintiff was legally qualified to teach said school, having, at the time he entered into the employment of the defendant, a certificate of qualification, duly issued by the superintendent of schools of Barnes Co., N. D., on the 21st day of July, 1890, for the term of three years from and after said date. That the same was duly indorsed by the superintendent of Ransom Co., N. D., on the 29th day of August, 1891, and the formal entry thereof made on said certificate on the 4th day of September, 1891. That on or about the 21st day of November, 1891, the defendant wrongfully discharged the plaintiff, and refused to permit him to serve as aforesaid, though the plaintiff then and there offered to continue said services, and perform said agreement on his part, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of four hundred twenty dollars ($420)."

Section 75, chap. 62, Laws 1890, as amended by section 15, chap. 56, Laws 1891, reads as follows: "It [the school board] shall employ the teachers of the schools of the district, and may dismiss any teacher at any time for plain violation of contract, gross immorality or flagrant neglect of duty; provided, that no person shall be employed as teacher or permitted to teach in any public school who is not when so employed or permitted to teach the holder of a teacher's certificate valid in the county or district in which such school is situated; provided, further, that every contract for the employment of a teacher must be in writing, and such contract must be executed before such teacher begins to teach in such school. It shall grade the salaries of teachers for the district in accordance with the grades of certificates; and no teacher holding a certificate of a lower grade shall be paid a salary equal to or in excess of that paid to a teacher of higher grade in the same district."

Section 122, chap. 62, Laws 1890, as amended by section 24, chap. 56, Laws 1891, reads as follows: "No certificate or permission to teach shall be issued to any person under eighteen years of age; and no first grade certificate shall be issued to any person who is under twenty years of age, and who has not taught successfully twelve school months; and a third grade certificate shall not be issued more than twice to the same person. The certificates issued by a county superintendent shall be valid only in the county where issued; provided, that a first grade certificate may be renewed once without examination at the discretion of the county superintendent, upon payment of the proper fees for the institute fund, as provided in the case of examination; provided, further, that a first grade certificate shall be valid in any other county in the state when endorsed by the county superintendent of such county. No person shall be employed or permitted to teach in any of the public schools of the state, except those in cities organized for school purposes under special laws, who is not the holder of a lawful certificate of qualification or permit to teach. Any contract made in violation of this section shall be void."

It appears from the complaint that on August 7, 1891, when the written contract between respondent and appellant was entered into, respondent held a first-grade certificate issued by the superintendent of Barnes county. This certificate would be valid in Ransom county when indorsed by the superintendent of schools for such county. Such indorsement was not made until September 4, 1891. The allegation is that it was made August 29, 1891, and the formal entry made on September 4. But it was the formal entry that constituted the indorsement, and what preceded that was but a promise to indorse. Hence, neither at the time of entering into the contract, nor at the time of commencing to teach, did respondent hold a certificate valid in Ransom county. For that reason, appellant contends that the contract of employment dated August 7, 1891, was void, under section 122, and that no action can be maintained thereon or for breach thereof. If the original contract was void when made, it could not be ratified. After the removal of the inhibition, a new and valid contract might be made relative to the same subject-matter, but the void contract remains, and ever must remain, a nullity. Where the invalidity of the contract arises, as in this case, if this contract be invalid, from a prohibition and not from any vice adhering to the subject-matter of the contract, courts are inclined to be liberal in construing distinct acts in part performance of the contract, after the prohibition has been removed, as raising a new implied contract. See Hots v. Huerfano County School Dist. No. 9, 1 Colo. App. 40, and Scott v. Fairfax School Dist. No. 2, 46 Vt. 452.

But there is no direct allegation in the complaint that respondent taught a day after he had his certificate indorsed, or that the appellant in any manner acted upon or recognized the void contract. There may be an inference in that direction, but it falls far short of an allegation that can support a recovery. The action is for breach of contract in not permitting respondent to teach. Hence he pleads the written contract, and relies exclusively thereon. Nor must we be understood as holding that recovery could be had on an implied contract for services actually rendered, or offered to be rendered, after the proper certificate was received, when the original contract was void. See remarks of Corliss, Ch. J., on this point, in Goose River Bank v. Willow Lake School Trp. 1 N. Dak. 26, and authorities there cited.

In the case just cited, the court said, in speaking of certain school warrants then involved: "They were issued to pay for services of a teacher who held no lawful certificate of qualification. No such person can be employed to teach. The statute so declares, and any contract made in violation of this provision is void by the express terms of the same act." This language was based upon the wording of the statute, and the authorities were not specially noticed, as the point was secondary in that case, and not seriously controverted. Since, in that case, the teacher had no certificate at the time of making the contract, or at the time of rendering the services, it may be, as counsel now suggests, that it was not absolutely necessary to make the statement as broad as it is in that case. But, upon further consideration of the statute, and a study of the decisions under similar statutes, we adhere to our former language to its full extent. We hold that any contract of employment as teacher in our public schools, saving the exceptions contained in the statute, where the person hired does not, at the time of making such contract, hold a certificate authorizing him to teach in the county where the school is located, is void. And being void, it cannot be ratified, nor can it receive vitality from the happening of a subsequent event. It "is so nugatory and ineffectual that nothing can cure it." Black, Law Dict.

The learned counsel for respondent is correct in stating that the evil against which the statute was directed consisted in having the public schools taught by unqualified persons. And there are cases supporting the contention that when the teacher held the proper certificate at the time the service was rendered, or offered to be rendered, the statute was sufficiently met, and the teacher entitled to recover under the contract. Holz v. Huerfano County School Dist. No. 9, supra, is of that class. A recovery of damages for breach of the contract was allowed there, in a case very similar to this. But the difference in the statutes clearly distinguishes the cases. The Colorado statute prohibited the school district officers from employing a teacher who did not hold a proper certificate. There was no penalty fixed for the violation of the provision on the part of the officers, nor was the contract declared void. It was provided that the teacher should be entitled to no compensation during the time that he held no certificate, thus clearly implying that, for services rendered after he received the proper certificate, he would be entitled to compensation. But even then the court was not content with relying upon the statute, and also placed the case upon an implied contract. In Orford Trp. School Dist. No. 2 v. Dilman, 22 Ohio St. 194, the court held that a statutory provision that "no person shall be employed as a teacher," etc., "unless he shall have first obtained a certificate," etc., meant, in effect, that no person should be engaged in teaching until he had obtained a certificate, and that a contract entered into before the party had obtained a certificate was valid, provided the certificate was obtained before the party engaged in the discharge of his duties as teacher. But it is entirely clear that our statute will not bear this construction. Engaging in the performance of the duties of a teacher neither constitutes nor consummates a contract. The only contract connected with the subject is the written agreement by which the proper school officers employ or hire the teacher. It is that contract, and no other, that the statute declares void under the circumstances stated. And this statute was proper and necessary, in order to prevent the employment of unqualified persons as teachers. If a completed contract is valid when made, it is difficult to understand how performance thereunder is to be prevented without incurring liability. If a completed contract is valid when made, it is not easy to perceive how it can become void, and the conditions remain unchanged. Statutes similar to ours, although perhaps none of them quite so strong, have been construed in accordance with our views in the following cases: Butler v. Haines, 79 Ind. 575; Jenness v. Washington County School Dist. No. 31, 12 Minn. 448 (Gil. 887); Ryan v. Dakota County School Dist. No. 13, 27 Minn. 483; Botkin v. Osborne, 89 Ill. 101. The case from Indiana expressly holds that the subsequent procurement of a certificate, and continuing to teach thereafter, did not entitle the party to recover. The case in 12 Minn. is very strong. The contract was made on the 22d day of the month, the school to commence on the 24th of the same month. The applicant had no certificate when the contract was made, but received his certificate on the 24th, and actually taught the entire term. It was held that he could not recover. There is no legal hardship in these cases. An unqualified person cannot enter into a contract to teach in our public schools without being a party to the violation of a mandatory statute, the terms of which he is conclusively presumed to know.

The respondent in this case cannot recover upon his complaint. The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and that court is directed to sustain appellant's motion for judgment on the pleadings.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

LITTLE ROCK & MEMPHIS R. CO., Appt.,
v.

G. F. BARRY.

(58 Ark. 193.)

1. A train dispatcher who controls and directs the movements of trains is not

NOTE.—A train dispatcher and telegraph operator as fellow servants of trainmen.

- I. General doctrine.
- II. Special principles against the relation.
- III. Train dispatcher.
  - a. Not a fellow servant.
  - b. A fellow servant.
- IV. Telegraph operator.
  - a. Not a fellow servant.
  - b. A fellow servant.

The ground of the liability of a railroad company for injuries sustained by an employé through the negligence of another employé, holding the position of a train dispatcher, has been placed upon the ground that such train dispatcher is not in the same line of employment, being a vice-principal, or indeed, the company itself for the time being, with whose duties no one has a right to interfere, his control over trains being supreme and his orders imperative.

In fact he has been looked upon in matters left to his discretion as the alter ego of the company.

The cases cannot, however, be said to be harmonious upon the question, but the weight of authority is decidedly in favor of the doctrine established in the principal case, and in Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. infra.

The doctrine thus set forth would seem to be considered as settled in the federal courts, and to be upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by the courts of last resort in Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, and Wisconsin, in which latter state this subject is provided for by the legislature.

In some few states, however, the contrary has been held and the parties have been looked upon as fellow servants, their duties being considered as not more distinct than those of a trackman or switch tender and a brakeman. This is the case in Indiana and Mississippi.

In order, however, to determine the responsibility of the master, it is necessary to consider the nature and extent of the authority delegated, the rule as to fellow servants not applying when the duties are such that must be performed either by the master in person, or by his agent.

It makes no difference that the men are in the employ of the same master, or that the same result is reached by their employment.

It is, however, incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish the fact that the relation did not exist, and in case of his failure to establish a clear case the court will order a nonsuit.

The question of the competency of the train dispatcher has also been considered in some cases, and the court has held that if competent when employed by the company his subsequent incompetency will not affect the company unless it be brought to its notice.

There are cases wherein it has been held that the co-operation of the train dispatcher and trainmen relates to the same object, and that the fact that some are performed upon the train and others at a particular place, does not determine the question, 25 L. R. A.

the fellow servant of a fireman on a passenger train employed by the same company.

2. An instruction that the jury may consider in estimating plaintiff's damages resulting from an injury the past and prospective expenses of his sickness, is erroneous where the amount of the past expenses is not shown.

the duties relating to the same general object for which they are employed.

If, however, his orders are improper, the company is liable for any injury resulting therefrom, yet if such orders as originally given were correct there would seem to be some ground for applying the doctrine of fellow servants, if through the negligence of some employé they were wrongfully repeated or delivered.

There is less uniformity in the decisions upon the question of the relationship of fellow servants existing between a telegraph operator and the trainmen, the decisions in favor of the position existing between them being in the majority.

The cases upholding the negative view do so upon the same principles as those declared by the court in the case of a train dispatcher, while those in favor of the affirmative rest the decision upon the ground of assumed risk, the employé being competent to discharge the duties required of him.

I. General doctrine.

As between servant and employer, the latter is bound to use reasonable care in the prosecution of the business in which he engages the former, and it cannot be made out upon principle, or from any case of authority that he shall not be liable for damages arising from a failure to do so. Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 382; Lanning v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 521, 10 Am. Rep. 417; Cone v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 81 N. Y. 208, 37 Am. Rep. 491, Fike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 549, 18 Am. Rep. 545; Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 83, 29 Am. Rep. 97.

It is well settled that the master, who has used proper care in the selection of his servants, is not liable to one servant for the negligence of another servant, while engaged in the same common employment. Dana v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 23 Hun, 473.

The implied contract of the master does not, however, extend to indemnify the servant against the negligence of any one but himself. Ibid.

When the servant enters upon the performance of the duties he assumes full knowledge of all the risks and adjusts his compensation accordingly, the risks being those he is likely to know of and as well able to guard against as the master, and being in a position to quit the service when he is no longer willing to face the perils of the position, he cannot hold the master responsible. Ibid.

The rule rests upon sound principle, each one taking on himself all the ordinary risks of the employment, the negligent acts of his fellow workman in the general course of his employment being within the ordinary risks. Lewis v. Selfert, 116 Pa. 623.

Where, however, a master delegates to another entire control over a particular branch or circumstance of his business, the person to whom such power is delegated stands in the place of the master as to all duties resting upon him to his servants, and his acts or omissions relative thereto are the acts or omissions of the master himself. Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 382; Fike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 549, 18 Am. Rep. 545; Lasky v. Canadian Pac. R. Co. 83 Me. 461; Lewis v.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Selfert, supra; Moon v. Richmond & A. R. Co. 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 404; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71.

And where the master exercises no discretion or oversight of his own, he is liable for the negligence of such agent. Lewis v. Selfert, supra.

The master, to be exempt from liability, must himself have been free from negligence. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, supra.

He is liable if his own negligence or want of care produces the injury, and this may be manifest by employing unfit servants or agents, or furnishing improper or unsafe machinery, implements, facilities, or materials for the use of the servants. Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 550, 13 Am. Rep. 545.

The rule is the same, although the one injured may be inferior in grade and is subject to the direction and control of the superior, whose act caused the injury, provided they are both co-operating to avoid the same object. Lewis v. Selfert, supra.

If corporations could in such cases escape liability on the plea that their agent was a fellow servant or coemployé of the party injured, they could never be held at all, since such corporations must perform their duties through agents who have a common employer. Moon v. Richmond & A. R. Co. 78 Va. 745, 49 Am. Rep. 404; Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545.

The defendant ought not to escape liability for negligently issuing, as master and in the course of the performance of its duty as such, to its employé, an improper order, and whether it has done so should be submitted to the jury. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, post, 505, reversing 55 Hun, 51.

In employing subordinates, the principal must exercise great care, and it is required to institute affirmative inquiries to ascertain their character and qualifications, and negligence in this respect will create a liability, but after suitable persons have been employed there is not the same reason for exacting such a high degree of diligence. Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579.

The railroad is only liable for its own negligence, or for the negligence of some officer or agent who amounts to a vice-principal or a substitute for the company. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Kanaley, 39 Kan. 1.

If proper persons are employed and afterwards become incompetent or unfit, from bad habits, to discharge their duties, and this is brought to the knowledge or notice of the principal or its managing officers, who have power to act in the premises, a failure or neglect promptly to discharge them will render the principal liable for any injury caused thereby. Chapman v. Erie R. Co. supra.

A good character and proper qualifications once possessed must be presumed to continue, and a principal may rely upon that presumption as to these personal qualities until he has notice of a change, or knowledge of such facts as would be deemed equivalent to notice, or at least such as would put a reasonable man upon inquiry. Ibid.

It is the duty of the company, not only to establish proper rules and regulations for its service, but to enforce those rules and regulations in order to exempt it from liability for the negligence of

Messrs. U. M. Rose and G. B. Rose, for appellant:

Upon the proposition that because the information that No. 5 was in the bottom was given orally and not in writing, the engineer with full knowledge that it was there was justified in running into it, see *Louisville & N. those agents, whose duties it is to enforce and comply with them. Madden v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695.

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 877, 28 L. ed. 787, the court stated that there was a clear distinction to be made in relation to their common principal, between the servants of a corporation exercising no supervision over others engaged with them in the same employment, and agents of a corporation clothed with the control and management of a distinct department, in which their duty was entirely that of superintendence and discretion.

Those who are co-workers in the same common enterprise, under the same master, and compensated by him, are fellow servants, and the difference in wages or work does not affect the question if the general business is the same. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes, 49 Miss. 258.

Prima facie, all servants of a common master employed in running, operating, and rendering service with a train of cars, are fellow servants. Blessing v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 410; McGowan v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 61 Mo. 523.

To constitute fellow servants, the employé need not be at the same time engaged in the same particular work, it is sufficient if they are in the employment of the same master engaged in the same common work, and performing duties and services for the same general purpose. Lewis v. Selfert, 116 Pa. 623.

If there are facts that show that the relation of fellow servant does not really exist between all such servants, the burden of showing such facts is on him who seeks to avail himself of the absence or non-existence of such relation. Blessing v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. and McGowan v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. supra; Toner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 69 Wis. 133.

The question is a mixed one of law and fact to be determined by the jury on the facts, under suitable instructions from the court as to the law. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71; Mullan v. Philadelphia & S. Mall S. S. Co. 78 Pa. 25, 21 Am. Rep. 2; Potter v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 46 Iowa, 390; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover (Md.) post 710.

In order to constitute servants of the same master "fellow servants" within the rule respondet superior, it is not enough that they are engaged in parts of some work or in the promotion of some enterprise carried on by the master not requiring co-operation, nor bringing the servants together or into such personal relations that they can exercise an influence upon each other promotive of proper caution in respect of their mutual safety, but it is essential that they should be at the time of the injury directly co-operating with each other in the particular business in hand, or that their usual duties should bring them into habitual co-association so that they may exercise an influence upon each other promotive of proper caution. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Moranda, 108 Ill. 576, 582.

No general rule can be formulated for all cases, and therefore each case must to some extent be governed by the peculiar circumstances attending it. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry, 58 Ark. 196.

The liability of the railroad company for injuries

In response to the contention that the train order should have told the engineer to watch out and run slowly around curves, see Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Parker, 181 Ill. 557, where it is held: "Rules requiring the engineer when his view is obstructed to control his train so as to be able to stop within the range of his vision; to run delayed trains with great caution and at all times under full control; to approach stations with reduced speed and with care,—simply call attention specifically to the exercise of that care which the law imposes upon every engineer."

It is immaterial that these men are hired and paid by a common employer, and that their employment is designed to accomplish one common result. Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 52 Mo. 269; Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 560.

When servants are of the same department of service, and one has authority to control the action of the other, the company will be responsible for the gross negligence of the servant superior in authority, and where the servants are not engaged in the same department, but in the same common employment, the company is liable for their ordinary neglect. McLeod v. Ginther, supra.

It is not responsible, however, where they are co-equal in power, authority, and degree, unless the negligence is fixed upon the company or its agents, who are superior in rank to the injured servant, or who are not engaged in the same department of service. Ibid.

The servant does not assume the risks of the negligence of another servant, where the latter is engaged in a different department of the work of service. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. De Armond, 86 Tenn. 73.

It is not a question as to the rank of the individual who gives the order or performs the act, but it is a question as to the character of the order or act, whether it is one which is given or performed as an order or act of the master in his character as such, or only as an order or act delegated by the master to another and performed by such other as an employé. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, post, 396, reversing 55 Hun, 51.

The relation of a representative, in the sense requisite to render the performance of an act of the servant that of the principal, does not necessarily depend upon his rank in the service, but upon the character of the act he is called upon to perform. Monaghan v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 45 Hun, 118; Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516, 37 Am. Rep. 521.

II. Special principles against the relation.

If the defendant owes a duty as master to give orders, as to trains, or to take due and reasonable care to give them, the failure to perform that duty is the failure of the master in his character as such, although he intrusted the performance of the duty to the train dispatcher. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, post, 396, reversing 55 Hun, 51.

A train dispatcher is the corporation for the time being, and exercises powers which neither the superintendent nor the president, nor any other officer or agent of the corporation, can interfere with. Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 500, 78 Mich. 518.

He controls the movements of trains, and the conductor has far less discretion than he has, when he shall start, where he shall stop and how he shall run his train; so stated in Blessing v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 410; Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 560.

him. He is the agent through whom the corporation attempts to perform its duty. He acts in its name, by its authority, and in its stead. Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. supra.

His order is imperative and requires implicit obedience on the part of the engineer, of which obedience he does not know the consequences, but the company does or should know them. Ibid.

Disobedience or deviation being subversive of order and discipline, destructive in its consequences and a just cause for immediate dismissal. Ibid.

Neither the engineer nor the conductor has any voice in running a train by special order, but is simply charged with the duty of carrying out the orders that come to them from the train dispatcher's office. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. supra.

In emergencies such employé must promptly obey the orders of any superior officers, and if such be one of the rules, the company thereby making the order of that officer, whoever he may be and whatever grade he may be, its own, and if the order is an improper one and if in executing it another employé is injured, the company is responsible, and in such a case the grade of service is material. Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. supra.

If, therefore, the engineer conforms to the order as he is bound to, and while so conforming and as a direct consequence thereof, is injured, reason, justice, and law require that the company shall be held responsible. Ibid.

In holding a train dispatcher not to be a fellow servant with a fireman, the court in Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. supra, did not consider that it ran counter of the doctrine recognized by the courts in relation to fellow servants to the effect that "it is sufficient if they are in the employment of the same master, engaged in the same common work, and performing duties and services for the same general purposes. The rule is the same though the one injured may be inferior in grade, and is subject to the control and direction of the superior whose act caused the injury, provided they are both operating to effect the same common object" inasmuch that such rule could not be applied when the superior causing the injury represents the master, it always being a subject of inquiry to ascertain the nature and extent of the authority of the superior whose negligence caused the injury, and if his authority and duties are such as the master must necessarily, either personally or by another, exercise and discharge them, the above rule does not apply. Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 500, 78 Mich. 518.

Where it is apparent that the train dispatcher exercises his discretion in ordering the running of a train, and that disobedience of these orders would be the negligence of the servant for which the defendant would not be liable, yet any defect or imperfection in the orders, or in their communication, would be the negligence of the defendant, and that question one of fact for the jury. McChesney v. Panama R. Co. 49 N. Y. S. R. 148.

The holding that a train dispatcher in the dispatch of trains performs for the master a duty which it owes as such is not a new departure in the branch of the law as to master and servant. Han-

The blame for the collision was all upon the men running the special, and they were the fellow servants of the plaintiff, as, indeed, were also the men in charge of the freight train.

It is immaterial that these men are hired and paid by a common employer, and that the employment is designed to accomplish one common result. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Rosa, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787; Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 53 Am. Rep. 590.

The distinction between a general dispatcher, one who has the absolute control of all the trains upon the road, and the conductor or engineer, is manifest, the latter having the duty of obedience, their business being to run their trains under orders from the dispatcher, and therefore if an employé is injured as a result of their negligence, the company is not liable. Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 633.

The duty of the train dispatcher does not go further than to use reasonable care, measured by the gravity of the interests at stake, to give originally correct orders; and if such orders are correct as originally given, and subsequently through the negligence of some employé are incorrectly interpreted or copied, or mistaken or repeated, or delivered to a wrong person, it has been stated that there might be reason for the application of the doctrine as to the negligence of a co-employé. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. post, 396, 142 N. Y. 416, reversing 55 Hun, 51.

The duty of a train dispatcher pertains to management and direction, and the duty of a locomotive engineer pertains to obedience. Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 92 Mo. 350.

A train dispatcher is to be regarded as a representative of the company. Ibid.

The question as to whether or not a train dispatcher violated one or all of the rules of the company is not material, where the defendant has not performed its whole duty in promulgating rules; neither is it a defense when it is shown that if a train dispatcher had obeyed the rules the accident would not have occurred. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. supra.

Where the facts did not show that the relation of fellow servants did not really exist, the burden of showing such facts being upon the plaintiff to show that the deceased, an engineer, was not a fellow servant of the train dispatcher. Blessing v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 410.

Safety in running train requires the prompt and faithful discharge of the duties of all these employé, and their co-operation and combined labor relate to the same object and are essential to the movement of trains upon the road. Robertson v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 78 Ind. 77, 41 Am. Rep. 552.

The mere fact that the duties of some of the employé are performed upon the train, and those of others at a particular place upon the road does not determine the question of their common employment. Ibid.

If the duties discharged by each relate to the same general object, they must be held to be fellow servants. Ibid.

It is enough if they are employed for the purpose of effecting the same general object. Ibid.

In the above case the court considered the engineers and firemen were coemployé with the telegraph dispatcher, in the same common employment 25 L. R. A.

operating trains, and came within the definition of fellow servants who are coemployé, and that therefore the negligence of the operator was not the negligence of the company. McKaig v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 238.

III. Train dispatcher.

a. Not a fellow servant.

In Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Barry, 58 Ark. 198, the plaintiff was a fireman, and the facts showed that the superintendent had instructed the conductor of the special to keep a sharp lookout for the freight; that the latter told the engineer that the freight was in the bottom and that he must keep a sharp lookout for it; that the officers of the freight had no knowledge or information that the special was behind; that the orders for the government of the trains, as to how they should run, where they should stop, etc., were given by a train dispatcher and were required by the rules of the company to be in writing, verbal orders not being permitted; that it was a train dispatcher's duty to give orders to the different trains; that he controlled their movements and was to keep himself informed as to their whereabouts,—the court held, under the circumstances of the case, that, the movement of the trains being under the direction and control of the train dispatcher, in directing and controlling their movements he was performing a master's duty and was not a fellow servant with the plaintiff, but was the representative of the company for whose negligence, if any, resulting in injury, the company was liable.

In an action for injuries received by the plaintiff, a laborer, employed by the defendant company in repairing the road, through a train sent out by the material agent and train dispatcher, with no light except the usual conductor's light, easily mistaken for a light at the side of the road, it was held that such laborer was not a fellow employé with such train dispatcher, within the meaning of section 1970 of the California Civil Code, as he represented the company, was a vice-principal, employed and discharged men and directed the movements of the trains. McKune v. California Southern R. Co. 96 Cal. 302.

Where a laborer upon the defendant's road was injured by a train which was dispatched off schedule time of which the laborer had no notice, it was held the company was liable. Haynes v. East Tennessee & G. Railroad, 3 Coldw. 222.

So where the negligence of a train dispatcher was admitted but the defendant claimed that it was that of a fellow servant, the plaintiff being a locomotive engineer, the court held that the train dispatcher and such engineer were not fellow servants. Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590.

A train dispatcher or division superintendent of a railroad company under whose orders trains are run, is not in the same line of employment as an engineer who runs a locomotive over such road with a train attached, under the orders of such train dispatcher or division superintendent. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Young, 26 Ill. App. 115. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McAllen, 84 Ill. 109, to the same effect. The division superintendent or train dispatcher

The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the train dispatcher was a fellow servant with the fireman.

This court has always held that those engaged in a common business, and in the service of a common master, are fellow servants, and has never lent its countenance to the distinctions which some courts make, based upon grades of service and difference of departments. In accordance with the ancient authorities it considers all who are co-operating towards a common end to be fellows in the service.

who stands in his shoes and acts in his name, and has full control of the running of trains, stands, in respect to the engineers and train conductors whose movements he directs and orders,—is the representative of the master; and such employees are bound to regard and obey his commands as the commands of the master, and there is no room for a difference of opinion in respect to the status of the parties. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Young, 26 Ill. App. 115.

A train dispatcher is a vice-principal or substitute for the company, and not a mere fellow servant in common employment with the fireman or trainmen, and therefore if he is negligent the company is also negligent. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Kanaley, 39 Kan. 1.

In an action for damages for the willful neglect of the company's servants in sending dispatches to two conductors of trains, which were to run on the same day over the same part of its road, the negligence consisting of the wording of the dispatch so as to mislead the conductors, it was held that the company was liable for the conductor's death caused by a collision of the trains, owing to the misconstruction of such dispatch. McLeod v. Ginther, 80 Ky. 399.

Where the train dispatcher habitually performs, in the name of a superintendent of a railroad, certain of the latter's duties in his absence, with the company's sanction, the company will be liable for injuries sustained by an employee acting under the orders of such train dispatcher, within the scope of the delegated authority, in the same manner as if such directions were issued by the superintendent himself. Leaky v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 83 Me. 461.

In Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 7 L. R. A. 500, 78 Mich. 513, it was held that a train dispatcher was not a fellow servant with employees of the company who acted in obedience to his orders. Where the train dispatcher was guilty of negligence in informing the engineer of the defendant company of a meeting place upon the defendant's line, and in instructing one of them to wait at such point, in consequence of which the fireman was killed, it was held the company was liable, the fireman and train dispatcher not being fellow servants.

Where the evidence showed that the train dispatcher had the sole and exclusive control in directing the movement of trains on the division of the defendant's road, and that the conductors and engineers were subject to them, it was held they were not fellow servants so as to exclude the liability of the company for an injury sustained through the negligence of such train dispatcher. Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 92 Mo. 359.

The mere fact that the orders given by the train dispatcher were verbal instead of written, where the rules call for the latter, makes no difference. Ibid.

The rule would seem to be settled that the act of a train dispatcher vested with a discretion, is the act of the company and not that of a fellow servant, and that any negligence of his in the exercise of that discretion must be treated as the negligence of the company. McChesney v. Panama R. Co. 49 N. Y. S. R. 143.

was running his train under the orders of the train dispatcher of the company, and was guilty of no contributory negligence, the injury sustained by him resulting from the negligence or mistake of the train dispatcher, or master of trains, in running a special or irregular passenger train not in conformity with the rules prescribed by the company for the running of trains, the court held that if the authority conferred upon the train dispatcher or train master by the company under its rules vested in him any discretion as to the time or manner of dispatching trains, and gave him any power to change the time of starting or running trains from those fixed in the time-tables by the company, then to the extent of that discretionary authority he was the alter ego of the defendant and his negligence that of the company. Ibid.

In Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 142 N. Y. 416, post, 386, reversing 55 Hun, 51, the court held that a fireman on a freight train was not a fellow servant of the train dispatcher.

Where trains were being run without regard to the ordinary time-tables, and several hours late proceeding in opposite directions each approaching the other in entire ignorance of the other's whereabouts, both being necessarily dependent upon the special orders received from the train dispatcher, the company were held liable for his negligence. Hankins v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. supra.

In the above case the plaintiff's train was several hours behind its schedule time, and its movements were entirely controlled by special telegraphic orders from the train dispatcher at his office at a given station, and it was while obeying such telegraphic orders that the plaintiff sustained his injury. Ibid.

Where the plaintiff's intestate, a fireman upon a freight train, was killed owing to the negligence of the company's agent who was called a head conductor, whose business it was to make up the morning trains, hire and station the brakemen, and generally to prepare and dispatch these trains, in not supplying a sufficient number of brakemen to the freight train, the hinder part of which became detached and caused the accident, no brakeman being upon the same, it was held the company was liable. Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 550, 13 Am. Rep. 545.

In the above case the train in question was sent out with only two brakemen, where three were required. Ibid.

In Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 91 N. Y. 332, instead of communicating with the engineer and conductor, the defendant communicated with the telegraph operator and told him to hold the train for orders. The court held that the train was subject to his will, and the object in view became dependent upon his memory and his faithfulness in obeying the order, and the probabilities of its attainment were thereby lessened, and that to secure certainty the defendant should have so communicated with its conductor and engineer, that these servants would understand the object.

In Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co., 23 N. Y. S. R. 201, the action was for the death of the plaintiff's husband, an engineer, caused by the negligence of a train dispatcher, who also performed the service

Railway v. Gaines, supra; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Triplett, 11 L. R. A. 773, 54 Ark. 289.

Among the cases adopting our view are:

v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 61, 39 Am. Rep. 627; Ross v. Boston & A. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 217.

The court erred in instructing the jury that they might allow for expenses of sickness when none were proved.

Owens v. Chandler, 16 Ark. 651; Morton v. Scull, 23 Ark. 289; Dickerson v. Johnson, 24 Ark. 251; Burke v. Snell, 42 Ark. 58; Little of master, the facts showing that deceased was behind time and running in obedience to the dispatcher's orders; that he was to stop for these wherever he saw a red flag; that he had no knowledge as to other trains and knew that the dispatcher had; that having a good opportunity to make speed he made it relying upon being reported from the station he passed; that he looked out for the red flag at a certain point and found none and concluded that the dispatcher did not want him to stop, relying upon this better knowledge, that he was not to meet a certain train, nor to wait, and must run on. The court held that the jury having considered the facts and the question whether the deceased was acting carefully and according to the lights he had, and that whether, notwithstanding his better judgment, he was misled by the fatal omission of the red flag, and having found that he acted properly, the verdict against the company would not be disturbed.

In the same case reported in 35 N. Y. S. R. 853, 125 N. Y. 737, it was held that the jury could not infer negligence in the company in the employment of a telegraph operator who was only seventeen years of age, he having a year's experience and having been in the employ of the company for three months prior to the accident as a first-class operator.

In Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co., 73 N. Y. 33, 29 Am. Rep. 97, a parallel case with that of Filke v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra, the company was held liable, the plaintiff's intestate being an engineer of a freight train which was dispatched without a sufficient number of brakemen.

A railroad company is bound to supply a sufficient number of brakemen upon starting a train, and for a neglect of this duty they will be responsible in damages in the absence of contributory negligence, even though the negligence in dispatching the train was that of a fellow servant. Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra.

In Lewis v. Selfert, 116 Pa. 623, the question was whether a locomotive engineer in the employ of the defendant was a fellow servant of the train dispatcher, within the meaning of the rule which holds that the master is not responsible for an injury received by an employé caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, and the court held that they were not fellow servants.

Where the general train dispatcher had the general power and authority of moving trains without interference by the company or any one else, and for that purpose wielded all the power of the company, his position being such that he could send out a train on schedule time or hold it back, could change the schedule time or make new schedules as the exigency of the case required, could send a train out without schedule and direct its movements, his orders in this respect being such as must be obeyed by those having charge of the train, it was held that such train dispatcher was not a fellow servant with the engineer and conductor. Lewis v. Selfert, supra.

In Washburn v. Nashville & C. R. Co., 3 Head, 603, 75 Am. Dec. 784, the company was held liable for the negligence of the superintendent in starting a train out of time, without any precaution whatever to avoid a collision with a train coming in the opposite direction, whereby the plaintiff, an engineer in the employ of the company, was injured.

In an action to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's minor son, caused by the negligence of the defendant acting through its superintendent and train dispatcher, in sending conflicting telegrams to two trains directly and completely under his control and management by virtue of the office he held, the court held the negligence was that of the corporation, as much so as though the owners or directors had sent the message, and that the deceased, an employé of the company, riding on the train at the time of the collision, to his work, which was that of quarrying rock on the defendant's land was not a fellow servant. Galveston, H. & S. R. Co. v. Arispe, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 611. A rehearing in the above case was denied, Id. 617.

A general manager who prescribes rules, or a train dispatcher who gives special orders, is not a fellow servant with the employés in charge of the train. Phillips v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 64 Wis. 475.

Under § 1816a of the Wisconsin Annotated Statutes, vol. I, p. 1090, ed. of 1889, every railroad corporation doing business in the state of Wisconsin is liable for damages sustained by any employé thereof within the state without contributory negligence on his part, when such damage is caused by the negligence of any train dispatcher, telegraph operator, superintendent, yard master, conductor, or engineer, or of any other employé who has charge or control of any stationary signal, target point, block, or switch.

The negligence of the persons who are employed by a railroad company to direct the movement of trains by telegraph or otherwise, such as a train dispatcher or train master, is not chargeable to a person occupying the position of a mere fireman. Crew v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 87.

The negligence of such persons is the negligence of the company, provided the evidence proves such negligence. Ibid.

The train dispatcher is the superior of all persons running the trains, and in a limited degree he has all persons in that service under his authority so that he may not be a fellow servant with any of these persons when his negligence causes their injury. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark, 57 Fed. Rep. 125; Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 384; Dana v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 92 N. Y. 639; Lewis v. Selfert, 116 Pa. 623.

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark, supra, the court stated that the trend of recent decisions, especially in the state courts, was to make the orders of a train dispatcher the orders of the company, and his negligence in the control and running of trains the negligence of the company for whom he acted, the reason being that the power and authority of such train dispatcher when running trains under telegraphic orders was and must be supreme; and that the company having thus delegated supreme authority in the special service should be responsible for any negligence of the train dispatcher.

It has been assumed as settled law that the negligence of the chief train dispatcher was the negligence of the company, and that the latter would be liable for any injury done by such negligence.

Rock & Ft. S. Railway v. Townsend, 41 Ark. 332; Little Rock & Ft. S. Railway v. Trotter, 37 Ark. 594; Johnson v. State, 36 Ark. 242.

Messrs. W. L. Terry and J. M. Moore for appellee.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee was fireman on a special passenger train of the appellant, which came in collision with a freight train standing on the main track of the appellant's road, at Forrest City. The appellee, perceiving that a collision would occur, jumped from his position on the special train, believing, as he testified, that it was necessary for him to do so to save his life. He was, as the evidence tends to show, injured thereby, and upon the verdict of a jury rebut a distinction is drawn between a chief train dispatcher and a telegraph operator. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark, supra.

It is the duty of a railway company to devise some suitable and safe method of running special and irregular trains so as to avoid collision, and when the method employed is to have the trains controlled by a train dispatcher, the latter as to employees in charge of trains, stands in the place of the company. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 23 L. ed. 787; Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590.

A railroad company is liable for the negligence of a train dispatcher, which results in the death of one of the servants of the company. Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 500, 78 Mich. 512.

b. A fellow servant.

In Robertson v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co., 78 Ind. 77, 41 Am. Rep. 352, it was held that the brakeman and a train dispatcher were fellow servants, and that the brakeman could not recover against the company for injuries sustained through the negligence of such dispatcher.

The duties of the train dispatcher and the brakeman are quite distinct, but no more so than the duties of the trackman or switch tender, and the brakeman. Robertson v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. supra.

In an action for the death of the plaintiff's intestate while acting as a fireman, which occurred in a collision through the negligence of the defendant's train dispatcher charged with the duty of directing the movements of trains, the court held that the train dispatcher was the fellow servant of the intestate. Millisaps v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 60 Miss. 423.

Where damages were claimed for the death of a husband, an engineer in charge of a pay car which collided with a freight train, the facts showing that the trains were not on time, and that the train dispatcher at a certain place instructed the freight train "to get orders at" a given point, which orders were not at the point when such conductor arrived there, whereupon he proceeded and the collision ensued, it was held the plaintiff could not recover, the negligence being that of a fellow servant. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Doyle, 60 Miss. 377.

So where the evidence, which was meager, showed that the train dispatcher controlled the movement of trains, and that the conductor had far less discretion than he as to when he should start, where he should stop, and how he should run his train, and there was no further evidence showing that the train dispatcher and engineer were not fellow servants, the court ordered a nonsuit. Blessing v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 410.

In Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579, the plaintiff's intestate, an engineer, was killed through the negligence of the train dispatcher, who was competent at the time he entered into the service of the company, but subsequently became incompetent, owing to the use of intoxicating liquors, for which he was reprimanded but allowed to continue in the service, it was held the company was not liable, having no notice of the change in the habits of such dispatcher, which would be sufficient to put a reasonable man upon his guard.

Where the train on which the plaintiff's intestate was a brakeman was sent out within three or four minutes after another train, and was itself followed by a third train at about the same distance of time, the injury which resulted in the death of the brakeman resulting from the trains being sent out so near together, but by whose direction it did not appear, the court held, the plaintiff not having made out a clear case, that the company was not liable for the negligence in observing the regulations regarding the starting of trains, or in the disobedience, unless there be proof of other negligence. Rose v. Boston & A. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 217; Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 553, 18 Am. Rep. 545, distinguished.

In the above case the company's time-tables were not produced, and no evidence was adduced as to the company's regulations as to the starting of trains, or as to whose duty it was to start them, and there was no evidence that any agent or officer had general authority upon the question. It was held there was no negligence imputable to the company, as its proper regulations might have been violated by a fellow servant, and the presumption was in favor of such being the case no evidence to the contrary being adduced. Rose v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover (Md.) post, —, the train dispatcher was held a fellow servant with an engine man upon the ground that he was a subordinate, subject to the control of the superintendent, being appointed by him, even though he had charge of the trainmen and of the train's movements, with power to employ and discharge flagmen and brakemen, the evidence not showing that the master had relinquished all control over the division and intrusted its direction, as well as the procuring of materials and machinery and other instrumentalities necessary for the service to his judgment and discretion, the engine man not being employed by him.

The evidence was not sufficient in the court's view to prove the train dispatcher a vice-principal, although it would seem to have been sufficient according to the decisions.

Where the defendant's track was operated by means of regular trains moving at times prearranged and noted on cards or time-tables, and also by occasional trains moving without prearrangement but by special order without reference to schedule or regular trains, conforming to no conditions except the immediate order of the owner, which were styled "wild" or "wild cat" trains, of the latter kind the plaintiff being foreman running irregularly and not according to schedule, the collision being occasioned by the failure of the telegraph operator and train dispatcher to communicate direct with the conductor and engineer, and to exercise reasonable precaution with regard to the dispatch of such trains, the court, distinguishing the case from Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 61, 20 Am. Rep. 627, infra, upon the ground that in that case the defendant had changed the time of the running of its trains after setting in motion a series of operations designed to carry personal notice to its covered judgment against the appellant for $10,000, to reverse which the case was brought here on appeal. The road is a single-track road, and the special and the freight were both coming west when the collision occurred. Between Edmonson and Forrest City there was no telegraph station, but there was one at Edmonson, and one at Hopefield, which places are east of Forrest City, on the appellant's road, and west of Memphis. The testimony shows that the freight train left Edmonson at 9:40 A. M., and that it was then about three hours behind its schedule time, and that it did not reach Forrest City until 1:35 or 1:50 P. M., the same day. It was due at 7:45 A. M., but was over five hours and thirty minutes late, having been delayed between Edmonson and Forrest City by the breaking in two of the employés of the intended change, and to bring to the master an acknowledgment in writing that he had received notice of it, the failure being the omission of the duty of a fellow servant, whereas the plaintiff in that case was bound to travel as ordered, the defendant being bound to the exercise of reasonable precaution, and its failure to give notice was a question for the jury, the court affirming the verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 81 N. Y. 333.

IV. Telegraph operator.

a. Not a fellow servant.

A fireman on an engine and a telegraph operator are engaged in different departments or "about a different piece of work" in the meaning of the Mississippi Constitution of 1890, section 193. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Hunter, 70 Miss. 471.

The operator is not in the same department with the trainmen, nor engaged in the same branch of the common employer's service, and although not in person the superior of the trainmen to whom he delivers orders, having no right or power to issue orders on his own motion, he is in a sense their superior, being the arm or mouth-piece of the train dispatcher or superintendent, and in a qualified degree the vice-principal. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. De Armond, 85 Tenn. 73.

In East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. De Armond, supra, the plaintiff was a conductor upon the defendant's road, and was injured owing to the negligence of a telegraph operator, who it was claimed was a fellow servant of the conductors, whose negligence the latter assumed as one of the risks of his employment. The court held they were not fellow servants, such operator being engaged in a different department and in the capacity of a vice principal, his duty being to communicate the instructions of the superintendent, with regard to the dispatching of trains.

A telegraph operator is employed in a separate branch of the service and under the control of other officers of the company and is the superior servant in the line of his duty. The engineer is subject to his orders or the control of those who are so subject. Madden v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695.

Where the mistake, which caused the death of the plaintiff's intestate, was produced by the mistake in writing or in reading the copies of a telegraphic order by the agents of the defendant, it was held that the deceased, an engineer, was not the fellow servant of a conductor on another train, nor of the telegraph operator who dispatched the message, so as to preclude recovery, gross negligence being shown. Madden v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. supra.

In Hall v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. 89 Fed. Rep. 18, where the action was brought to recover damages resulting from the death of plaintiff's son, a brakeman, caused through the negligence of the telegraph operator, the court held that the rule of law as to fellow servants did not exempt the defendant from liability for the negligence of the operator, if the injuries of the deceased resulted from such negligence, as the operator and deceased did not occupy with reference to each other the attitude of fellow servants so as to exempt an em-

In the above case the rules of the defendant company showed that it was the duty of the operator "to report defects in roads or bridges, or obstructions of any kind wherever met, to the superintendent, and if possible to the nearest section master or bridge foreman," and in answer to the defendant's contention that it was not the duty of such operator to report unless requested to do so by an employé of the company, the court held that it was his duty to make reports whether he was requested to do so or not, if he knew of the existence of the rules. Hall v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. supra.

Where the operator was only seventeen years old at the time of the accident, but had performed his duty without fault or negligence and was of good intelligence, the question of his competency was left for the jury who found for the plaintiff. Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 28 N. Y. S. R. 201.

Upon appeal the judgment of the court below was reversed, but it would seem to have been upon the ground that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in not observing the rules of the company and rushing on to his destruction because he saw no red flag at the junction, and without bearing in mind that he was running at a higher rate of speed than warranted by the rules of the company. Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737.

b. A fellow servant.

In Dana v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 23 Hun. 473, it was held that a telegraph operator and an engineer were fellow servants, and that the company was not liable for the death of the engineer caused by the negligence of the telegraph operator, who misinterpreted a message received by him with regard to the engineer's train which caused his death, the court holding that the risk which caused the death of the engineer was one which he assumed upon entering into the company's service.

Where the telegraph operator was charged with important duties at a certain point, imposing upon him the controlling and directing of the movements of trains there, within the system which the rule provided for that particular locality, and did not make him the alter ego of the defendant, the court held the service required of him was within and subordinate to a department of the business of the company, in the performance of which he necessarily exercised discretion and judgment in giving preference by signal in the movement of trains on to a single track, with view to the safety and protection of persons and property, and for the orderly operation of the road, but that did not make his judgment that of the company as between it and its employé, and that it was only a grade in relation of coemployé, and it was sufficient that he was competent, and that therefore he was a fellow servant with the locomotive engineer running a train on such single track. Monaghan v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 45 Hun. 113.

In an action to recover damages for the death of an intestate, caused by the collision upon a road operated by the defendant as receiver, through train. The special train left Memphis at 11:40 A. M., left Hopefield at about 12:35 P. M., and passed Edmonson at 12:54 the same day. The superintendent of the road told the conductor of the special to keep a sharp lookout for the freight, and the conductor told the engineer of the special that the freight was in the bottom,—the country between the Mississippi and St. Francis rivers,—and that he must keep a sharp lookout for it. Just east of Forrest City, through Croley's ridge, there is a deep cut, and a reverse curve on the road in the shape of the letter S. The freight train was a heavy and long one, and could not sidetrack at Forrest City, and the rear cars of the freight train extended back into this cut at Croley's ridge. When the special reached this cut, its whistle was sounded, but very soon after it ran into the freight cars. The freight train had been at the station at Forrest City only about one minute, according to the testimony of the engineer of the freight, when the accident happened. The officers of the freight train, it appears, had no knowledge or information that the special was behind it. The orders for the government of the trains as to how they should run, where they should stop, etc., were given by a train dispatcher, and are required by the rules of the company to be in writing, and verbal orders are not permitted. The testimony shows that it is the train dispatcher's duty to give orders to the different trains; that he controls their movements, and should keep himself informed as to their whereabouts. The only orders given to the conductor and engineer of the special, as shown by the testimony, were those mentioned in the testimony of J. H. Bard, the telegraph operator at Forrest City, which are the following:

"Little Rock & Memphis Railroad. Telegraph Train Order No. 5.

"Memphis, Oct. 26, 1890.

"To C. & E. of Eng. 5, Hopefield; C. & E. No. 5, Forrest City; C. & E. Eng. 4 and No. 6, Brinkley: Engine 5 will run from Hopefield to Argenta extra. When No. 5 is overtaken, pass and run ahead of them. Meet No. 6 and engine 4 at Brinkley. Do not pass Brinkley unless engine 3 is there.

negligence of the conductor on the meeting train co-operating with the negligence of a telegraph operator at a station on the defendant's road, the latter having omitted to give to the engineer the orders received from the train dispatcher as to the place where the two trains should meet, which his instructions required him to do, and having reported a performance of such duty and the former having signed the engineer's name without his knowledge to an acknowledgment and receipt of the order, and then having failed to communicate the order to him, in consequence of which the engineer went on with his train instead of waiting at the station designated until the other train came up, it was held that the company was not liable, the negligence being that of the intestate's fellow servants. Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 61, 30 Am. Rep. 627.

In Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 91 N. Y. 322, a telegraph operator instructed to hold a train for orders, repeated the telegram back to the superintendent and instructed the conductor of the train to hold it for a certain other train without exhibiting or delivering any message, there being no rule of the company specifically requiring him so to do, although there was a rule that whenever any agent or operator received orders to hold any train, he must carry them out strictly. An accident occurring in consequence of the order delivered to such conductor, it was left to the jury to say whether the defendant had omitted anything which it ought reasonably to have done to prevent the accident, and the court held that there was no error in such instruction, the defendant being bound to use all reasonable precautions and that its failure to instruct the conductor and engineer directly was a question for the jury.

Where the plaintiff's intestate, an engineer, was killed through the negligence of a telegraph operator at one of the stations on the defendant's road, in failing to notify the conductor of the train of a fact telegraphed to him from the station ahead, which would require him to slacken speed and to cross over a switch on to another track at a given point in consequence of which the engine driven by the intestate jumped the track and caused his death, the court held that the telegraph operator, who was also a station agent, was a fellow servant with the engineer, adhering rigidly to the doctrine that the servant assumes the risks of his employment and that the master does not warrant his safety therein. Dealey v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 112.

In the above case the court considered the powers and duties of the telegraph operator very narrow and limited, his main duty being the receipt and delivery of messages regarding the running of trains upon the roadway, in which he was merely the automaton or communicator to give the information as to the condition of the track ahead of the moving train, and part of the general machinery by which the whole roadway was operated, and that his other duties did not enlarge his powers in any respect. Ibid.

In McKaig v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 42 Fed. Rep. 238, the relation which a telegraph operator bore to engineers, firemen, and others running trains on the road was the question involved, the negligence being that of the operator in not signaling the train and delivering special orders sent him by the train dispatcher, who was running the trains that collided, by telegraph, the case turning upon the alleged negligence of the telegraph operator in not putting up the proper signals and stopping the train as ordered by the dispatcher. The court sustained a motion to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, upon the ground that the telegraph operator was a fellow servant of the plaintiff and therefore the railroad company was not liable.

Where a locomotive fireman was killed, owing to the negligence of a telegraph operator in putting out a proper signal for passing trains, and thus seeing that no train passed within ten minutes of another, the court held that they were fellow servants and that no action could be maintained by the representatives of the fireman against the company; the service of putting out such signals could properly have been imposed upon a station agent or a signal man, and that therefore the telegraph operator was not a vice-principal of the railroad company. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark, 57 Fed. Rep. 125.

In Price v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 145 U. S. 651, 36 L. ed. 843, a telegraph operator at the station, by whose negligence an accident occurred, was held a fellow servant with an engineer who was killed, but the decision was that of a divided court.

E. W.

"Conductor and engineer must each have a copy of this order.

"Time received 12:23 P. M. O. K. Given at 12:23 P. M.

Conductor.	Train.	Made.	At	Received by
Heth	Eng. 5.	Complete	12:23 P. M.	G.
Hedrick	No. 5.	"	2:44 P. M.	B.
Fennecsey	Eng. 4.	"	6:20 P. M.	Fl.
Kearns	No. 6.	"	6:45 P. M.	Fl."

It is contended by the appellant that under its rules these orders were sufficient, and by the appellee that under the circumstances of this case they were not sufficient.

The court refused to instruct the jury at the instance of the appellant as follows, to wit: "You are instructed that the engineer, conductor, and brakeman of the freight train and the train dispatcher were fellow servants of the plaintiff; and if you find that the accident resulted from the negligence of any of them, you will find for the defendant." The court modified this instruction by striking out the words, "and the train dispatcher," and gave it as modified. To this modification the appellant excepted. At the instance of the appellee the court gave to the jury the following instructions: "If you find for the plaintiff, in assessing his damages you may consider the character of the injuries received by him; how far they have disabled him, or may in the future disable him, from pursuing his ordinary occupation; and also the physical pain and suffering to which he has been, or may be in the future, subjected by reason of such injuries; the effect of the injury on his health; the past and prospective expenses of his sickness resulting from his injury,—and allow such damages as in your judgment would be a fair and just compensation for the same, not exceeding the amount sued for." To the giving of which the appellant excepted.

The only question we consider here is, Were these instructions obnoxious to the objections urged against them? Did the court err in modifying the third and in giving the fourth? There is an irreconcilable conflict of authority upon the vexed question, who are fellow servants? In Massachusetts it is held that all who are engaged in a common employment, working to accomplish a common result, are to be regarded as fellow servants. Many, and perhaps a majority, of the states, adopt this rule. But it is said that the tendency of recent decisions is to narrow this rule. In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 877-890, 28 L. ed. 787-792, the court said: "There is a clear distinction to be made in relation to their common principal between the servants of a corporation exercising no supervision over others engaged with them in the same employment and agents of a corporation clothed with the control and management of a distinct department, in which their duty is entirely that of superintendence and discretion." In Sherhan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 882, a superintendent and assistant superintendent, acting as train dispatchers, were held to be vice principals. In Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 120, it is held that the train dispatcher, in ordering the movement of trains, is to be regarded as the representative of the railroad company, where he has sole and exclusive control in directing their movements. In Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 53 Conn. 286, 52 Am. Rep. 590, it is held that it is the duty of the railroad company to devise some suitable and safe method of running special and irregular trains, so as to avoid collision; and, when the method employed is to have the trains controlled by a train dispatcher, the latter, as to employees in charge of trains, stands in the place of the company." The court said: "It is immaterial that these men are hired and paid by a common employer, and that the employment is designed to accomplish one common result. That argument, if pressed to its logical conclusion, would obliterate all distinctions between those engaged in railroad business, from the president down to the humblest servant, and would practically exempt the company from all duty and all liability to those in its service." See also Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McLallen, 84 Ill. 109. The decisions in Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, and Tennessee are substantially in harmony with the cases cited. It seems impossible to formulate any general rule for all cases. Each case must, to some extent, be governed by the peculiar circumstances attending it. In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, it was held that, under the circumstances of that case, a section boss and night watchman represented the company, the court saying: "Where the injuries are caused by the negligence of a servant, who is charged with the performance of duties which, by law, it is incumbent on the master to perform, such servant is regarded as the representative of the master; and in legal contemplation his negligence is the negligence of the master." 81 Va. 73. Judge Cooley says: "The master is not responsible to one person in his employ for an injury occasioned by the negligence of another in the same service, unless generally, or in respect of the particular duty then resting upon the negligent employé, the latter so far occupied the position of his principal as to render the principal so far chargeable for his negligence as for personal fault." Cooley, Torts, 564. Under the circumstances of this case, the movements of the trains being under the direction and control of the train dispatcher, in directing and controlling their movements he was performing the master's duty, and was not a fellow servant with the plaintiff, but the representative of the company, for whose negligence, if any, resulting in injury, the company is liable. There was, therefore, no error in the modification of the third instruction given for the appellant, as modified.

The fourth instruction—as to the measure of damages given for the appellee—is erroneous in this: that it told the jury they might consider as an element of the plaintiff's damages the past and prospective expenses of his sickness resulting from his injury, and allow such damages as in their judgment would be a fair and just compensation for the same, not exceeding the amount sued for. The only evidence in regard to expenses of plaintiff's sickness caused by the injury is his own, which is as follows: "I have paid the doctor all the money I had, after selling everything I had, and still owe him." How much this was is not shown. How, then, could the jury estimate it? They could not find the amount from the testimony, and there was, therefore, no evidence upon which to base this part of the instruction. It was calculated to mislead the jury, and make them think the damages were entirely at their discretion. How far it affected their finding we cannot tell. There were elements of speculative damages in the case contemplated in the framing of the instructions, and the jury were at liberty under it to think they were authorized to speculate as to the amounts of the past expenses of the plaintiff's sickness arising from his injury.

For the error in giving the part of this instruction referred to, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Rehearing denied.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Edward W. HANKINS, Appt.,

v.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE & WESTERN

(142 N. Y. 416.)

1. For negligence in respect to acts which the duty of the master to the servant requires to be performed, the master is liable if injury results to the employé, without regard to the rank or title of the agent whom he has intrusted with its performance.
2. A train dispatcher in sending special telegraph orders for the movement of trains, which are entirely controlled by such orders because they are behind time, is not a fellow servant of the fireman on one of such trains, but is, in respect to such duty acting as the master, as his alter ego.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Cattaraugus Circuit in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. Henderson, with Messrs. Thrasher & Bixby, for appellant:

To make a time-table, general or special, as in running trains under special orders, was the duty of the master, the performance of which could not be delegated to any servant of whatever rank, without making that servant the alter ego of the master and the master liable for his negligence in the performance of that duty. It was a duty which belonged to the master to perform for the safety of his servants and of the public. The running of trains was the primary business of the defendant, and a time-table, general or special, must govern or control, absolutely, every employé, and must necessarily emanate from the supreme head or authority whosesoever hand is used to promulgate and publish it.

Obedience to these orders when once promulgated and published is matter of exclusive detail which no corporation or general agent can personally oversee, and which must, from the nature of things be entrusted to employés, for whose negligence in their execution the corporation would not be liable.

Where the superintendent or overseer and directing servant is intrusted with the discharge of the duties incumbent upon the master as between him and the general servants, then the master may be held responsible for the omission of the manager or superintendent in respect to those duties intrusted to him which the master is bound to perform.

Mr. James H. Stevens, for respondent:

The plaintiff, being an employé, having knowledge of the rules and regulations of the company, which were sufficient, assumed the risks incident to the hazardous nature of the employment, including the negligence of his co-employés and his own.

Hickey v. Taaffe, 105 N. Y. 36.

The exception to this rule is whether the defendant, as master, has been guilty of a neglect of duty which it owed to the plaintiff and which caused the injuries received.

In Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 73, 39 Am. Rep. 627, Folger, Ch. J., says: "Expressed in general terms, that duty or contract is to supply the servant with suitable and safe machinery and appliances, with competent and skillful co-workers, and to make and promulgate sufficient rules and regulations for the conduct of the business in its ordinary run, and for any extraordinary occasions that may be reasonably anticipated."

Abel v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 103 N. Y. 586, 57 Am. Rep. 773; Corcoran v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 675; Morgan v. Hudson River Ore. & Iron Co. 133 N. Y. 667.

Because the master, the company, had given the dispatcher rules conceded to be ample and sufficient, that had been prepared with great care, were minute, explicit, and plain, and exceedingly well devised for safety, for personal guidance of the dispatcher himself, this case is distinguishable from the cases relied on by the plaintiff.

The work of the train dispatcher is one which cannot be performed by either the corporation or its general agent with convenience, and when the company furnishes that employé with such rules the master has performed his whole duty to plaintiff, a co-employé, who concededly had knowledge of this state of things, in distinction of these cases where the train dispatcher was given full power as master, without himself being controlled by the master.

Monaghan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 45 Hun, 116; Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516, 87 Am. Rep. 521.

The company has the power to perform the duty which it owed as master to this employé, that "when needs press to vary from his general time-table, to use due care and diligence in giving notice of the change, and in running the train upon the changed time," employing competent and skillful servants known as train dispatchers, with sufficient rules for their guidance in the performance of that duty, at the same time fully informing the employé to whom the company owes that duty of the existence and nature of such rules.

The following cases are quite distinguishable:

Ross v. Boston & A. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 217; Dana v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 93 N. Y. 640; Shiner v. Russell, 6 N. Y. 8. R. 79; Loughlin v. State, 105 N. Y. 163; Brick v. Rochester, N. Y. & P. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 216; Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 17 N. Y. 8. R. 397.

There being no dispute by the evidence given upon the trial as to the sufficiency of the rules adopted by the defendant, and in use at and prior to the accident, there was no question presented by the plaintiff's evidence for the consideration of the jury within the rules of law.

Berrigan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 131 N. Y. 532; Morgan v. Hudson River Ore & Iron Co. 133 N. Y. 666; Hurley v. Buffalo Car Mfg. Co. 142 N. Y. 31; Potter v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 136 N. Y. 77.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The nonsuit in this case was granted on the ground that, assuming the negligence of the train dispatcher, the plaintiff cannot recover, because it was the negligence of a fellow workman. Whether the train dispatcher bore that relation to the plaintiff is, in truth, the only question in the case.

The facts are not complicated, and those which we regard as material are as follows: The division upon which the accident happened extends from Dunkirk, on the west, to Hornellsville, on the east. The plaintiff was a fireman on a freight train (No. 840), which on the 19th of October, 1887, had started from Dayton, and arrived at Salamanca (a station on defendant's road, and within the above-named division) early in the morning, on its way east, towards Hornellsville; but the train had left Dayton and arrived at Salamanca several hours behind its schedule time, and its movements since leaving Dayton had been entirely controlled by special telegraphic orders from the train dispatcher, at his office, at Hornellsville. At 7:57 of the day mentioned the engineer and conductor of this train received, while at the Salamanca station, an order by telegraph from Hornellsville, and signed by the division superintendent and the train dispatcher, which order directed them to "meet trains 341, 339, and 349 at Carrollton, ahead of train 348." Carrollton was a station a few miles east of Salamanca. The train consisted of 113 cars, and was about half a mile in length, and it started to go east as far as Carrollton, under the above order, very soon, or within a few moments after the order was received. The west-bound train, No. 341, had arrived at Carrollton several hours behind its regular time, and it was also being run by special telegraphic orders from the train dispatcher's office at Hornellsville. While at Carrollton, on its way west, the conductor and engineer of this train received their telegraphic order at 8:43 A. M., which directed them to "meet train 334 at Carrollton, 348 at Salamanca; not pass Salamanca without orders." It was the duty of the conductor and engineer of this train, upon receipt of the order, to move their train west to Salamanca. This they at once proceeded to do. Neither the engineer nor the conductor has any voice in running a train by special order. They are simply charged with the duty of carrying out the orders that come to them from the train dispatcher's office. These orders to the conductors and engineers of the trains Nos. 340 and 341 were at once attempted to be carried out by them, and in consequence thereof the two trains came into collision not far from Carrollton, and between 9:05 and 9:10 A. M.

The plaintiff was fearfully injured, his leg being almost torn from his body, and he plinned down between the engine and tender, and very badly scalded by the hot water from the boiler of his engine. Amputation near the thigh was soon after performed; and the plaintiff, as might be assumed, suffered great agony from the injury, and is rendered a maimed and wrecked individual for the balance of his life. There is no question of contributory negligence in the case, and it cannot be contended that the plaintiff was at the time of the accident engaged in anything other than an honest and careful performance of his duty. If these orders were negligently given, the sole question as to defendant's liability becomes one of law. There was enough evidence as to negligence on the part of the train dispatcher in the giving of the orders to require the submission of the question to the jury, provided the defendant ought to be held liable for his negligence. It frequently becomes very difficult to determine whether the particular act, in any case, is that of the master, in his character as such, or is only that of a mere fellow servant. It is not a question as to the rank of the individual who gives the order or performs the act. The question is one as to the character of the order or act,—whether it is one which is given or performed as an order or act of the master, in his character as such, or only as an order or act delegated by the master to another, and performed by such other as an employé. The rule as to the liability of the master for the act of a servant is well known. Church, Ch. J., said in the Nike Case that the master must be held liable for negligence in respect to such acts or duties as he is required to perform as master, and without regard to the rank or title of the agent whom he has intrusted with its performance. Nike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 549, 18 Am. Rep. 545. This language was repeated in Orispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516, 37 Am. Rep. 521, where the liability of the master for the negligence of his servant, by which another servant has suffered injury, was said not to depend upon the doctrine respondet superior, but upon the omission of some duty of the master which he has confided to such inferior employé. If the act omitted were of the kind which the master owed to the employé the duty of performing, he would be responsible to the employé for the manner of its performance. It is not a question of rank among the different employés. The rule thus laid down has been since frequently approved in this court. Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 62, 39 Am. Rep. 627; Cullen v. Norton, 126 N. Y. 1. Its application to a particular case is sometimes difficult, and the boundary line between an act of the master and an act of the employé is sometimes quite vague and shadowy. In this case the evidence would seem to be quite conclusive that the defendant had fully discharged the duty which it owed its employés in the way of establishing and promulgating appropriate and sufficient rules and regulations for the government and operation of the various trains upon its road, and its furnishing general time-tables pertaining thereto. Whether the train dispatcher violated one or all of such rules is not material, in the view we take of the case, because the defendant had not performed its whole duty in promulgating rules, nor is a defense made out when it is shown that if the train dispatcher had obeyed the rules the accident would not have occurred. If the defendant owed a duty, as master, to give correct orders to these trains, or at least to take due and reasonable care to give them, the failure to perform that duty is the failure of the master, in his character as such, although he intrusted the performance of the duty to the train dispatcher. These trains were being run without regard to their ordinary time-tables. They were several hours late, proceeding in opposite directions, and each was approaching the other in entire ignorance of the other's whereabouts. Both were necessarily dependent upon the special orders they received from Hornellsville. As was said in the Slater Case, supra, the master had the right to vary from the regular time schedules laid down for these trains. It was part of the details incident to the operation of the road; but when a variation, or, in other words, when a special time-table is made out for two trains, by which they are to run, it is the duty of the master, not alone to take reasonable care that the alteration shall be made known to the parties interested, but also to take reasonable care that the variation ordered, and by which the trains are run, shall not necessarily or probably lead to disaster, when obediently carried out. Reasonable care in originating and formulating the order is necessary, and is the duty of the master. When the train dispatcher originates and promulgates such orders as were given in this case, he is acting as the master, or, as it is said, his alter ego; and the master is liable for the negligence of the agent he has employed to do his (the master's) particular work.

In this case it appears that the train dispatcher had his office at Hornellsville for the whole division, and that while he used the name of the division superintendent, in giving orders for the movement of trains, yet by the rules they were essentially his orders, and signed with his initials, in addition to those of the superintendent. It is not claimed that the division superintendent was even bound to know about these movements or special orders. There were three dispatchers at Hornellsville, but there was only one man at a time on duty, and his duty was for eight hours; and while on duty, by a rule of the company, no order could be issued by any other dispatcher. In this way, provision was made for full knowledge by each dispatcher of everything going on, on his division, as to the movement of trains during the time when he was on duty. It is said the accident resulted from a disobedience of these rules, in that the dispatcher who was about to relinquish his post sent, at the request of his successor, and in his name, the order to the east bound train at Salamanca, and the successor, forgetting the transmission of such order at his request by the preceding dispatcher, gave the order to the train at Carrollton, and bound west, which caused it to move forward, and encounter the other train. If the successor of the train dispatcher, instead of asking the one who was just off duty to send the order to the Salamanca train, had sent it himself, as the rule required, all that can be said is that there might have been more probability of his remembering it; but it cannot be said that his failure to obey the rule, in such case, was the cause of the accident. The same want of memory might have existed in either case. I do not, however, lay any weight upon this fact, because, whether the train dispatcher did or did not obey a rule of the defendant, he was acting, when the orders were given on this subject, as the master, and was discharging the master's duties, and if he negligently performed them the master must be held liable therefor. We do not say this duty went further than to use reasonable care, measured by the gravity of the interest at stake, to give originally correct orders. If they were correct, as originally given, and subsequently, through the negligence of some employé, they were incorrectly interpreted or copied, or mistakenly repeated, or delivered to the wrong person, in these and in many other supposable cases there might perhaps be reason for the application of the doctrine as to negligence of a coemployé. It is not so as the case appears here.

In the Nike Case, supra, the accident happened because of the absence of a third brakeman on a train sent out from East Albany. The company had provided a man at that station, called a "head conductor," whose duty it was to make up the trains, and hire and station the brakeman; and, on account of one of the brakemen oversleeping himself, the train went out without a sufficient number of brakemen. The court held the company had not discharged its duty to send out only a properly equipped train when it provided a head conductor, and made rules for his presence there, and gave to him a superintendence over the trains. The defendant owed a duty to the employees to send out only such a train, and that duty was not complied with by adopting rules governing such a case. It is also the duty of the company to use care in the furnishing of proper cars and machinery; but the duty is not performed by adopting a rule providing for proper inspection, and in furnishing proper persons to perform such inspection, so long as they negligently omit to inspect. Proper inspection of the equipment and machinery of a train is itself part of the duty of the company. Railway v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 189 N. Y. 802. These cases make it plain that whenever the act is that of the master, or the duty to be performed is particularly his duty, the liability resting upon him for the proper performance of the act or duty is not shifted by the adoption of rules or regulations providing for the performance of the act or duty by the agent of the master. Nor is the holding that a train dispatcher, in the dispatch of trains, performs for the master a duty which it owes as such, a new departure in the branch of the law under discussion. While the cases cited below do not necessarily proceed upon that basis, yet it is plain that it was, in all of them, regarded as an indisputable proposition, so far as a train dispatcher acted in ordering the movement of trains. In Slater v. Jewett, supra, it was assumed that the order of the train dispatcher was the act of the master; but it was held that the order was in fact correct, and the injury happened from a negligent performance of duty by subordinate servants, who were coemployees of plaintiff's intestate. 85 N. Y., at pages 66, 70, and 71. The same holds true in the case of Sheehan v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 832, 837. And Judge Danforth there says that no servant takes the risk of an injury by the very act of the master himself. In Dana v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 93 N. Y. 639, a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for an injury received in the same accident in which Sheehan (91 N. Y. supra) was injured was reversed in this court and upon the same reasoning employed in the Sheehan Case. And in Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737 (more fully in 26 N. E. Rep. 609), this court assumes, in the opinion there delivered, that, if the accident occurred from the omission of the train dispatcher at Troy to exercise proper care to notify the train, a case was made out on the question of defendant's negligence. I think this is a fair and wholesome rule,—fair to the master, while at the same time affording some protection to the employé. The defendant ought not to escape liability for negligently issuing, as master, and in the course of the performance of its duty as such to its employés, an improper order, and 25 L. R. A.

whether it has done so should be submitted to the jury.

I have looked at the various cases cited by the learned counsel for the defendant, and I have found none in this court which conflicts with these views. It is not necessary to cite each one, and criticise it in detail. It is sufficient to say they do not conflict with our decision in the case at bar. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

All concur, except Gray, J., not voting.

The constitutional provision against gaining a residence while confined in a public prison applies to a person committed to such prison, even if the commitment was irregular or illegal and was made upon his own application, notwithstanding the fact that he had no family, and no home and made the application for commitment to get a home and work in the prison.

(June 22, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Oyer and Terminer for the City and County of New York convicting him of registering as a voter in contravention of the provisions of the statute on that subject. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. James J. Walsh, for appellant:

The uncontradicted testimony shows that the appellant acquired a residence at the city prison in the election district in which he registered.

Every man must have a domicile somewhere, and he can only have one domicile at one and the same time.

Domicil and residence are equivalent terms when used with respect to the right of suffrage.

People v. Platt, 117 N. Y. 159.

Domicil is the habitation fixed in any place without any present intention of removing therefrom; it is a fixed and permanent abode.

2 Kent, Com. 2d ed. 431, note E.

The commitment was void and a nullity, and though it did operate to confine the appellant physically, it did not operate to confine him to a prison within the meaning of the constitution.

The word "confined" in the constitution, could not have meant anything but confinement on the charge of crime.

In Re Registry Lists, 10 Phila. 213, it was held that former paupers in the almshouse who had been discharged as such, but who re-mate in that institution under contract of service for hire, are entitled to vote as residents of the precinct.

The defendant does not acquire the right by the fact of his confinement, but by the act of location and the operation of his mind in intending to make a certain place his residence.

Re Ward, 29 Abb. N. C. 187.

Mr. John D. Lindsay, with Mr. John R. Fellows, for respondents:

The defendant was confined in a public prison, within the meaning of the constitution, from the time of his original commitment thereto till the day of the alleged crime, and was incapable of gaining a residence there for the purpose of voting.

The fact that the appellant was permitted to enjoy unwarranted or unusual liberties in no way affected the fact that he was confined in the prison. The warden's toleration thereof would not even constitute an escape.

In order to qualify a citizen to vote in any particular election district, the constitution requires that at the time of the election he shall have been a resident of that election district for the last thirty days.

The place where a man is commorant may, perhaps, be properly considered as prima facie the place of his legal residence; this presumption, however, may be easily overcome by proof of facts to the contrary. If a person leave his original residence animo non reverendi, and adopt another (for a space of time however brief), if it be done animo manendi, his first residence is lost. But if, in leaving his original residence, he does so animo reverendi, such original residence continues in law, notwithstanding the temporary absence of himself and family.

29 Abb. N. C. 187; Monroe v. Jackson, supra.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court: The defendant was convicted of illegal registration, in the fall of 1893, in an election district in the city of New York of which he was not at the time a resident. He claims he was a resident of the election district, and whether he was or not is the question to be determined upon the present appeal. At and before the time of his registration he was in the Tombs city prison under a commitment by a magistrate, of which the following is a copy:

"The warden and keeper of the city prison of the city of New York will receive and safely keep in his custody, for examination by the commissioners of public charities and correction, the body of Michael Cady, charged with destitution on confession. 1 District Police Court, New York, Aug. 14, 1893. C. W. Meade, Police Justice.

"Committed to W. H. Six months. Edward C. Sheehy."

Sheehy was one of the commissioners of charities, and this commitment is supposed to have been made under section 412 of the New York Consolidation Act of 1882, which reads as follows: "It shall be lawful for the board of charities and correction to commit to any of the institutions under their charge other than penal for a period not exceeding six months, any person or persons committed to their charge by any police magistrate of the city of New York, and such vagrants as ask for commitment." He had been in the Tombs prison for about seven years, most of the time under similar commitments. He was always committed upon his own application, and, when a commitment ran out, he would immediately, or after a lapse of some time, make application for another, and thus there might be an interval of time, probably overlooked, between two successive commitments. He was during all the time supported at the public expense in the prison, and was there frequently employed to carry messages and do some slight work for the warden of the prison, and while thus employed was permitted to go in and out of the prison. He was received into the prison and detained there, solely by virtue of the commitments, and could be formally discharged from the prison, according to the practice in vogue there, only by the authority of one of the commissioners of charities. As a witness in his own behalf, he testified that he lived in the Tombs prison in the election district where he registered; that he had lived there nearly seven years; that he had no other home, and never had had any other home since he went to the prison, that during that time he did not intend to have any other home; that he did intend to make the prison his home "as long as he could not do any better,—could not get any other home," and that he had such intention during the whole time; that he was committed upon his own application; that he had no home, no work, and made application to be committed to get a home and work.

Now, under these circumstances did he gain a residence in the Tombs? The Constitution provides in article 2, section 8, that "no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense, nor while confined in any public prison." It does not appear where his residence was before his commitment to the prison. He was at all times in a real sense a prisoner at the Tombs. He was not there as a laborer working for wages, or even working for his own support, or as a member of the warden's family. He was maintained at the public expense, and was confined like others of his class. One committed to prison does not cease to be a prisoner because he is not strictly confined, and is permitted by the prison officials to go in and out of the prison upon errands. Nor does it matter for the purposes now in hand, that the commitment was irregular, or even illegal. One may even be taken by violence, and thrust into prison, and confined there, or he may be detained there by his consent without any commitment and yet he could not by such detention in prison gain a residence there for the purpose of voting. Before going to the prison the defendant had a residence somewhere, and, before he could change that, it was requisite that he should go to the Tombs, intending to make that his home and domicile, either permanently or for some unlimited time, without any intention of returning or reverting to his former residence, and in fact intending thereby to change his former residence to the Tombs. The domicile or home requisite as a qualification for voting purposes means a residence which the voter voluntarily chooses, and has a right to take as such, and which he is at liberty to leave, as interest or caprice may dictate, but without any present intention to change it. It is preposterous to suppose that the defendant had within these rules and the law laid down in Silvey v. Lindsay, 107 N. Y. 55, and many other cases found in the learned brief submitted in behalf of the people, made the Tombs his residence. He was a single man. The Tombs is not a place of residence. It is not constructed or maintained for that purpose. It is a place of confinement for all except the keeper and his family, and a person cannot, under the guise of a commitment, or even without any commitment, go there as a prisoner, having a right to be there only as a prisoner, and gain a residence there. We think upon all the evidence it is clear and without reasonable dispute that the defendant was not a resident in the district in which he registered, and are of opinion that no error was committed upon the trial to his prejudice.

An order for the physical examination of the plaintiff, in an action for personal injuries, under Laws 1883, chap. 721, amending Code Civ. Proc., § 813, can be made only in connection with, or as a part of, an order for the examination of the party before trial and in conformity to the general provisions for such examinations, and the physical examination by surgeons cannot be authorized as an independent proceeding.

(May 1, 1894.)

APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York reversing an order of the Special Term directing a physical examination of plaintiff before trial in alleged accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Julien T. Davies and Joseph H. Adams, for appellant:

The effect of section 878 (as amended) is to provide that the order for a physical examination of the plaintiff may be made either simultaneously with an order for the examination of the plaintiff as a witness before trial, or it may be made on a separate application.

There is no merit in the contention that the statute providing for a physical examination is unconstitutional, the legislature having conferred the power which the court of appeals has held did not exist at common law.

Defendant is not entitled to an order for the physical examination of the plaintiff, apart from her examination as a witness, at the instance of the defendant.

In the absence of a statute, it is well settled in this country and in this state, by the decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court of the United States, that a defendant is not entitled to a physical examination of the person of the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries.

McQuigan v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 14 L. R. A. 466, 129 N. Y. 50; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 35 L. ed. 734; Roberts v. Ogdenburgh & L. C. R. Co. 29 Hun, 154; *Neuman v. The order that the plaintiff submit to a physical examination, and the statute upon which it is founded, would violate the rights of the plaintiff, secured by the Federal Constitution, to sue for the injuries she has sustained, and have her case tried.

The privileges and immunities secured to citizens, and the prohibition against any state denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, as provided by the Federal Constitution, arts 4, 14, secure to every person the right to sue in the courts of the state, and have the case tried.

The plaintiff's right to sue and have her case tried is violated by this order, in this:

1. It directs that the trial of her action shall be stayed until the examination is made.

2. It means all that is implied by it, and there is implied from it everything which will come to pass if the examination is made. It, therefore, means that the plaintiff must expose her person to two men not selected by herself; and that she must allow these men to touch and handle her person against her will.

3. Every touching of the person by another without consent is a battery, and every battery implies an insult. Hence, every touching is an assault and battery.

Moak's Underhill, Torts, 297; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 252, 35 L. ed. 737.

The order and the statute upon which it is based are not within what is called the "police power" of the state.

Neither the nation nor the state can, under the guise of exercising the police power, deprive any person of rights secured by the Federal Constitution.

Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746; Cooley, Const. L. 4th ed. 715, 716; Smith v. Turner, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283, 12 L. ed. 702; Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 394.

The adjudications of this court in what has been said and implied have already gone far enough to show the meaning of the right of liberty, as secured by the Constitution, to be all that we have claimed for it.

People v. Marx, 99 N. Y. 886, 52 Am. Rep. 84; Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 515, 30 Am. Rep. 328; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636.

Assuming that a person may be deprived of the right to sue in the courts by due process of law, we submit that the order directing the physical examination is not "due process of law," and is, in its nature, an extra judicial proceeding.

The inspection in suits for nullity of a marriage contract, on the ground of impotence, bears no analogy to the physical examination claimed in actions for personal injuries.

Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. ed. 1891, § 503.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action alleges that in the month of October, 1892, the plaintiff, a young girl then under age, was a passenger upon one of the defendant's trains, and that she was seriously injured by reason of a collision, such injury affecting the spinal column and whole nervous system. These allegations were put in issue by the answer. The defendant obtained an order from one of the judges of the court in which the action was pending, directing the plaintiff to appear before a referee named in the order, at her residence, at a date designated, and then and there submit to a physical examination in respect to the nature and extent of the injuries claimed, to be conducted by two medical experts named, in their presence, and in the presence of such women as she might desire to have present, but not in the immediate presence of the referee, unless the plaintiff should so elect. The general term reversed this order and this appeal brings the questions here for review. The ground upon which the order was reversed is that the defendant was not entitled to an order for such an examination, except at the time of granting an order for her examination as a witness or a party before the trial, and that a separate physical examination alone is not authorized. On the argument before us in support of this reversal, the learned counsel for the plaintiff does not rest the case wholly upon the reasons given by the general term, but attacks the statute as in conflict with the federal and state constitutions. He insists that such conflict arises from the fact that the plaintiff is required, as a condition of prosecuting her action in the courts, to expose her person against her will; that the statute, in effect, deprives her of the sacredness and privacy of her own person, and of her liberty and natural rights and the equal protection of the laws. The argument, though perhaps novel, is not without interest on account of the ideas advanced and the manner of their presentation. In the view we take of the questions involved in the appeal, it will not be necessary to follow the discussion. The statute enacts a rule of procedure, the purpose of which is the discovery of the truth in respect of certain allegations which the plaintiff has presented for judicial investigation in the courts of justice. It prescribes a method of aiding the court and jury in the correct determination of an issue of fact raised by the pleadings, and, as it seems to me, does not violate any of the express or implied restraints upon legislative power to be found in the fundamental law. But, in regard to the meaning and construction of the statute, I think the court below was entirely correct. The general purpose of the enactment was to change a rule of the common law which had recently been asserted by the highest court and by this court. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 35 L. ed. 734; McQuigan v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 129 N. Y. 50, 14 L. R. A. 466.

It is not necessary, in this case, to insist that the statute should be subjected to a strict construction, but certainly it ought to receive a construction that would make it fair and reasonable in its operation. By chapter 721 of the Laws of 1893, section 873 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended by inserting the following provision in the middle of that section: "In every action to recover damages for personal injuries, the court or judge, in granting an order for the examination of the plaintiff before trial, may, if the defendant apply therefor, direct that the plaintiff submit to a physical examination by one or more physicians or surgeons to be designated by the court or judge, and such examination shall be had and made under such restrictions and directions as to the court or judge shall seem proper. In every action brought to recover damages for personal injuries, where the defendant shall present to the court or judge satisfactory evidence that he is ignorant of the nature and extent of the injuries complained of, the court or judge shall order that such physical examination be made." The learned counsel for the plaintiff contends that, under the section as now amended, the physical examination is not authorized apart from, or independent of, the examination before trial, while the learned counsel for the defendant contends that the second clause of the amendment provides for a mere physical examination, distinct and apart from the other words of the amendment, and from the preceding or subsequent sections of the Code. In other words, he separates this clause from the rest of the section, and from the other section relating to examinations of parties, and insists that it contains within itself everything necessary to its execution as an independent enactment. I take it to be a settled rule of statutory construction that an original statute, with all its amendments, must be read together and viewed as one act passed at the same time. Golman v. Kennedy, 49 Hun, 157. No part of the original or the amendment is to be held inoperative if they can all be made to stand and work together. I assume that had section 878, as now amended, been originally enacted in its present form, no one would claim that it should then receive the construction now claimed in behalf of the defendant; and yet we should read it and the other sections on the same subject as if they had been passed in this present form at the same time.

But the most serious objection to the defendant's construction is that, under it, it would be utterly impossible to attain the end which the legislature had in view, and it would, in fact, defeat every practical and useful object sought to be accomplished. The section, as amended, provides that the examination shall be had before the judge or a referee; and a referee was actually appointed in the order, and the plaintiff directed to appear before him. For what purpose? If the defendant's construction be correct, he could not administer an oath to any one, or ask a single question, or make any report of the proceeding. He could not even be present at the examination unless the plaintiff required it. The plaintiff might stand mute and no one could compel her to answer a single question put by the medical experts or any one else. The experts are not required to reduce anything to writing or make any report to the court, and no provision is made for a record by any one. All the defendant can get from the proceeding upon this construction is an opportunity to have two physicians inspect the plaintiff's person as to any external marks or symptoms of injury or disease, for the purpose of enabling them to testify at the trial, it may be years afterwards. The defendant's counsel cannot even know in advance of the trial what testimony the experts can give, whether for or against him, unless, after an appointment by the court, they should volunteer to disclose to him the results of their observation, and this might not be regarded as entirely proper on their part, as they were in some sense officers of the court, or, at all events, impartial as between the parties,—a character that they should preserve in order to give to their testimony much weight at the trial, so that, when the proceedings are finished, practically nothing has been accomplished. The parties have not advanced much in the process of discovering where the truth is. They are, for all practical purposes, just where they started.

Moreover, how is it possible for medical experts to make a physical examination in a case like this, or indeed in any case, by merely observing the external marks or indications of personal injury or disease? The term itself implies not only such observation, but an inquiry, by means of questions and answers, as to the cause, nature, character, and extent of the disability. Mere external appearances are, in themselves, of no consequence unless identified and connected with the accident as the cause, and hence disclosures such as ordinarily occur between patient and physician must necessarily accompany the inspection of the injured parts. It is clear, I think, that such an examination as the statute contemplates can never be obtained under the defendant's construction. It must be held that the legislature intended to enact some useful and practical rule in the administration of justice, that would promote the discovery of truth, and not to do a vain thing. In order to reach this simple and just result, all we need to do is to read the amendment as a part, only, of the general scheme prescribed by the code for the examination of parties before trial. In order to give even color to the other view, it must be detached from the context and from all its surroundings, and read as if it stood alone, in disregard of settled rules of construction. Not only that, but we must reject provisions of the same section, of the plainest import, as wholly inapplicable to this particular examination. The statute has, in terms, provided that the physical examination shall be procured in the same way and as part of an examination of the party before trial, and in that way only can the object and purpose of the amendment ever be attained. This construction gives effect to every word of the section as amended, and is in harmony with the sections immediately preceding and following it. Then the referee becomes something more than a mere spectator at an idle ceremony. He may take the plaintiff's testimony upon the issue, and report to the court. He has, of course, power to administer an oath and to authenticate the proceedings, and the plaintiff is bound to appear before him, and answer all proper questions with respect to the nature and extent of the injuries, whether framed by the medical experts from their own examination, or by the counsel present. It becomes a fair struggle for truth, and both parties may participate. The record of the examination is placed on file, and both sides know what must be met if it is introduced in evidence, as it may be. The statute upon this construction might be a valuable accession to the rules for administering justice, and not an instrument to be used by one party to surprise his antagonist at the trial, or, in some cases, possibly himself. That this is the fair and reasonable, and indeed the necessary, construction of the section as it now stands, I cannot doubt. Moreover, the other view would, in the end, be most unfortunate for the defendant and parties situated as the defendant is. We know that in actions of this character, brought by women against corporations, considerations sometimes influence the jury, other than those growing out of the law and the facts applicable to the case. When facts are found upon conflicting evidence, and damages assessed, the accuracy of the mental process upon which the jury acted cannot ordinarily be reviewed. It is not desirable to increase the chances of injustice by adding new elements that are liable to be used at the trial against corporations in this class of actions. Mr. Justice Gray, in the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Union Pac. R. Co. v. Botsford, supra, remarked that: "The inviolability of the person is as much invaded by a compulsory stripping and exposure as by a blow. To compel any one, and especially a woman, to lay bare the body, or to submit it to the touch of a stranger, without lawful authority, is an indignity, an assault, and a trespass." This amendment has changed the law, but it is not so certain that it will ever change the general sentiment of mankind which was expressed in that remark. The power conferred by the amendment should never be used in such a way as to leave any doubt as to the fairness and good faith of the proceeding, otherwise it may prove to be a sword instead of a shield. It should be a fair and open inquiry after truth, in which both sides are or may be participants. If it is used only for the purpose of enabling the defendant to prepare expert witnesses to give testimony at the trial it will be hardly possible to keep the fact from the jury, and it is easy enough to see how such an element in the case might be used to excite sympathy, stimulate prejudices, and in some cases possibly to enhance damages.

All concur, except Earl, Finch, and Bartlett, Jr., dissenting.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

S. O. FRANCIS, Respt.,

v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.,

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. A message delivered to the defendant for transmission was written on one of its blanks, upon which were printed the following conditions: (1) That the company would not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery or for nondelivery of the message beyond the sum paid for sending the same, unless the message was ordered repeated; (2) that the company would not be liable for damages in any case where the claim was not presented within sixty days after the message was filed with the company for transmission. The company neglected to transmit the message at all, and the addressee brought an action. Held, that these conditions were unreasonable and inapplicable.
2. In an action against a telegraph company for failing to transmit and deliver a message, damages for mental suffering cannot be recovered.
3. The common-law rule in this respect is not changed by Laws 1886, chap. 208, entitled "An act to regulate the business of operating telegraph lines," etc.

NOTE.—In connection with the very full collection of authorities upon the question of damages for mental anguish, see the note to Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Rogers (Minn.) 13 L. R. A. 369, and the subsequent cases of Wilcox v. Richmond & D. R. 25 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court of Ramsey County refusing a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's failure to transmit and deliver a telegraph message. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George H. Fearons, with Massa Ferguson & Kneeland, for appellant:

The condition requiring presentation of claim within sixty days is not unreasonable.

Mental anguish alone claimed to have been suffered from the negligent failure by a telegraph company to perform a contract to deliver a message there being no suggestion of malice, fraud, deception, or the like in the case, is not a basis for recoverable damages.

At common law no such principle was ever recognized.

The same rules measure the damages recoverable against telegraph companies as against railroad companies and others without discrimination.

The first innovation (and one which has never been approved outside of this country) was made in Texas in 1881, in the case of—

So Relle v. Western U. Tele. Co. 55 Tex. 306, 40 Am. Rep. 805.

In 1883 the question again came before the Texas court in two suits on the same transaction. In the suit by the sender, it was held that there might be a recovery on the theory of exemplary damages; and in the suit by the sendee, that there could be no recovery. The So Relle Case was overruled, the court saying: "It cannot be sustained upon principle nor upon authority. . . . In no case has it ever been held that mental anguish alone, unaccompanied by an injury to the person, afforded a ground of action."

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 568, 46 Am. Rep. 278.

In the case of Western U. Tele. Co. v. Cooper, 1 L. R. A. 728, 71 Tex. 507, the court held that there might be a recovery for mental anguish from the non-delivery of a message reading "Josephine sick."

But in the next case it was held that in order to subject a telegraph company to this extraordinary liability, the message must disclose some close relationship between the parties.

Western U. Tele. Co. v. Brown, 2 L. R. A. 766, 71 Tex. 723.

In the next case it was held further necessary that the company should have notice "of the peculiar conditions and circumstances which rendered the prompt performance of more than ordinary importance."

Western U. Tele. Co. v. Simpson, 73 Tex. 422.

In its efforts to escape the evils flowing from the Pandora's box it had opened, the court undertook to further limit its ruling.

Rowell v. Western U. Tele. Co. 75 Tex. 26.

In the next case practically all limit was discarded.

Western U. Tele. Co. v. Adams, 6 L. R. A. 844, 75 Tex. 531.

At the same time it was held, however, that a telegram, "Come on first train; bring Ferdinand; his father very low," did not apprise the company that mental anguish would result from a failure to promptly deliver it.

Western U. Tele. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 76 Tex. 217.

A verdict rendered under this doctrine much impressed the court that its effect was "to allow the plaintiff to coin his tears into silver dollars," but it did not feel itself at liberty to set the same aside.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rosentreter, 80 Tex. 406.

In 1892 the court was called upon to apply the same doctrine to a railroad company, and it declared that cases in which such damages are recoverable "are exceptional. As a rule, mental suffering is not an element of the damages which are recoverable for breach of a contract, or, in an action for a tort, founded upon a right growing out of a contract."

The doctrine of these cases has gained recognition in Indiana, Kentucky, and North Carolina.

It has also been recognized in a 'qualified sense in Alabama, and, largely under the influence of a local statute, in Tennessee, with a vigorous dissent.

On the other hand, the correctness of these cases has been denied and the fallacies of their reasoning carefully pointed out.

And every federal court before which the question has arisen.

Chase v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 10 L. R. A. 464, 44 Fed. Rep. 554 (Arkansas); Crawson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 544 (Georgia); Tyler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 54 Fed. Telegraph companies are within the rule which protects from damages which cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties when they made the contract.

The condition that a claim for damages must be presented "within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission," has no operation unless there has been a partial performance by forwarding the message.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Way, 83 Ala. 542; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Yopet, 3 L. R. A. 224, 118 Ind. 248.

A stipulation fixing the period of limitation at thirty days from the date of the receipt of the message by the transmitting company is unreasonable and void.

A condition that the company will not be liable for damages in any case where the claim for damages is not presented in writing "within sixty days after sending the message," applies only to cases where the message is sent, and if there is a failure to transmit, no notice or demand is required to fix the company's liability.

Under our statute, the telegraph company is made expressly liable to the party injured.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McKibben, supra.

Under our statute a telegraph company is a common carrier.

A common carrier cannot limit its liability by mere notice, or by anything less than a special or express contract.

Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cravens, supra.

There is a difference and an important difference between conditions printed on the face of the message and those printed on the back.

Wilson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 21 Gratt. 654; Brown v. Eastern R. Co. 11 Cush. 101; Malone v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 12 Gray, 388, 74 Am. Dec. 598; Quimby v. Vanderbilt, 17 N. Y. 806, 72 Am. Dec. 469; Limbarger v. Westcott, 49 Barb. 288; McMillan v. Michigan, S. & N. I. R. Co. 16 Mich. 79, 93 Am. Dec. 208; Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Mineral Springs Mfg. Co. 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 818, 21 L. ed. 297; Britton v. Barnaby, 62 U. S. 21 How. 527, 16 L. ed. 177; Verner v. Sweitzer, 32 Pa. 208.

The failure to send the message was an act of gross negligence on the part of the defendant.

The legislature has declared that actual damages are recoverable against a telegraph company for failure or neglect to transmit or deliver a message within a reasonable time after the reception thereof.

Laws 1885, chap. 208, § 5; 2 Gen. Stat. p. 833.

Actual damages are such damages as are not speculative or punitive, exemplary or vindictive.

Injury to the feelings, even when unaccompanied by any injury to the person, property, or health, is actual damage.

Woodward v. Glidden, 33 Minn. 108; McCarthy v. Niskera, 22 Minn. 90; Larson v. Chase, 14 L. R. A. 85, 47 Minn. 807.

The question whether mental anguish resulting from the failure or neglect of a telegraph company to promptly and correctly transmit and deliver a telegraphic message can be taken into account as an element of damages in a suit based upon such failure, has, with few exceptions, been decided in the affirmative.

Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 9 L. R. A. 669, 107 N. C. 370.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The allegations of the complaint are that the plaintiff and his wife had been separated for some time "on account of a certain family trouble," she residing in Wyoming, in this state, and he in Indianapolis, Ind.; that he had been endeavoring to effect a reconciliation and a renewal of marital relations with her, and had written her on the subject, requesting her, in case a reconciliation was possible, to wire him to that effect, and to inform him how many physicians there were in a place called Lindstrom, with a view of his taking up his residence there, and engaging in the practice of his profession as a physician; that in response to this letter plaintiff's wife delivered to the defendant at Wyoming, for transmission, the following message, addressed to him: "Only one there. Yes, come;" and paid the sum charged for its transmission; that the defendant negligently failed to transmit or deliver the message to plaintiff at all; that, not receiving any message from his wife, he concluded that she was unwilling to renew her marriage relations with him, and feared that all hope of reconciliation with her was at an end; that he was kept in this mental state for more than three weeks before he learned that his wife had sent the message; that during this time, in consequence of the neglect of the defendant to transmit and deliver the message, "he suffered great mental pain, distress, and anguish, and sustained great damage to his feelings," for which he seeks to recover. The evidence tended to show that the message was written on one of defendant's blanks, at the foot of which was printed, "Read the notice and agreement on the back." On the back was printed: "All messages taken by this company are subject to the following terms: To guard against mistakes or delays the sender of a message should order it repeated; that is, telegraphed back to the originating office for comparison. For this one half the regular rate is charged in addition. It is agreed between the sender of the following message and this company that said company shall not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery or for the nondelivery of any unrepeatable message beyond the amount received for sending the same." "The company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission." It is conceded that this message was not ordered repeated, and that no claim for damages for its nondelivery was presented to the company within 60 days after it was filed for transmission. Various questions arose on the trial with reference to these conditions, but this branch of the case can be very briefly disposed of. The repeating of a message may prevent mistakes in its transmission, but can have no tendency whatever to prevent a failure to transmit it. Hence this condition is not applicable to this case, or, if intended to be so, it is, as to such a case, void, because unreasonable. The same is true of the "sixty-day" limitation. It is either inapplicable—at least, as to the addressee of the message—to a case of failure to transmit the message at all, or, if intended to be applicable, unreasonable, for the sixty days might elapse before the addressee ascertained that any message had been delivered for transmission. The company has probably substituted the words, "after the message is filed," for the words, "after sending the message," formerly used, in view of the decisions of the courts that the old form did not apply where the claim was founded upon a failure to send the message at all. But there are some things which cannot be accomplished even by artfully worded "fine print" conditions. Our conclusion that these conditions are either inapplicable or unreasonable, under the facts of this case, is founded on general principles, and without reference to the provisions of Laws 1885, chap. 208, entitled "An act to regulate the business of operating telegraph lines and imposing penalties for misconduct of owners and agents of such lines," the effect of which upon attempted stipulations for exemption from liability we have now no occasion to consider.

This brings us to the principal question in the case, viz., whether the addressee of a telegraphic message can recover damages for mental suffering caused by the failure of the telegraph company to transmit and deliver the message. In the consideration of this question it is necessary at the outset to consider two preliminary questions, viz.: (1) Has the statute above cited, particularly section 5, changed the common-law rule? (2) What is the nature of such an action as this? Is it an action founded on contract, or is it one purely of tort? Section 5 of the act provides that, if any person or company owning or operating a telegraph line in this state shall fail to transmit a message within a reasonable time, or if it is shown due diligence has not been exercised after reception thereof for that purpose, or shall fail to deliver the same to the party to whom the same is addressed, if known, within a reasonable time after its arrival at the point of destination, they "shall be liable in a civil action at the suit of the party injured for all actual damages sustained by reason of such neglect or omission." The courts were not entirely agreed as to whether an action against the telegraph company could be maintained by the addressee, for whose benefit the message was intended, but who had no immediate contract relations with the company. Again, assuming to follow the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, that the damages which one party to a contract ought to recover for a breach of it by the other are such as either arise naturally from the breach itself or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties when making the contract as the probable result of the breach, some courts held that under the latter clause of this rule consequential damages could not be recovered against a telegraph company unless the company was informed, either by the contents of the message or otherwise, of the nature of the subject-matter to which the message related, and that, where it was ignorant of this, only nominal damages, or the amount paid for the transmission of the message, could be recovered. We are of the opinion that the only object of section 5 was to settle both these questions, and to establish the rule—First, that the party injured, whether sender or addressee, may maintain an action; and, second, to hold the company liable for all actual damages proximately resulting from the breach of its contract, regardless of whether or not it was advised of the nature of the subject-matter of the message. In other words, that the company has nothing to do with, and has no right to speculate upon, the extent of the interest of either sender or addressee in the message, or as to its value or importance; that, when it receives a message for transmission and delivery, the company has but one duty to perform, viz., to transmit and deliver it correctly, and without unreasonable delay, and if it fails to do so it will be liable for all actual damages, although not of a character such as would be suggested by the message as the probable result of a failure to transmit and deliver it. The statute does not define actual damages, but leaves that to be determined by common-law rules. We are therefore of opinion that the statute has no bearing on the question before us. It is hardly necessary to add that the same is true of the declaration in the bill of rights that every person is entitled to a certain remedy in the law for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property, or character. This is but declaratory of a general fundamental principle upon which the courts have always acted, and which would have been the law even if not incorporated in the constitution. It creates no new legal rights or new legal wrongs, and establishes no new rule of damages. It merely declares that for any wrong, recognized as such by law, a person shall have a remedy to obtain the redress to which he is entitled according to the principles of law.

This action is not one of tort, but on contract; its gist and gravamen being the breach of the contract, the duties and obligations growing out of which are regulated by the statute, which itself becomes a part of it. The best test of this is the fact that such an action could not be maintained without pleading and proving the contract. We are therefore left to determine the question here presented according to the rules of the common law applicable to actions for damages for breach of contract. In such actions, can damages be recovered for mental suffering resulting from a breach of the contract? The law has always been exceedingly cautious in allowing damages for mental suffering, for the manifest reasons, among others, that such damages are more sentimental than substantial, depending largely upon temperament and physical and nervous condition. The suffering of one under precisely the same circumstances would be no test of the suffering of another, and there being no possible standard by which such an injury can be even approximately measured, they are subject to many, if not most, of the objections to speculative damages which are universally excluded. In no case will an action for damages lie for mental suffering caused by an act which, however wrongful, infringes no legal right of the party. In actions for a tort resulting in physical injuries, of which mental suffering forms a component part, the latter is permitted to be taken into account in the assessment of damages; and where the tort is willful, and of a character as naturally and necessarily to injure the feelings, damages for such injuries are sometimes allowed, although there was no physical injury or pecuniary loss. Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 807, 14 L. R. A. 85, perhaps goes as far in that direction as any case to be found in the books. In this latter class of cases such damages are often but another name for punitive damages. But we are not concerned here with the question when such damages may be recovered in actions of tort. We think we are warranted in asserting that the doctrine that damages for mental suffering resulting from a breach of contract is wholly unknown to and unauthorized by the common law, unless "telegraph cases" are to be made an exception. An action for breach of promise of marriage is sometimes spoken of as an exception; but that action has always been recognized as sui generis. It is an action for breach of contract only in form and name, and in many of its essential features has always been considered as one for a willful tort. We have no desire to discuss at length a question which has been so often and so fully considered of late years by the courts in these telegraph cases. The strongest argument we have found in favor of allowing damages for mental suffering resulting from the nondelivery of a telegraph message is the opinion of the court in Wadsworth v. Western U. Tele. Co., 86 Tenn. 695. It advances all that can be said on that side of the question, and puts it strongly and plausibly. Aside from the dissenting opinion of Linton, J., in the same case, the strongest arguments that we have found against the allowance of such damages are the opinions in Chapman v. Western U. Tele. Co. 88 Ga. 763, 17 L. R. A. 430; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Rogers, 68 Miss. 748, 18 L. R. A. 859; and Connell v. Western U. Tele. Co. 116 Mo. 34, 20 L. R. A. 172. These cases contain about all that can be advanced on either side of the question. It is somewhat remarkable that, although telegraphy has now been in use for over 50 years, it never seems to have occurred to any court, or, so far as we can discover, to any lawyer, that damages were recoverable for mental suffering resulting from neglect to transmit or deliver a telegram until it was so held in 1881 by the supreme court of Texas in So Relle v. Western U. Tele. Co., 55 Tex. 308, 40 Am. Rep. 805, citing in support of the doctrine only actions in tort for physical injuries. This decision has, with more or less variations, been followed by the same court in a long line of later cases; but the doctrine seems to have involved that court in some very glaring inconsistencies, compelled, perhaps, by the necessities of the situation in which the court has placed itself. The multitude of cases of this character in that state since the decision of the So Relle Case indicates the vast field of speculative litigation opened up by that decision, and how difficult the subject is of control by the courts. In Rowell v. Western U. Tele. Co., 75 Tex. 26, the court, apparently impatient at the amount of "intolerable litigation" to which the doctrine had given rise, seems to have gone back, partially at least, upon their former decisions. In that case the plaintiff had received information of the dangerous illness of his mother-in-law. A subsequent dispatch was sent, containing information of her improved condition. This dispatch the telegraph company failed to deliver. The court held that for continued mental anxiety caused by the nondelivery of the message the plaintiff could not recover. The "Texas doctrine," with more or less modification, has quite recently been adopted by the courts of Alabama, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, and Indiana. The harvest of "intolerable litigation" which is being reaped in Texas has not yet matured in those states, but certainly will if the doctrine is adhered to. The "Texas doctrine" has been favorably referred to in many of the more recent text-books, but the bench and bar will understand of how little weight as authority most of these books are, written as they very frequently are, by hired professional book-makers of no special legal ability, and who are usually inclined to take up with the latest legal novelty for the same reasons that newspaper men are anxious for the latest news. On the other hand, the doctrine has been vigorously repudiated by the courts of Georgia, Mississippi, Florida, Missouri, Kansas, Wisconsin, Dakota Territory, Arkansas, and perhaps some other states; also, with practical unanimity by all the United States circuit courts and circuit courts of appeal which have passed upon the question. The Supreme Court of the United States has not yet been called on to pass upon the question; but, in view of the general tenor of the decisions of that court on kindred questions, there is every reason to believe that when the question is presented its decision will be that such damages are not recoverable. No lawyer as yet seems to have had the temerity to present such a case to a court of last resort in any of the eastern or northeastern states.

Some of the decisions holding that such damages are recoverable proceed upon the assumed but false analogy of torts resulting in physical injury accompanied with mental suffering, or where the tort was willful, and calculated and intended to injure the feelings; as, for example, slander, libel, and the like. Others very plausibly argue that such cases are new only in instance, and not in principle, that the principle applicable to all actions on contract is that a party is liable for all damages proximately resulting from its breach; that the reason that in such actions no recovery has usually been allowed for mental suffering is that the contracts were of a business or commercial character, not involving the feelings; that telegraphy is a modern invention; that a telegraph company is a carrier of intelligence often sent for a purpose not pecuniary, but relating wholly to matters of sentiment or feeling; and that, therefore, the damages resulting from the breach of a contract to transmit such intelligence are not to be, and cannot be, measured, by any pecuniary standard, but according to the standard of injury to the feelings. In other words, that damages for which a person is liable for breach of contract depend on the nature of the contract. If it is pecuniary in its nature, only pecuniary damages will be allowed, but, if it relates to the feelings, then damages for injury to the feelings will be allowed. But we deny the correctness of the premise upon which this argument is based. The law looks only to the pecuniary value of a contract, and for its breach awards only pecuniary damages. An action for breach of promise of marriage, as already remarked, is only an apparent, and not a real, exception to the rule. We recognize the fact that the common law is not a code of cast-iron rules, but a system of principles capable of being applied to new conditions as they arise; and when a case arises which falls within a recognized legal principle the fact that it is new in instance will not and ought not to stand in the way of the courts applying the principle. But to allow damages for injury to the feelings resulting from a breach of contract—even one like this—would be, not to apply an old principle to a new instance, but to adopt a new principle entirely unknown to the law. Courts have no more right thus to abrogate the common law than they have to repeal the statutory law. Lord Coke said: "The wisdom of the judges and sages of the law has always suppressed new and subtle inventions in derogation of the common law." The wise remark of another, peculiarly applicable to the present time, was that "the variety of judgments and novelties of opinions are the two plagues of a commonwealth." The great lights of the law may take some liberties with the law in the way of new applications of old principles that modesty would forbid to ordinary men; and while we are not disposed to look upon everything ancient with slavish reverence merely because it is ancient, it would certainly be presumptuous in us to lightly discard a doctrine which has been so long approved, and which is so firmly established by authority. The principles of the common law were founded upon practical reasons, and not upon a theoretical logical system; and usually, when these principles have been departed from, the evil consequences of the departure have developed what these reasons were. The Pandora box that has been opened by the "Texas doctrine" proves more forcibly than argument the wisdom of the common-law rule that damages of this kind cannot be recovered in actions on contract. And, if damages of this kind are to be allowed for the breach of a contract of this character, where are we to stop? Upon what legal principle can a court refuse to allow them for the breach of any other contract? The breach of any contract—even the failure of a debtor to pay his debt at maturity—may result in more or less mental anxiety or suffering to the party to whom the obligation is due. Why not allow damage for the mental suffering or disappointment of passengers caused by the delay of trains through the negligence of the carrier? The object of the journeys of travelers is often not pecuniary, but to visit sick relatives or attend the funeral of deceased ones, which are matters affecting the feelings as much and as exclusively as a telegram. If the train is delayed through the negligence of the carrier, so that the passenger does not reach his destination in time to accomplish his desired object, why is he not entitled to damages for his disappointment and mental suffering as much as the sender or addressee of a delayed telegram? See Wilcox v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 3 C. C. A. 78, 53 Fed. Rep. 264, 17 L. R. A. 804, 8 U. S. App. 118. The truth is, once depart from the old rule, and we are all at sea, without either rudder or compass. Any other doctrine is unauthorized by any principle of law, and would, we are satisfied, work badly in practice, giving rise to a flood of speculative litigation uncontrolled by any guide as to the measure of damages except the whim of the jury, or the arbitrary standard that may be adopted by the particular judge who tries the cause.

It is suggested that the transmission of intelligence by electricity is a comparatively new thing; that contracts of this kind are unlike any others; that, as messages frequently have no pecuniary value, and consequently a failure to transmit them would result in no pecuniary loss, although it might cause great anxiety or disappointment, therefore, unless damages for mental suffering are allowed, none could be recovered that would adequately compensate the party or adequately punish the telegraph company for its neglect of duty. If this be so, it would only go to prove that, in the progress of the world, a new condition of things has arisen for which the existing law is not adequate, and which calls for legislative interposition. This has been done in some jurisdictions by subjecting a telegraph company to a certain penalty to be recovered by, and for the benefit of, the party interested in the message. Whether this is wise or not, it is certainly better than to leave it to the courts or juries to assess the vague, shadowy, and sentimental damages caused by mental anxiety or injured feelings.

Canty, J.:

I reluctantly agree to the foregoing opinion. I fully agree with the reasoning in Wadsworth v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 86 Tenn. 695, above cited, that there ought to be a remedy in such a case as this; that it ought to be an exception to the rule that damages cannot be recovered for mental suffering unaccompanied by actual or threatened physical injury, except in the few instances, where it is allowed as a species of punitive damages. But the difficulty is in the character of the damages. The injuries in such cases as this are too hard to determine with any reasonable certainty, are more often assumed than real; and the suit too liable to be wholly speculative. If every one was allowed damages for injuries to his feelings caused by some one else, the chief business of mankind might be fighting each other in the courts. Damages for mental suffering open into a field without boundaries, and there is no principle by which the court can limit the amount of damages. Mere logic will not dispose of a question of this character. The court must keep one eye on the theoretical, and the other on the practical. At the same time I am strongly of the opinion that there should be some practical remedy in this class of cases, and, if the legislature would provide for the recovery of damages for mental suffering in cases like this, and limit the amount of recovery to, say two or three hundred dollars, there would not be the same incentive to bring speculative suits, or to employ experts to draw on their own imagination for the purpose of proving the condition of the plaintiff's imagination; there would not be so much elaborate preparation to impose on the jury. But, if the court should allow such damages at all, on no principle could it thus arbitrarily limit the amount of recovery, and escape the evils mentioned.

Thomas F. OAKES et al.

(.... Fed. Rep. ....)

1. Equity will not enjoin employees of a receiver of a railroad from quitting his service, although the effect of such action will be to cripple the property, or prevent or hinder the operation of the road.
2. Employees of the receiver of a railroad may lawfully confer together upon the subject of a proposed reduction of wages, and if not restrained by their contract, may withdraw in a body from the receiver's service be- cause of such reduction, although they expect that such action will inconvenience the receiver and the public.

3. Equity will enjoin any combination or conspiracy among the employees of the receiver of a railroad which has for its object and intent the physical injury of the property in the receiver's possession, or actual interference with the regular continuous operation by him of the railroad.

a railway operated by receivers is unlawful and may be prevented by injunction.

MOTION by intervening petitioners to strike out certain portions of the injunction which had been granted to receivers in possession of the Northern Pacific Railroad to restrain a strike which was threatened by the employees of the road. Motion denied except as to one clause of the injunction.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Jenkins, Circuit Judge, delivered the following opinion:

On the 19th day of December, 1893, the receivers of the defendant company presented to the court their verified petition representing that on the 17th day of August, 1893, and within two days after their appointment, and in view of the insolvent condition of the railroad company, they ordered a reduction varying from 10 to 20 per cent in the salaries of all employes (including the general manager and other general officers of the company) amounting to $1,200 per annum or more, which reduction was acquiesced in by the employes to whom the same applied. On the 25th of August, 1893, in view of the increasing depression in the transportation business, the consequent falling off of earnings, and the necessity of greater retrenchment in operating expenses, the receivers ordered a further reduction in salaries and wages of employes, amounting to 5 per cent on all salaries aggregating $50 a month and under $75, and to 10 per cent on all salaries aggregating from $75 to $100 per month. This latter order was to take effect immediately, but upon consideration its operation was suspended by the receivers until the entire subject of salaries and wages could be more fully considered, especially with reference to certain schedules covering the pay and employment of certain classes of employes. The receivers informed the court that some of these schedules, which had been in existence for many years, were not justified by conditions now existing; that they had been amended from time to time, and extended so that they had become voluminous, and in some respects obscure, and had produced in operation inequalities and results unjust to the property, and unjust to many employes; that they thereupon revised and rearranged the schedules, and, instead of putting into operation the reduction contemplated by the order of August 25, they determined and ordered on the 28th of October, 1893 (giving general notice thereof 25 L. R. A.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Quarles, T. W. Spence, and T. W. Harper, for appellants:

An injunction is an extraordinary remedy, to be resorted to only when the end sought can be reached by no other legal process.

The writs of injunction in this case, in so far as they enjoin acts forbidden by law, are superfluous, and unnecessary, and they have no functions to perform, in so far as the writs forbid acts which the law does not forbid the order awarding the writs is erroneous.

The order appointing the receivers and directing them to take possession of the road, and authorizing them to operate it, is an equitable execution.

to the employees of the road), that all existing schedules covering the rates of pay of employes should, on the 1st of January then next ensuing, be abrogated, and that certain new schedules prepared by them should take effect on that day; and the general manager was instructed on and after that day to reduce all salaries and wages aggregating $50 per month and less than $75 per month 5 per cent, and all salaries and wages aggregating $75 per month 10 per cent. The revised schedules corrected supposed inequalities between the different classes of employes, and did away with certain obnoxious regulations which were supposed to militate against the proper management of the property. The receivers further represented to the court that the reduction made in salaries and wages was justified in view of the large shrinkage of business, growing out of the financial revulsion throughout the country; that the rates of compensation provided for were fair and just to the employes to whom they related, in view of the then present conditions. It was made to appear to the court that the gross earnings of the property during the year 1893 were continuing to greatly decrease; that the decrease for the month of September, 1893, as compared with the month of September, 1892, amounted to $758,000; that the decrease for the month of December, 1893, as compared with the month of December, 1892, would amount to $730,000; decreasing by more than one half the entire estimated gross earnings for the month. That by the revised schedules the average reduction in the rates of compensation to the various classes of employes was about as follows: Engineers, 8 per cent; firemen, 7 per cent; trainmen and freight conductors, 8 per cent; passenger conductors, 10 per cent; telegraphers, 5 per cent. The receivers further advised the court that many of their employes claimed that the schedules and rates in force when the receivers took possession constituted contracts between the several employes and the receivers, terminable only by the consent of the employes, in which view the receivers could not concur; and that discontent and opposition to the enforcement of the schedule were rife among the employes, based upon the assumption that no power existed in the receivers to change the schedule. The receivers further advised the court that some of the employes threatened that, in the event that the revised schedules should be put into operation, they would suddenly quit the service of the receivers, and would compel by threats and force and violence other employes to quit the service; that they would prevent, by an organized effort, and by force and intimidation, others from taking service under the receivers in the place of

Any interference with the possession of the receivers, or with the operation of the road, is an obstruction to the execution of the mandate of the court.

If two equal rights conflict, it does not and cannot rest with any court to declare which of these shall give way.

No court can subordinate the right of the laborer to the right of the employer, nor can any court declare that capital shall abate any of its rights because of collision with the rights of the laborer.

The assertion of a right cannot be called the "exercise of unbridled will" and liberty cannot be opprobriously stamped as license, merely because the exercise of his right by one man works damage to another man, or to another set of men, or to society.

The right of a man to his services is the same in kind and degree as the right of a man to his property.

Whatever may be the injury that casually results to an individual from the act of another while pursuing the reasonable exercise of an established right, it is his misfortune. The law pronounces it damnum absque injuria, and the individual from whose act it proceeds is liable neither at law nor in the form of conscience. And the principal right necessarily carries with it also all the means essential to its exercise.

The Eleanor, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 345, 4 L. ed 257.

The question presented is this: Whether when the wages of men working under no contract are reduced by their employer on account of small profits, these men may, by concerted action, quit work in order to bring about a restoration of the old scale.

It is not logical to say that a railway is a public highway and owes a duty to the public, and that it must be kept a going concern although it prove unremunerative to the shareholders, and at the same time shift this duty, owed to the public, from the shoulders of the railroad company and its shareholders to the wage-earners, who in no event can have any interest in the profits.

The workmen are not the actors; the receivers are the aggressors; the sole reason for the change is lack of profits to the bondholders.

The judgment of the circuit court is, not that the men must not breach a contract, but that they are obligated to enter into a new contract.

those who might leave such service; and that they would thereby, as the means of forcing the receivers to abandon the proposed revised schedules, disable the receivers from operating the road, and from discharging their duty to the public as common carrier. The receivers further represented to the court that some of the employes threatened, if the revised schedules should be put in operation, to disable locomotives and cars so that the same could not be safely used at all without expensive repairs; that they would take possession of the cars, engines, shops, roadbed, and other property in possession of the receivers, and that they would destroy and prevent the use of the property, and would so conduct themselves with regard thereto as to hinder and embarrass the receivers in the management of the property, in the operation of the trains thereover, and would bring about incalculable loss to the trust property, and inflict great inconvenience and hardship upon the public. The receivers further represented to the court that, unless the parties were restrained by order of the court, they would carry out such threats, and the receivers would be prevented from operating the road, from carrying the mails of the United States thereover, from performing the duties of a common carrier thereon, and that great loss of property and jeopardy to life would ensue; that the parties referred to (whose names the receivers were unable to state) were contriving secretly to perpetrate the acts of violence and wrong described, and to interfere with the possession and operation by the court, through the receivers, of the property; that such combination included not only dissatisfied employes of the receivers, but others not in the service of the receivers, who from a spirit of sympathy or mischief, threaten to join the employes in perpetrating the wrongful acts and things stated; and that they would so do unless restrained by the court. The receivers thereupon asked, among other things, for an order authorizing them to put in operation and maintain on and after January 1, then proximo, the revised schedules in such petition described, and that a writ of injunction might issue as prayed for in the petition.

Upon consideration of the petition the court on that day entered its order authorizing the receivers to adopt the revised schedules, and directing the issue of a writ of injunction as prayed for in the petition, and directing its delivery to the marshal for execution, ordering him to protect the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad in their possession of the property of the railroad, and in their operation thereof; and directing the receivers to file, in the courts wherein they had been appointed receivers of said property upon ancillary bills, petitions similar to that on which the order was based, to the end that the power of each court might be seasonably invoked for the protection of the receivers in the possession and management of the property within its territorial jurisdiction. The writ in question was directed to the officers, agents, and employes of the receivers, engineers, firemen, trainmen, train dispatchers, telegraphers, conductors, switchmen, and all other employes of the receivers, and to all persons, associations, and combinations, voluntary or otherwise, whether employes of said receivers or not, and to all persons generally. The restraining clause of the writ is as follows.

"Now, therefore, in consideration thereof, and of the matters in said petition set forth, you, the officers, agents, and employes of Thomas F. Oakes, Henry C. Payne, and Henry C. Rouse, as receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and the engineers, firemen, trainmen, train dispatchers, telegraphers, conductors, switchmen, and all other employes of said Thomas F. Oakes, Henry C. Payne, and Henry C. Rouse, as receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and each and every one of you, and all persons, associations, and combinations, voluntary or otherwise, whether employes of said receivers or not, and all persons generally, and each and every one of you, in the penalty which may ensue, are hereby charged and commanded that you, each and every one of you, do absolutely desist and refrain from disabling or rendering in any wise unfit for convenient and immediate use any engines, cars or other property of Thomas F. Oakes, Henry C. Payne, and Henry C. Rouse, as receivers for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and from interfering in any manner with the possession of locomotives, cars, or property of the said receivers, or in their custody,

A tort springs out of a contract when there is a breach of a duty which the law, contradistinguished from the contract, has imposed.

Where contract relations exist, the parties assume towards each other no duties whatever besides those the contract implies.

Cooley, Torts, p. 91.

The class of tortious actions arising out of contract do not arise from a breach of express provisions thereof; but from a breach of an implied duty arising out of and incident to the contract "and the liability arises out of a duty incident to and created by the contract" of employment, but only dependent upon the contract to the extent necessary to raise the duty. The tort consists in the breach of the duty.

Wood's Addison, Torts, § 27, note.

The terms of the contract, therefore, do not define the duty and cannot be resorted to for that purpose.

The duty spoken of is not to perform the contract, but to do or refrain from doing something which the law says shall or shall not be done by a man who has entered into a certain contract relation.

The question for the court in this case is where this duty of a railroad employé begins and ends.

One of these implied conditions on their behalf was that they would not leave its service or refuse to perform their duties under circumstances, when such neglect on their part would imperil lives committed to its care, or the destruction of property involving irreparable loss and injury, or visit upon it severe penalties.

On the 22d day of December, 1893, the receivers presented to the court their supplemental petition, setting forth that the employés affected by the new schedules referred to in the former petition, consisted of engineers, conductors, firemen, trainmen, switchmen, operators, and shopmen: that each of said classes of employés had appointed a committee to confer with the operating officers of the receivers, at St. Paul, with reference to the proposed change in the schedules, and stating the names of the members of those several committees: that such committees had confederated and agreed to co-operate and report to the various classes of employés along the line whom such committee especially represented a joint recommendation,—that is to say, should said committees agree to report and recommend a strike along the line of the railroad, then the separate committees mentioned representing the different classes of employés along the line should report and recommend separately to the employés represented by such committee to strike. The petition further represented to the court that a subcommittee of thirty-two persons had been appointed by the joint committee to confer with the operating officers of the receivers, and to make report and recommendation to the joint committee; and that, should such subcommittee recommend a strike, the general and joint committee would report or recommend a strike, which the separate committees in turn would recommend or report to the different orders or classes of labor to which they belonged upon the lines of the railroad. The receivers further represented that the subcommittee of said general committee intended and was about to recommend and advise the general joint committee to recommend that the employés of the road should strike on or about January 1, 1894, and that the general joint committee and the said several separate committees were about to recommend to the several classes of labor in the employment of the receivers to strike on or about that day. And the receivers further informed the court that, if such committees should recommend a strike, the individual employés along the line of the road would on the day recommended join in a general strike, unless the members of the committee were enjoined by the court from issuing any order or recommendation to strike; that the employés of the railroad held themselves bound to obey the order or recommendation of the committee; that almost all of the employés of the road belonged to one of the labor organizations of the engineers, conductors, firemen, trainmen, switchmen, operators, or shopmen, and also to national labor organizations comprising the employés in similar lines on almost all the other lines of railroad in the United States, namely, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, the Order of Railway Telegraphers, and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. The petition then proceeds to give the names of the executive heads of those organizations, and asserts that the employ  es will not strike unless such strike is ordered by one or more of the executive heads of the national labor organizations named; and that without an order from the executive head, no assistance would be given to the employ  es by the national organizations to which they belonged if they should attempt to strike. The petition further alleged that the railway in question was engaged in interstate commerce, and that the strike along the line of the road would not only cause irreparable damage to the trust property, but to a large portion of the country traversed by the Northern Pacific Railroad, because not reached by any other line of road or telegraph line or express company. That there were many communities along the line of the railroad whose entire commercial facilities were furnished by the three departments of the railroad operated by the receivers.—the railroad, the telegraph, and the express; and that all classes of business men in large portions of the country traversed by the railroad operated by the receivers were dependent to a very large extent, upon these three departments of service, and that large sections of country are dependent upon the railroad trains operated by the receivers for their necessary daily supply of fuel, provisions, etc. The petition asked for an order granting a writ of injunction restraining these committees and the heads of the national organizations mentioned from ordering or recommending or advising a strike.

Upon consideration of this petition an order was made directing a writ of injunction to issue as prayed in the original petition, and as prayed in the supplemental petition, with a similar direction with respect to the presentation of the order and writ to those courts in which ancillary bills had been filed for like orders from those courts. The writ of injunction issued upon this order was directed to the various persons named, and to their agents, sub-agents, representatives, and employ  es, and to the officers, agents, and employ  es of the receivers, and 25 L. It embodied the provisions of the first writ, with the following additional clause:

"And from combining or conspiring together or with others, either jointly or severally, or as committees, or as officers of any so-called 'labor organization,' with the design or purpose of causing a strike upon the lines of railroad operated by said receivers, and from ordering, recommending, approving, or advising others to quit the service of the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company on January 1, 1894, or at any other time; and from ordering, recommending, advising, or approving by communication or instruction or otherwise, the employ  es of the said receivers, or any of them, or of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, to join in a strike on said January 1, 1894, or at any other time, and from ordering, recommending, or advising any committee or committees, or class or classes of employ  es of said receivers to strike or join in a strike on January 1, 1894, or at any other time, until the further order of this court."

On the 15th day of February, 1894, P. M. Arthur, grand chief engineer and chief executive officer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; E. E. Clark, grand chief conductor and chief executive officer of the Order of Railway Conductors; F. P. Sargent, grand chief fireman and chief executive officer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen; D. G. Ramsey, grand chief telegrapher and chief executive officer of the Order of Railway Telegraphers; S. E. Wilkinson, grand master and chief executive officer of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; and John Wilson, grand master and chief executive officer of the Switchmen's Mutual Aid Association,—in behalf of themselves and of their respective organizations and associations, and the members thereof, and in behalf of such of the employ  es of the receivers as are members of the said associations and organizations, moved the court to modify the writs of injunction by expung-proper and most known signification, not the grammatical one, which regards the etymology and original of them, but that which is vulgar and most in use; for use is the judge, the law, and rule of speech. Lieber's Hermeneutics, Hammond's edition, 299.

All the lexicographers are in accord on the meaning of the word "strike," and therefore the word "strike" in these injunctions means just what the people who coined the word have made it mean: "A combined effort of workmen to obtain higher wages or other concessions from their employers, by stopping work at a preconcerted time."

If the definition given by the learned circuit judge of the word "strike" be correct, then the following sentence, found in McCarthy's "History of Our Own Times," is rank nonsense, or worse.

"Some eminent men, of whom Mr. Mill was the greatest, had long been endeavoring to get the world to recognize the fact that a strike is not a thing which can be called good or bad, until we know its object and its history; that the men who strike may be sometimes right and that they may have sometimes been successful."

And the writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica, on the subject "Trade Unions," made a slip when he wrote that a strike was a simultaneous cessation of work to secure a concession.

Messrs. James McNaugh, John C. Spooner, and George P. Miller for appellees.

Harlan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions before us relate to the power of a court of equity—having custody by receivers of the railroad and other property of a corporation—to enjoin combinations, conspiracies or acts on the part of the receivers' employes and their associates in labor organizations which, if not restrained, would do irreparable mischief to such property, and prevent the receivers from discharging the duties imposed by law upon the corporation.

The original bill was filed on behalf of stockholders and creditors of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by an act of congress, and had for its general object the administration under the direction of the court of the entire railroad system, lands and assets of that corporation, and the enforcement of the respective rights, liens, and equities of its preferred and common stockholders, bondholders, and creditors.

The railroad company having filed its answer, receivers were appointed with authority to take immediate possession of its railroads and other property and to exercise its authority and franchises, conduct its business and occupation as a carrier of passengers and freight, discharge the public duties obligatory upon it or upon any of the corporations whose lines of road were in its possession, preserve the property in proper condition and repair so as to be safely and advantageously used, protect the title and possession of the same, and employ such persons and make such payments and dising and striking from the writs the parts italicized. The motion was based upon the petition and supplemental petition, and upon the orders of the court directing the issuance of the writs; and at the hearing the constitutions, statutes, and rules of order of the various organizations referred to were presented and considered in argument.

In the discussion of the important and interesting questions presented by this motion it is not within the province of the court to assume part in the contest between capital and labor, which it is asserted is here involved. It may be that the aggregated power of combined capital is fraught with danger to the republic. It may be that the aggregated power of combined labor is perilous to the peace of society, and to the rights of property. It doubtless is true that in the contest the rights of both have been invaded, and that each has wrongs to be redressed. If danger to the state exists from the combination of either capital or labor, requiring additional restraint or modification of existing laws, it is within the peculiar province of the legislature to determine the necessary remedy, and to declare the general policy of the state touching the relations between capital and labor. With that the judicial power of the government is not concerned. But it is the duty of the courts to restrain those warring factions, so far as their action may infringe the declared law of the land, that society may not be disrupted, or its peace invaded, and that individual and corporate rights may not be infringed. It therefore becomes the duty of the court to inquire whether, in respect of the things complained of, there has been threatened violation of the law of the land, and to determine the appropriate remedy, taking care, however, to apply the remedy without usurpation of jurisdiction, or, as remarked by Lord Chancellor Bacon, "to contain jurisdiction within the ancient mere-stones without removing the mark;" and having also constantly in mind the maxim that the province of the court is "discreet a non dare legem." In this spirit, as I trust, I proceed to the consideration of the questions involved, taking occasion to express my obligation to counsel, whose able presentation of the law has much relieved the labor of the court, if it could not lighten its responsibility.

If the combination and conspiracy alleged, and the acts threatened to be done in pursuance thereof, are unlawful, it cannot, I think, be successfully denied that restraint by injunction is the appropriate remedy. It may be true that a right of action at law would arise upon consummation of the threatened injury, but manifestly such remedy would be inadequate. The threatened interference with the operations of the railway, if carried into effect, would result in paralysis of its business, stopping the commerce ebbing and flowing through seven states of the Union, working incalculable injury to the property, and causing great public privation. Pecuniary compensation would be wholly inadequate. The injury would be irreparable. Compensation could be obtained only through a multiplicity of suits against 12,000 men, scattered along the line of this railway for a distance of 4,400 miles. It is the peculiar function of equity in such case, where the injury would result not alone in severe private, but in great public wrong, to restrain the commission of the threatened acts, and not to send a party to seek uncertain and inadequate remedy at law. That jurisdiction rests upon settled and unassailable ground. It is not longer open to controversy that a court of equity may restrain threatened trespass involving the immediate or ultimate destruction of property, working irreparable injury, and for which there would be no adequate compensation at law. It will, in extreme cases, where the peril is imminent, and the danger great, issue mandatory injunctions requiring a particular service to be performed, or a particular direction to be given, or a particular order to be revoked, in prevention of a threatened trespass upon property or upon public rights. I need not enlarge upon this subject. The jurisdiction is beyond question, is plenary and comprehensive. Some of the authorities are assembled by Judge Taft in the case of Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. Rep. 730, 19 L. R. A. 885, a case in which the court restrained Mr. Arthur, chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, from giving the order and signal for a strike which was intended to result in injury to the complainant's rights. See also, Blindell v. Hagan, 54 Fed. Rep. 40, affirmed on appeal, 6 C. C. A. 98, 56 Fed. Rep. 595; Coeur d'Alene Consol. & Min. Co. v. Miners' Union of Wardner, 51 Fed. Rep. 220, 19 L.

bursments as were needful. The receivers were also authorized to manage all other property of the company at their discretion and in such manner as in their judgment would produce the most satisfactory results consistent with the discharge of the public duties imposed on them, and to fix the compensation of officers, attorneys, managers, superintendents, agents, and employes in their service. It was further ordered that an injunction issue against the defendant and all claiming to act by, through, or under it, and against all other persons, to restrain them from interfering with the receivers in taking possession of and managing the property.

Subsequently the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as trustee for the holders of bonds and collateral trust indentures, filed an original bill in the same court against the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the individual plaintiffs in the first suit, and the receivers. The relief asked was that the plaintiff as trustee under the mortgages named in the bill be placed in possession of the mortgaged premises, or that receivers of the rights, franchises, and property of the railroad company be appointed with authority to operate its railroads and carry on its business under the protection of the court; that the liens created by the several mortgages be ascertained and declared; and that the mortgaged property, in certain contingencies, be sold and the proceeds applied according to the rights of parties.

The railroad company having appeared in that suit, an order was entered appointing the same persons receivers who were appointed in the first suit, and the two suits were consolidated, to proceed together under the title of the Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Northern Pacific Railroad Company, etc.

By a writ of injunction dated December 19, 1893, the officers, agents, and employes of the receivers, including engineers, firemen, trainmen, train dispatchers, telegraphers, conductors, switchmen, and all persons, associations, and combinations, voluntary or otherwise, whether in the service of the receivers or not, were enjoined—

From disabling or rendering in any wise unfit for convenient and immediate use any engine, cars, or other property of the receivers;

From interfering in any manner with the possession of locomotives, cars or property of the receivers or in their custody;

From interfering in any manner, by force, threats, or otherwise, with men who desire to continue in the service of the receivers, or with men employed by them to take the place of those who quit;

From interfering with or obstructing in any wise the operation of the railroad or any portion thereof, or the running of engines or trains thereon as usual;

From any interference with the telegraph lines of the receivers along the lines of railways operated by them, or the operation thereof;

From combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of said receivers with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad, and from so quitting the service of the said receivers, with

R. A. 382. It would be anomalous, indeed, if the court, holding this property in possession in trust, could not protect it from injury, and could not restrain interference which would render abortive all efforts to perform the public duties charged upon this railway.

It was suggested by counsel that, as improper interference with this property during its possession by the court is a contempt, punishment therefor would furnish ample remedy; and that, therefore, an injunction would not lie. This is clearly an erroneous view. Punishment for contempt is not compensation for injury. The pecuniary penalty for contumacy does not go to the owner of the property injured. Such contempt is deemed a public wrong, and the fine inures to the government. The injunction goes in prevention of wrong to property and injury to the public welfare; the fine, in punishment of contumacy. The authority to issue the writ is not impaired by the fact that, independently of the writ, punishment could be visited upon the wrongdoer for interference with property in the possession of the court. The writ reaches the inchoate conspiracy to injure, and prevents the contemplated wrong. The proceeding in contempt is ex post facto, punishing for a wrong effected.

Asserting then, as undoubted, the right of the court by its writ to restrain unlawful interference with the operation of this railway, I turn my attention to the objections urged to particular paragraphs of the writs. It is contended that the restraint imposed by that part of the original writ to which objection is made by this motion is in derogation of common right, and an unlawful restraint upon the individual to work for whomsoever he may choose, to determine the conditions upon which he will labor, and to abandon such employment whenever he may desire. In the determination of this question it is needful to look to the conditions which gave rise to the issuance of the writ. Here was a railway some 4,400 miles in length, traversing some seven states of the Union, engaged in interstate commerce, carrying the mails of the United States. This vast property was within the custody of the court, through its receivers, in trust to operate it, to discharge the public duties imposed upon it, to keep it a going concern until the time should come to hand it over to its rightful owners with all public duties discharged, and with its franchise, rights, and privileges unimpaired. The receivers employed in the operation of this property some 12,000 men. These men are pro hac vice, officers of the court, and responsible to the court for their conduct. Re Higgins, 27 Fed. Rep. 443. The petition represented to the court—and the facts are confessed by this motion—that some of the men threatened to suddenly quit the service of the receivers, and to compel, by threats and force and violence, other employes, who were willing to continue in the service, to quit their employment; that by organized effort, and by force and intimidation, they would prevent others from taking service under the receivers in place of those who might leave such service, and would thereby, as a means of forcing the receivers to submit to the terms demanded, disable the receivers from operating the road and discharging their duty to the public as a common carrier, and would so conduct themselves by disabling locomotives and cars, and taking possession of the property of the receivers, as to destroy and prevent its use, and hinder and embarrass the receivers in its management, thereby causing incalculable loss to the trust property, and inflicting great inconvenience and hardship upon the public. The restraining portion of the writ complained of, and now under consideration, prohibited these men from combining and conspiring to quit this service with the object and intent of crippling the property of the receivers and embarrassing the operation of the road, and from carrying that conspiracy into effect. The writ was in prevention of the mischief asserted. In no respect, as I conceive, does that portion of the writ interfere with individual liberty. None will dispute the general proposition of the right of every one to choose his employer, and to determine the times and conditions of service, or his right to abandon such service,—to use the expression of Judge Pardee in Re Higgins, supra,—"peaceably and decently." But it does not follow that one has the absolute right to abandon a service which he has undertaken, without regard to time and conditions. It is absurd to say that one may do as he will with-or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad; and, generally,

From interfering with the officers and agents of the receivers or their employes in any manner by actual violence or by intimidation, threats, or otherwise, in the full and complete possession and management of the railroad and of all the property thereunto pertaining, and from interfering with any and all property in the custody of the receivers whether belonging to them or to shippers or other owners, and from interfering, intimidating, or otherwise injuring or inconveniencing or delaying the passengers being transported or about to be transported over the railway of the receivers or any portion thereof, or by interfering in any manner by actual violence or threat, and otherwise preventing or endeavoring to prevent the shipment of freight or the transportation of the mails of the United States over the road operated by the receivers, until the further order of this court.

This injunction was based on a petition of the receivers, urging in view of the general depression in the business of transportation the necessity of reducing expenses, and representing to the court that many employes were threatening that if their compensation was diminished as indicated in a revised schedule of wages which the receivers had adopted to take effect January 1st, 1894, they would prevent or obstruct the operation of the railroads in the hands of the receivers.

A second writ of injunction was issued December 22, 1893. It was based on a supplemental petition of the receivers, and was in all respects like the former one except that it contained, in addition, a clause by which the persons and associations to whom it was addressed were enjoined—

From combining or conspiring together, or with others, either jointly or severally, or as committees, or as officers of any so-called labor organization, with the design or purpose of causing a strike upon the lines of railroad operated by said receivers, and from ordering, recommending, approving, and advising others to quit the service of the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company on January 1, 1894, or at any other time, and from ordering, recommending, advising, or approving, by communication or instruction, or otherwise, the employes of said receivers, or any of them, or of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, to join in a strike on said January 1, 1894, or at any other time, and from ordering, recommending, or advising any committee or committees, or class or classes of employes of said receivers, to strike or join in a strike, on January 1, 1894, or at any other time until the further order of this court.

The appellants as chief executive officers respectively of the brotherhood of locomotive engineers, the order of railway conductors, the brotherhood of locomotive firemen, the order of railway telegraphers, the brotherhood of railway trainmen and the switchmen's mutual aid association, appeared in court on behalf of themselves and their respective organizations and associations, as well as on behalf of such employes of the receivers as were out respect to the rights of others. It is not infringement upon individual liberty to compel recognition of the rights of others. Liberty and license must not be confounded. Liberty is not the exercise of unbridled will, but consists in freedom of action, having due regard to the rights of others. There would seem to exist in some minds a lamentable misapprehension of the terms "liberty" and "right." It would seem by some to be supposed that in this land one has the constitutional right to do as one may please, and that any restraint upon the will is an infringement upon freedom of action. Rights are not absolute, but are relative. Rights grow out of duty, and are limited by duty. One has not the right arbitrarily to quit service without regard to the necessities of that service. His right of abandonment is limited by the assumption of that service, and the conditions and exigencies attaching thereto. It would be monstrous if a surgeon, upon demand and refusal of larger compensation, could lawfully abandon an operation partially performed, leaving his knife in the bleeding body of his patient. It would be monstrous if a body of surgeons, in aid of such demand, could lawfully combine and conspire to withhold their services. It was stated at the argument that this was not a fair illustration of the proposition, because human life was involved. I cannot perceive that the aptness of the illustration is weakened because of that fact. Whether the effect be the destruction of life or the destruction of property, the principle is the same. It would be intolerable if counsel were permitted to demand larger compensation, and to enforce his demand by immediate abandonment of his duty in the midst of a trial. It would be monstrous if the bar of a court could combine and conspire in aid of such extortion by one of its members, and refuse their service. I take it that in such case, if the judge of the court had proper appreciation of the duties and functions of his office, that court, for a time, would be without a bar, and the jail would be filled with lawyers. It cannot be conceded that an individual has the legal right to abandon service whenever he may please. His right to leave is dependent upon duty, and his duty is dictated and measured by the exigency of the occasion. Ordinarily, the abandonment of service by an individual is accompanied with so little of inconvenience, and with such slight resultant loss, that it is a matter of but little moment when or how he may quit the service. But, for all that, the principle remains, recognised by every just mind, that the quitting must be timely and decent, in view of existing conditions; and this I take it, was Judge Pardee's meaning by the expression, "peaceably and decently." He had occasionally only to deal with the particular facts he was considering, but the principle asserted is universal in its application. If what I have stated be correct as to individual action, the principle applies with greater force to the case of a combination of a large number of employes to abandon service suddenly, and without reasonable notice, with the result of crippling the operation of the railway and injuring the public. The effect in this particular instance would have proven disastrous. These labor organizations are said to represent three fourths of all the employes upon the railways within the United States,—an army of many hundred thousands of men. The skilled labor necessary to the safe operation of a railway could not be readily supplied along 4,000 miles of railway. The difficulty of obtaining substitutes in the place of those who should leave the service would be intensified by the fact, asserted and conceded at the argument, that no member of these large organizations would dare to accept service in the place of those who should leave, because such acceptance would be followed by expulsion from their order, and by social ostracism by their fellows. If this conspiracy had proven effective by failure on the part of the court to issue its preventive writ, this vast property would have been paralyzed in its operation, the wheels of an active commerce would have ceased to revolve, many portions of seven states would have been shut off in the midst of winter from necessary supply of clothing, food, and fuel, the mails of the United States would have been stopped, and the general business of seven states, and the commerce of the whole country passing over this railway, would have been suspended for an indefinite time. All these hardships and inconveniences, it is said, must be submitted to, that certain of these men, discontented members of those associations and organizations or of some of them, and moved that the court modify the orders and injunctions of December 19, 1893, and December 22, 1893—

1. By striking from both writs of injunction these words: "And from combining and conspiring to quit with or without notice the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad, and from so quitting the service of said receivers with or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad."

2. By striking from the writ of injunction of December 22, 1893, the above clause or paragraph relating specially to "strikes" which was not in the writ issued December 19, 1893.

The motion was in writing and upon its face purported to be based on the petition and supplemental petitions filed by the receivers, on the orders of the court made December 19 and 22, 1893, respectively, and on the above writs of injunction. Beyond the facts set out in those petitions, the only evidence adduced at the hearing of the motion was documentary in its nature, to wit, the constitutions and by-laws of the associations whose principal officers had been permitted to intervene in the cause.

The court upon the hearing of the motion modified the writ of injunction of December 22, 1893, by striking therefrom the above words in italics: "And from ordering, recommending, approving, or advising others to quit the service of the receivers of the Northern Pacific railroad on January 1, 1894, or at any other time."

The grounds upon which these words were stricken from the second writ of injunction are thus stated in the opinion of the court:

"In fairness this clause must be read in the light of the statements of the petition. It was therein asserted to the court that the men would not strike unless ordered so to do by the executive heads of the national labor organizations; and that the men would obey such orders instead of following the direction of the court. The clause is specially directed to the chiefs of the several labor organizations. The use of the words 'order, recommend, approve, or advise' was to meet the various forms of expression under which by the constitution or by-laws of these organizations the command was cloaked, as, for instance, in the one organization the chief head 'advises' a strike; in another he 'approves' a strike; in another he 'recommends' the quitting of employment. Whatever terms may be employed the effect is the same. It is a command which may not be disregarded, under penalty of expulsion from the order and of social ostracism. This language was employed to fortify the restraints of the other portions of the writ, and to meet the various disguises under which the command is cloaked. It was so inserted out of abundant caution, that the meaning of the court might be clear; that there should be no unwarrantable interference with this property, no intimidation, no violence, no strike. It was perhaps unnecessary, being comprehended within the clause restraining the heads of these organizations from ordering, recommending, or advising a strike, or joiner in a strike.

"It is said, however, that the clause restrains with the conditions of their service, may combine and conspire, with the object and intent of crippling the property, to suddenly cease the performance of their duties. It is said that to restrain them from so doing is abridgment of liberty and infringement of constitutional right. I do not so apprehend the law. I freely concede the right of the individual to abandon service at a proper time, and in a decent manner. I concede the right of all the employes of this road, acting in concert, to abandon their service at a proper time, and in a decent manner; but I do not concede their right to abandon such service suddenly, and without reasonable notice.

The railway is a great public highway. Its primary duty is to the public. In the interest of the public it must be kept a going concern, although it prove unremunerative to the shareholders. Bondholders and shareholders invest their money in view of the public nature of the enterprise. Their rights and interests are subordinated to the public duty charged upon the road. And so also, employes, in entering the service, assume obligations coextensive in kind with that of the corporation. They may, indeed, sever their relation in a proper and decent manner, but they may not legally resort to obstructive methods to compass their demands. Their rights—as the rights of bondholder and shareholder—are subordinate to the rights of the public, and must yield to the public welfare. This public consideration permeates and controls the whole subject. The reason is forcibly stated by Judge Ricks in the case of Toledo, A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. Rep. 744, 752, 19 L. R. A. 395; holding that the duties of an employé of a public corporation are such that he cannot always choose his own time for quitting the service, in the following language: "Holding to that employer so engaged in this great public undertaking the relation they did, they owed to him and to the public a higher duty than though their service had been due to a private person. They entered its service with full knowledge of the exacting duties it owed to the public. They knew if it failed to comply with the law in any respect, severe penalties and losses would follow for such neglect. An implied obligation was therefore assumed by the employes upon accepting service from it under such conditions that they would perform their duties in such manner as to enable it not only to discharge its obligations faithfully, but also to protect it against irreparable loss and injuries and excessive damages by any acts or omissions on their part. One of these implied conditions on their behalf was that they would not leave its service, or refuse to perform their duties, under circumstances when such neglect on their part would imperil lives committed to its care, or the destruction of property involving irreparable loss or injury, or visit upon it severe penalties. In ordinary conditions, as between employer and employé, the privilege of the latter to quit the former's service at his option cannot be prevented by restraint or force. The remedy for breach of contract may follow to the employer, but the employé has it in his power to arbitrarily terminate the relations, and abide the consequence. But these relative rights and powers may become quite different in the case of the employes of a great public corporation, charged by the law with certain great trusts and duties to the public. An engineer and fireman who start from Toledo with a train of cars filled with passengers destined for Cleveland, begin that journey under contract to drive their engine and draw the cars to the destination agreed upon. Will it be claimed that this engineer and fireman could quit their employment when the train is part way on its route, and abandon it at some point where the lives of the passengers would be imperiled, and the safety of the property jeopardized? The simple statement of the proposition carries its own condemnation with it. The very nature of their service, involving as it does the custody of human life and the safety of millions of property, imposes upon them obligations and duties commensurate with the character of the trusts committed to them."

In the case under consideration the receivers sought to change the terms and conditions of service. The employes had, of course, the right to decline service upon the terms proposed. Notwithstanding the public character of the service, ing thereby incalculable loss upon the trust property, as well as causing inconvenience and hardship to the public, particularly to the people in that part of the country traversed by the Northern Pacific Railroad, who are dependent upon the regular, continuous operation of that road for commercial facilities of every kind, as well as for fuel, provisions, and clothing.

It will be observed that the motion of the intervenors does not question the power of the court to restrain acts upon the part of the employes or others which would have directly interfered with the receivers' possession of the trust property or obstructed their control and management of it as well as attempts by force, intimidation, or threats or otherwise to molest or interfere with persons who remain in the service of the receivers or with others who were willing to take the places of those withdrawing from such service.

But it was contended that the circuit court exceeded its powers when it enjoined the employes of the receivers "from combining conspiring to quit with or without notice, the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad, and from so quitting the service of said receivers with or without notice as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad."

This clause embodies two distinct propositions: one, relating to combinations and conspiracies to quit the service of the receivers with the object and intent of crippling the property or embarrassing the operation of the railroads in their charge; the other, having no reference to combinations and conspiracies to quit or to the object and intent of any quitting, but only to employes "so quitting" as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of the railroad.

Considering these propositions in their inverse order, we remark that the injunction against employes so quitting as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of the railroad was equivalent to a command by the court that they should remain in the active employment of the receivers, and perform the services appropriate to their respective positions, until they could withdraw without crippling the property or preventing or hindering the operation of the railroad. The time when they could quit without violating the injunction is not otherwise indicated by the order of the court.

Under what circumstances may the employes of the receivers of right quit the services in which they are engaged? Much of the argument of counsel was directed to this question. We shall not attempt to lay down any general rule applicable to every case that may arise between employer and employes. If an employé quits without cause and in violation of an express contract to serve for a stated time, then his quitting would not be of right, and he would be liable for any damages resulting from a breach of his agreement, and perhaps, in some states of case, to criminal prosecution for loss of life or limb by passengers or others directly resulting from abandoning his post at a time when care and watchfulness was required upon

It becomes necessary, then, to consider whether there is any statute, national or state, applicable to the railway in question, which can be deemed to be a modification of the general law of the land. It was asserted at the argument with great confidence that the act of congress entitled "An act to legalize incorporation of national trades' unions" (24 Stat. at L. chap. 567) had entirely changed the common law. I think the confidence of counsel in the assertion of the proposition was born of zeal, not of judgment. The statute provides for the formation of national trades' unions, with power to establish constitution, rules, and by-laws to carry out its lawful objects, and defines the term "national trades' union" to be "any association of working people having two or more branches in the states or territories of the United States for the purpose of aiding its members to become more skillful and efficient workers, the promotion of their general intelligence, the elevation of their character, the regulation of their wages, and their hours and conditions of labor, the protection of their individual rights in the prosecution of their trade or trades, the raising of funds for the benefit of the sick, disabled or unemployed members, or the families of deceased members, or for such other object or objects for which workmen may lawfully combine, having in view their mutual protection or benefit." The most that can be claimed for this statute is that it removes the common-law disability of combination to raise the price of labor, and to establish the conditions of labor. It contains no suggestion of any right to combine or conspire with a view to injure or oppress or interfere with the rights of others. The organization of labor for the purpose specified in the statute is lawful and commendable, but the statute does not sanction the use of a lawful organization for an unlawful purpose. Nor does it permit such organization to invade the rights of others. Under this act, labor may organize to regulate wages, the hours of labor, and the conditions of labor, and for the protection of individual rights in the prosecution of labor; but such lawful organization cannot be employed to injure property, or for the oppression of others, or to harm the public welfare. There is nothing in the statute which sanctions that which the law, as above declared, condemns.

The Statutes of Wisconsin (Sanborn & Berryman, Rev. Stat. § 4466a) render it unlawful for "two or more persons to combine, associate, agree, mutually undertake or concert together for the purpose of willfully or maliciously injuring another in his reputation, trade, business, or profession, by any means whatever, or for the purpose of maliciously compelling another to do or perform any act against his will, or preventing or hindering another from doing or performing any lawful act." By section 4466c it is rendered unlawful for any person, by threats, intimidation, force, or coercion of any kind, to hinder or prevent any other person from engaging in or continuing in any lawful work or employment, either for himself or as wage worker, or to attempt to so hinder or prevent. By section 4466d a punishment is provided for any one who, individually or in association with others, shall willfully injure or interfere with or prevent the running or operation or shall destroy any locomotive engine or cars or machinery. These statutes are declaratory of the common law, and wholly condemn all conspiracies to injure or oppress, or to interfere with the rights of others. Their efficacy is in no degree impaired by any statutory recognition of the right of organization for the purpose of promoting the welfare of labor. I have been referred to no statute in any state traversed by the Northern Pacific Railroad, and have been able to find none, which in any way changes the law in this regard. I think no state has gone so far in modification of the general rule as have the states of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. But there, as elsewhere, all labor organizations must be for lawful objects, to be accomplished by lawful means. If the ostensible purpose be legal, and the means for its accomplishment legal, still, if the real and secret purpose be illegal,—as for example, that purpose be of extortion or of injury to another,—the wrong cannot be shielded under the guise of a lawful organization. And where the object is to be accomplished by violence, intimidation, and the destruction of property, by coercion and by injury to the public, the organization, although formed his part in the discharge of a duty he had undertaken to perform. And it may be assumed for the purposes of this discussion that he would be liable in like manner where the contract of service, by necessary implication arising out of the nature or the circumstances of the employment required him not to quit the service of his employer suddenly and without reasonable notice of his intention to do so.

But the vital question remains whether a court of equity will, under any circumstances, by injunction, prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another? An affirmative answer to this question is not, we think, justified by any authority to which our attention has been called or of which we are aware. It would be an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for or to remain in the personal service of another. One who is placed under such constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude—a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States or in any place subject to their jurisdiction. Courts of equity have sometimes sought to sustain a contract for services requiring special knowledge or peculiar skill, by enjoining acts or conduct that would constitute a breach of such contract. To this class belong the cases of singers, actors, or musicians who, after agreeing for a valuable consideration to give their professional service at a named place and during a specified time for the benefit of certain parties, refused to meet their engagement and undertake to appear during the same period for the benefit of other parties at other places. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604, 617 (5 De G. & S. 485, 16 Jur. 871); Montague v. Klockton, L. R. 16 Eq. 189. While in such cases the singer, actor, or musician has been enjoined from appearing during the period named at a place and for parties different from those specified in his first engagement, it was never supposed that the court could by injunction compel the affirmative performance of the agreement to sing, or to act, or to play. In Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co. v. Taff Vale R. Co. L. R. 9 Ch. App. 831, 325, Lord Justice James observed that when what is required is not merely to restrain a party from doing an act of wrong, but to oblige him to do some continuous act involving labor and care, the court has never found its way to do this by injunction. In the same case Lord Justice Mellish stated the principle still more broadly, perhaps too broadly, when he said that a court can only order the doing of something which has to be done once for all, so that the court can see to its being done.

The rule, we think, is without exception that equity will not compel the actual, affirmative performance by an employé of merely personal services any more than it will compel an employer to retain in his personal service one who, no matter for what cause, is not acceptable to him for service of that character. The right of employés engaged to perform personal service to quit that service rests upon the same basis as the right of an employer to discharge him from further personal service. If the quitting in the one case or the discharging in the other is in violation of the contract befor an ostensible legal object, is diverted to illegal purposes, and is to that extent unlawful.

Applying the principles of law, as I thus find them established, to the case in hand as presented by the original petition for the writ, it is clear that the facts charged presented to the court the case of an unlawful conspiracy. If it be conceded that the entire force of 1200 men employed upon this railway had the legal right to abandon the service in a body, that right must be asserted and exercised in good faith. The abandonment of service must be actual not pretentious. The combination cannot be justified on the plea of the lawful exercise of a right when the threatened abandonment of service is a mere pretext, the real intent and design being to cripple the property, and to hinder and prevent the operation of the road; and such was the conspiracy declared to the court,—not denied, but confessed by the present motion. It was a conspiracy to compel by intimidation the receivers of the railway against their will to accede to the demands of the conspirators, and therein failing, to cripple this property, and prevent the operation of the road, the necessary result of which would be to inflict great loss upon the public. The conspiracy disclosed was a conspiracy to extort, and failing to extort, to injure; the pretentious exercise of the right to abandon service being one of the means to effect the object of the conspiracy. If the right to quit service in a body be conceded, the case presented is the ostensible exercise of a lawful right, not in good faith, but for an unlawful purpose, to wit, the intimidation and oppression of others, and the injury to property in their keeping, tending to the prejudice of the public. Such a conspiracy is unlawful. It may also be properly said that the conspiracy was as needless as its results would have been disastrous. This vast property was in the custody of the court, through its receivers. By the schedules which for some years had been in force in the operation of this road, as well as by the new schedules proposed to be adopted by the receivers, a thorough civil service had been established in the management of this railway, recognizing by systematic promotion length of service and skillful and honest performance of labor. The service contemplated was continuous and permanent. No man could be discharged except for cause, of which he was to be informed. The right of a hearing upon such charge was secured to him, with right of successive appeals to the superior officers of the road. The employé, however, had the right to abandon his employment at any time. Thus capital and labor co-operated to assure employment, the reward of skill and faithfulness, and protection from discharge from service, except for justifiable cause. This operated to render the service efficient, conserving the interests of both capital and labor, and advancing the public welfare. It was natural, and to be expected, that in consequence of financial disaster there would arise the question of the reduction of wages. An employé, deeming himself wronged by the action of the receivers in respect thereto, had peaceful remedy. The court was at all times open to him to listen to his complaint, and to redress it, if it should appear to be well-founded. Upon such application the receivers would be bound to obey the order of the court in the premises. The employé, nevertheless, not content with the judgment of the court, would have the right to abandon his employment. The case furnishes, as was suggested by counsel, an exceptional instance, where one party to a proceeding in a judicial tribunal is bound by the decision and the other is not. There was, therefore, neither justification nor excuse for a conspiracy to hinder and prevent the operation of this railway, nor necessity for combination for the assertion of any legal right. But if there were no remedy for the employé except abandonment of service, the law will not sanction a conspiracy, the purpose of which is to extort from the receivers or from the court concessions which they could not properly yield, and, failing to procure them, to hinder and prevent, by the means declared, the operation of this railway, to the injury of the trust, and to the oppression of the public. Such was the combination and conspiracy here disclosed. It was to the prevention of the injury thus contemplated that this writ was directed. Its issuance, in my judgment, is justified by the law.

The second branch of the motion has reference to the writ of injunction issued upon the supple-tween the parties, the one injured by the breach has his action for damages, and a court of equity will not, indirectly or negatively by means of an injunction restrain the violation of the contract, compel the affirmative performance from day to day or the affirmative acceptance of merely personal services. Relief of that character has always been regarded as impracticable. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 780, 740, 19 L. R. A. 895, Taft, J., and authorities cited; Fry, Spec. Perf. Cont. 8d Am. ed. §§ 87, 91, and authorities cited.

It is supposed that these principles are inapplicable or should not be applied in the case of employes of a railroad company which, under legislative sanction, constructs and maintains a public highway primarily for the convenience of the people, and in the regular operation of which the public are vitally interested. Undoubtedly the simultaneous cessation of work by any considerable number of the employes of a railroad corporation without previous notice will have an injurious effect and for a time inconvenience the public. But these evils, great as they are, and although arising in many cases from the inconsiderate conduct of employes and employers, both equally indifferent to the general welfare, are to be met and remedied by legislation restraining alike employes and employers so far as necessary adequately to guard the rights of the public as involved in the existence, maintenance, and safe management of public highways. In the absence of legislation to the contrary, the right of one in the service of a quasi public corporation to withdraw therefrom at such time as he sees fit, and the right of the managers of such corporations to discharge an employé from service whenever they see fit, must be deemed so far absolute that no court of equity will compel one against his will to remain in such service or actually to perform the personal acts required in such employment or compel such managers against their will to keep particular employes in their service. It was competent for the receivers in this case, subject to the approval of the court, to adopt a schedule of wages or salaries, and say to employes: "We will pay according to this schedule, and if you are not willing to accept such wages you will be discharged." It was competent for an employé to say: "I will not remain in your service under that schedule, and if it is to be enforced I will withdraw, leaving you to manage the property as best as you may, without my assistance." In the one case, the exercise by the receivers of their right to adopt a new schedule of wages could not, at least in the case of a general employment without limit as to time, be made to depend upon considerations of hardship and inconvenience to employes. In the other, the exercise by employes of their right to quit in consequence of a proposed reduction of wages could not be made to depend upon considerations of hardship or inconvenience to those interested in the trust property or to the public. The fact that employes of railroads may quit under circumstances that would show bad faith upon their part or a reckless disregard of their contract or of the convenience and interests of both em-mental petition of the receivers, restraining any combination or conspiracy having for its purpose the inauguration of a strike upon the lines of the railway operated by the receivers, and from ordering, advising, or approving, by communication or instruction or otherwise, the employes of the receivers to join in a strike. This part of the motion presents the issue whether a strike is lawful. The answer must largely depend upon the proper definition of the term. It has been variously defined. By Worcester, "To cease from work in order to extort higher wages as workmen;" by Webster, "To quit work in a body, or by combination, in order to compel their employers to raise their wages;" the Encyclopedic Dictionary, "The act of workmen in any trade or branch of industry when they leave their work with the object of compelling the master to concede certain demands made by them,—as an advance of wages, the withdrawal of a notice of reduction of wages, a shortening of the hours of work, the withdrawal of any obnoxious rule or regulation, or the like;" the Imperial Dictionary, "To quit work in order to compel an increase or prevent a reduction of wages;" the Century Dictionary, "To press a claim or demand by coercive or threatening action of some kind; in common usage, to quit work along with others, in order to compel an employer to accede to some demand, as for increase of pay or to protest against something, as a reduction of wages; as to strike for higher pay, or shorter hours of work;" Bouvier defines it: "A combined effort of workmen to obtain higher wages or other concessions from their employers by stopping work at a preconcerted time." The definition sanctioned by the court of appeals of New York in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Bouns, 58 N. Y. 581, and embodied by Mr. Anderson in his Law Dictionary, is: "A combination among laborers, or those employed by others, to compel an increase of wages, change in the hours of labor, a change in the manner of conducting the business of the principal, or to enforce some particular policy in the character or the number of men employed, or the like." Mr. Black in his Law Dictionary, defines it to be: "The act of a party of workmen employed by the same master, in stopping work all together at a preconcerted time, and refusing to continue, until higher wages or shorter time or some other concession is granted to them by the employer." Whichever definition may be preferred,—and possibly no one of them is precisely accurate,—there are running through all of them two controlling ideas: First, by compulsion to extort from the employer the concession demanded; second, a cessation of labor, but not the abandonment of employment. The stoppage of work is designed to be temporary, continuing only until the accomplishment of the design, and upon its accomplishment the resumption of employment. The cessation of labor is not a bona fide dissolution of contractual relations and an abandonment of the employment, but is designed as a means of coercion to accomplish the desired result. The cessation of labor is prearranged by the body of men through their organizations, and is to take effect simultaneously at a stated time, for the purpose of preventing the master from continuing his business, and to compel him to submit to the dictation of his servants. The definition of the term proffered to the court at the argument, recognized by the labor organizations of the country, was this: "A strike is a concerted cessation of or refusal to work until or unless certain conditions which obtain or are incident to the terms of the employment are changed. The employé declines to longer work, knowing full well that the employer may immediately employ another to fill his place; also knowing that he may or may not be re-employed or returned to service. The employer has the option of acceding to the demand and returning the old employes to service, of employing new men, or of forcing conditions under which the old men are glad to return to service under the old conditions." This latter definition recognizes the idea of cessation of labor, but not an abandonment of employment. It suggests that the latter may result at the option of the master. It does not, in terms, declare a combination to extort, or to oppress, or to interfere in any way with the business of the employer, except as injury might result as an incident to the cessation of service. If the latter be the correct definition of a strike, society has been needlessly alarmed. I doubt if, in the light of the history of strikes, the ployer and the public, does not justify a departure from the general rule that equity will not compel the actual, affirmative performance of merely personal services, or (which is the same thing) require employes against their will to remain in the personal service of their employer.

The result of these views is that the court below should have eliminated from the writ of injunction the words "and from so quitting the service of the said receivers, with or without notice, as to cripple the property or prevent or hinder the operation of said railroad."

But different considerations must control in respect to the words in the same paragraph of the writs of injunction, "and from combining and conspiring to quit, with or without notice, the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody, or embarrassing the operation of said railroad." We have said that if employes were unwilling to remain in the service of the receivers for the compensation prescribed for them by the revised schedules, it was the right of each one on that account to withdraw from such service. It was equally their right, without reference to the effect upon the property or upon the operation of the road, to confer with each other upon the subject of the proposed reduction in wages and to withdraw in a body from the service of the receivers because of the proposed change. Indeed, their right as a body of employes affected by the proposed reduction of wages, to demand given rates of compensation as a condition of their remaining in the service was as absolute and perfect as was the right of the receivers representing the aggregation of persons, creditors, and stockholders interested in the trust property, and the general public, to fix the rates they were willing to pay their respective employes. But that is a very different matter from a combination and conspiracy among employes, with the object and intent not simply of quitting the service of the receivers because of the reduction of wages, but of crippling the property in their hands and embarrassing the operation of the railroad. When the order for the original injunction was applied for it was represented—and the intervenors admit by their motion that it was correctly represented—that unless the restraining power of the court was exerted the dissatisfied employes and others co-operating with them would physically disable and render unfit for use the cars and other property in the possession of the receivers, and by force, threats, and intimidation used against employes remaining in their service and against those desiring to take the places of those quitting, would prevent the receivers from operating the roads in their custody and from discharging the duties which they owed on behalf of the corporation to the parties interested in the trust property, to the government and to the public.

The general inhibition upon combinations and conspiracies formed with the object and intent of crippling the property and embarrassing the operation of the railroad, must be construed as referring only to acts of violence, intimidation, and wrong of the same nature or class as those specifically described in the previous clauses of the writ. We do not interpret child would be recognized by this baptismal name. One who has read the history of the strike at Homestead, with its cruel murders and barbarous torture; one who has read of the various strikes on railroads, when cars were fired, rails torn up, engines demolished, and life destroyed; one who has read of the not infrequent summoning of the militia by the authorities of the state to put down riot and turbulence,—the universal concomitants of a strike,—would hardly yield assent to the definition suggested as even faintly conveying the true idea of a strike, as known of all men. The only force suggested is the force of inertia, the compulsion wrought by cessation from labor. Such a strike would be a harmless affair, and generally inoperative to effect the end designed. It could be availing only by the combination of the entire labor force of the country, in the nature of things impracticable. Unless, by other coercive measures, the employer is prevented from obtaining men in the place of those who should cease to work, a strike would be a mere weapon of straw. That is well understood by these organizations. While, according to the definition, the employe knows "full well that the master may immediately hire another to fill his place," he also knows full well that that must, at all odds, be prevented if the strike is to be made successful. Consequently the organizations provide, as confessed at the argument, for the expulsion and social ostracism of all members of the organizations who should not abandon work when the order to strike is given, or who should seek to fill the place of a striking member. Thus one of the most effective engines of compulsion is brought to bear upon unwilling members to effect the design of the combination. With respect to laborers not members and willing to work, other and not less effective means of intimidation must be and are employed in prevention of labor. The history of strikes declares that this intimidation has always taken the shape of threats and personal violence. Constructive violence has failed in large measure to prevent the continuance of operation of business by the master. Naturally, therefore, we find resort to actual violence, the destruction of property, the disabling of railway trains, and the like.

Of the ideal strike, in the definition proposed at the argument, the only criticism to be indulged is that it is ideal, and never existed in fact. Undoubtedly, in the absence of restrictive contract, workmen have a right by concerted action to cease work to procure better terms of service, no compulsion being used except that incident to the cessation; subject, however, to the qualification, at least with respect to those employments that directly concern the public welfare, that reasonable notice of the quitting should be given. But such is not the strike of history. The definition suggested is misleading and pretentious. To my thinking, a much more exact definition of a strike is this: A combined effort among workmen to compel the master to the concession of a certain demand, by preventing the conduct of his business until compliance with the demand. The concerted cessation of work is but one of, and the least effective of, the means to the end; the intimidation of others from engaging in the service, the interference with, and the disabling and destruction of property, and resort to actual force and violence, when requisite to the accomplishment of the end, being the other, and more effective, means employed. It is idle to talk of a peaceable strike. None such ever occurred. The suggestion is impeachment of intelligence. From first to last, from the earliest recorded strike to that in the state of West Virginia, which proceeded simultaneously with the argument of this motion, to that at Connellsville, Pa., occurring as I write, force and turbulence, violence and outrage, arson and murder, have been associated with the strike as its natural and inevitable concomitants. No strike can be effective without compulsion and force. That compulsion can only come through intimidation. A strike without violence would equal the representation of the tragedy of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet omitted. The moment that violence becomes an essential part of a scheme, or a necessary means of effecting the purpose of a combination, that moment the combination, otherwise lawful, becomes illegal. All combinations to interfere with perfect freedom in the proper management and control of one's lawful business, to dictate the terms upon which such business shall be con-

the words last above quoted as embracing the case of employes who, being dissatisfied with the proposed reduction of their wages, merely withdraw on that account, singly or by concerted action, from the service of the receivers, using neither force, threats, persecution nor intimidation towards employes who do not join them, nor any device to molest, hinder, alarm or interfere with others who take or desire to take their places. We use the word "device" here as applicable to cases like that of Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, in which it appeared that parties belonging to a labor organization displayed and maintained certain banners in front of the plaintiff's place of business for the purpose of deterring workmen from remaining in or entering his service. As the acts complained of were injurious to the plaintiff's business and were a nuisance, it was held that they could be reached and restrained by injunction. So in Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551, equity interfered by injunction to restrain the conduct of parties, officers of a trades union, who gave notice to workmen by means of placards and advertisements that they were not to hire themselves to the plaintiff pending a dispute between the union and the plaintiff. See also United States v. Kane, 28 Fed. Rep. 743; Emaek v. Kane, 34 Fed. Rep. 46; Owey v. Cincinnati Typographical Union No. 3, 45 Fed. Rep. 135, 12 L. R. A. 193; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555.

These employes having taken service first with the company and afterwards with the receivers under a general contract of employment which did not limit the exercise of the right to quit the service, their peaceable co-operation, as the result of friendly argument, persuasion, or conference among themselves, in asserting the right of each and all to refuse further service under a schedule of reduced wages, would not have been illegal or criminal, although they may have so acted in the firm belief and expectation that a simultaneous quitting without notice would temporarily inconvenience the receivers and the public. If in good faith and peaceably they exercise their right of quitting the service, intending thereby only to better their condition by securing such wages as they deem just, but not to injure or interfere with the free action of others, they cannot be legally charged with any loss to the trust property resulting from their cessation of work in consequence of the refusal of the receivers to accede to the terms upon which they were willing to remain in the service. Such a loss, under the circumstances stated, would be incidental to the situation and could not be attributed to employes exercising lawful rights in orderly ways or to the receivers when in good faith and in fidelity to their trust they declare a reduction of wages and thereby cause dissatisfaction among employes and their withdrawal from service.

The combinations or conspiracies which the law does not tolerate are of a different charac-ducted, by means of threats or by interference with property or traffic or with the lawful employment of others, are within the condemnation of the law. It has well been said that the wit of man could not devise a legal strike, because compulsion is the leading idea of it. A strike is essentially a conspiracy to extort by violence; the means employed to effect the end being not only the cessation of labor by the conspirators, but the necessary prevention of labor by those who are willing to assume their places, and, as a last resort, and in many instances an essential element of success, the disabling and destruction of the property of the master; and so, by intimidation and by the compulsion of force, to accomplish the end designed. I know of no peaceable strike. I think no strike was ever heard of that was or could be successful unaccompanied by intimidation and violence. Counsel at the argument could recall but one which he was willing to indorse as peaceable. That was the strike upon the Lehigh Valley Railroad during the year 1893. The history of that occurrence does not carry out the declaration of counsel. There, as I understand, the running of trains was constantly interfered with, engines and cars disabled and wrecks caused by the violence of the strikers. The president of the company reported to his board of directors that the loss to freight and equipment by reason of the strike—which continued for less than three weeks—was $77,000, of which amount $46,000 was for damage done to locomotives alone. And that strike was not successful, the violence being insufficient. The history and legality of strikes has been well told by Mr. Justice Brewer, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in an admirable address before the New York Bar Association in January, 1893, in language that should be taken to heart by every one who has regard to the safety and peace of society, and the protection of our institutions.

"The common rule," says Mr. Justice Brewer, "as to strikes is this: Not merely do the employes quit the employment, and thus handicap the employer in the use of his property, and perhaps in the discharge of duties which he owes to the public, but they also forcibly prevent others from taking their places. It is useless to say that they only advise; no man is misled. When a thousand laborers gather around a railroad track, and say to those who seek employment that they had better not, and when that advice is supplemented every little while by a terrible assault on one who disregards it, every one knows that something more than advice is intended. It is coercion; force; it is the effort of the many, by the mere weight of numbers, to compel the one to do their bidding. It is a proceeding outside of the law, in defiance of the law, and in spirit and effect an attempt to strip from one that has that which of right belongs to him,—the full and undisturbed use and enjoyment of his own. It is not to be wondered at that deeds of violence and cruelty attend such demonstrations as these; nor will it do to pretend that the wrongdoers are not the striking laborers, but lawless strangers who gather to look on. Were they strangers who made the history of the Homestead strike one of awful horror? Were they women from afar who so maltreated the surrendered guards, or were they the very ones who sought to compel the owners of the property to do their bidding? Even if it be true that at such places the lawless will gather, who is responsible for their gathering? Well, the head of a reputable labor organization, may open the door to lawlessness, but Beckman, the anarchist and assassin, will be the first to pass through; and thus it will be, always and everywhere.

This is the struggle of irresponsible persons and organizations to control labor. It is not in the interests of liberty; it is not in the interest of individual or personal rights. It is an attempt to give to the many a control over the few—a step towards despotism. Let the movement succeed, let it once be known that the individual is not free to contract for his personal services, that labor is to be farmed out by organizations, as to-day by the Chinese companies, and the next step will be a direct effort on the part of the many to seize the property of the few."

No word of mine could give added strength to the thought suggested. The strike has become a serious evil, destructive to property, destructive to individual right, injurious to the conspirators themselves, and subversive of republican institutions. Certainly no court should give encouragement to any combination thus destructive of the very fabric of our government, tending to the disruption of society, and the obliteration of legal and natural rights. Whatever other doctrine may be asserted by reckless agitators, it must ever remain the duty of the courts, in the protection of society,

ter. According to the principles of the common law, a conspiracy upon the part of two or more persons with the intent by their combined power to wrong others or to prejudice the rights of the public, is in itself illegal although nothing be actually done in execution of such conspiracy. This is fundamental in our jurisprudence. So a combination or conspiracy to procure an employé or body of employes to quit service in violation of the contract of service would be unlawful, and in a proper case might be enjoined if the injury threatened would be irremediable at law. It is one thing for a single individual or for several individuals each acting upon his own responsibility and not in co-operation with others, to form the purpose of inflicting actual injury upon the property or rights of others. It is quite a different thing in the eye of the law for many persons to combine or conspire together with the intent not simply of asserting their rights or of accomplishing lawful ends by peaceable methods, but of employing their united energies to injure others or the public. An intent upon the part of a single person to injure the rights of others or of the public, is not in itself a wrong of which the law will take cognizance, unless some injurious act be done in execution of the unlawful intent. But a combination of two or more persons with such an intent and under circumstances that give them when so combined a power to do an injury they would not possess as individuals acting singly, has always been recognized as in itself wrongful and illegal.

The general principle is illustrated in Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 555, 32 L. ed. 223, 228. That was an information in the police court of the District of Columbia charging the defendants Callan and others with a conspiracy to prevent certain named persons, who had been expelled from a local association, a branch of a larger one known as the knights of labor of America, from pursuing their calling of musicians anywhere in the United States. This result, the information charged, was to be effected by the defendants refusing to work as musicians or in any other capacity with the persons so named, or with or for any person, firm, or corporation working with or employing them; by procuring all other members of those organizations, and all other workmen and tradesmen, not to work in any capacity with or for them or either of them or for any firm or corporation that employed either of them; and by warning and threatening every person, firm, or corporation employing such obnoxious persons that if they did not forthwith cease to employ and refuse to employ them, they should not receive the custom or patronage either of the persons so conspiring or of other members of said organizations. The question in the case was whether the accused were entitled to a trial by jury or whether the offense charged was of the class called "petty," for the trial of which a defendant could not at and in the execution of the laws of the land, to condemn, prevent, and punish all such unlawful conspiracies and combinations. Of this duty it was forcibly said by Judge Baker, of the district of Indiana, under like circumstances, in the Lake Erie & Western Cases: "It may do for men that are reckless of the welfare of human society, who care nothing for its peace and good order, to imperil life, property, and liberty, and the perpetuity of our institutions by teaching such doctrines; but the judge who tolerates it ought to be stripped of his gown, and be driven from the sacred temple of justice."

The wrongs of labor are not to be righted by war upon society, by turbulence and disorder, by oppression and force. Such action alienates sympathy, and provokes resentment. In this land, only by peaceable means in the courts, and through the lawmaking power, can wrongs be redressed, and justice be established. Let combined labor deal with combined capital, but only in ways sanctioned by the law. When this lesson is learned, and becomes the rule of conduct, labor will acquire in a decade greater privileges and surer protection from wrong than could be extorted by a century of violence.

By the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. chap. 647), every combination in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states is declared to be illegal. Under this act it was held by Judge Speer in Waterhouse v. Comer, 55 Fed. Rep. 149, 19 L. R. A. 403, that a strike, if it ever was effective, can be so no longer; and this view seems to have been held by Judge Billings in the case of United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council of New Orleans, 54 Fed. Rep. 914. On the other hand, Judge Putman, in United States v. Patterson, 55 Fed. Rep. 605, is inclined to the view that the statute has no relation to labor organizations. I do not find it needful to enter into this field of discussion, or to express an opinion upon the subject, being content to rest my conclusion upon the grounds discussed.

One clause of the supplemental injunction has been characterized as wholly unwarranted. That clause is: "And from ordering, recommending, approving, or advising others to quit the service of the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad on January 1, 1894, or at any other time." In fairness, this clause must be read in the light of the statements of the petition. It was therein asserted to the court that the men would not strike unless ordered so to do by the executive heads of the national labor organizations, and that the men would obey such orders instead of following the direction of the court. This clause is specially directed to the chiefs of the several labor organizations. The use of the words, "order, recommend, approve, or advise," was to meet the various forms of expression under which by the constitution or by laws of these organizations the command was cloaked—as, for instance, in the one organization the chief head "advises" a strike, in another he "approves" a strike, in another he "recommends" the quitting of employment. Whatever terms may be employed, the effect is the same. It is a command which may not be disregarded, under penalty of expulsion from the order and of social ostracism. This language was employed to fortify the restraints of the other portions of the writ, and to meet the various disguises under which the command is cloaked. It was so inserted out of abundant caution, that the meaning of the court might be clear, that there should be no unwarrantable interference with this property, no intimidation, no violence, no strike. It was perhaps unnecessary, being comprehended within the clause restraining the heads of these organizations from ordering, recommending, or advising a strike, or joiner in a strike. It is said, however, that the clause restrains an individual from friendly advice to the employes as a body or individually, as to their or his best interest in respect of remaining in the service of the receivers. Read in the light of the petitions upon which the injunction was founded, I do not think that such construction can be indulged by any fair and impartial mind. It might be used as a text for a declamatory address to excite the passions and prejudices of men, but could not, I think, be susceptible of such strained construction by a judicial mind. The language of a writ of injunction should, however, be clear and explicit, and, if possible, above criticism as to its meaning. Since, therefore, the language of this particular phrase may be misconceived, and the restraint intended is, in my judgment comprehended within the other provisions of the writ, the motion in that respect will be granted, and the clause stricken from the writ.

In all other respects the motion will be denied.

common law claim, of right, a jury. The court held that the offense charged was not a petty or trivial one but one of a grave character, affecting the public at large, and for the trial of which a jury was therefore demandable as of right.

Among the authorities cited in that case were Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111, 121, 38 Am. Dec. 346, in which it was said that "the general rule of the common law is that it is a criminal and indictable offense, for two or more to confederate and combine together, by concerted means, to do that which is unlawful or criminal to the injury of the public, or portions or classes of the community, or even to the rights of an individual; State v. Burnham, 15 N. H. 306, 401, where it was held that "combinations against law or against individuals are always dangerous to the public peace and to public security; to guard against the union of individuals to effect an unlawful design is not easy, and to detect and punish them is often extremely difficult;" and Reg. v. Parrell, 14 Cox, C. C. 508, where the court observed, that "an agreement to effect an injury or wrong to another by two or more persons is constituted an offense, because the wrong to be effected by a combination assumes a formidable character; when done by one alone it is but a civil injury, but it assumes a formidable or aggravated character when it is to be effected by the powers of a combination."

One of the cases cited in Callan v. Wilson is Com. v. Carlise, Bright, (Pa.) 36, 39, 40, in which Mr. Justice Gibson considered the law of conspiracy with care and among other things said: "There is between the different parts of the body politic a reciprocity of action on each other, which, like the action of antagonizing muscles in the natural body, not only prescribes to each its appropriate state and action, but regulates the motion of the whole. The effort of an individual to disturb this equilibrium can never be perceptible, nor carry the operation of his interest or that of any other individual beyond the limits of fair competition; but the increase of power by combination of means, being in geometrical proportion to the number concerned, an association may be able to give an impulse, not only oppressive to individuals, but mischievous to the public at large; and it is the employment of an engine so powerful and dangerous that gives criminality to an act that would be perfectly innocent, at least in a legal view, when done by an individual."

There are many other adjudged cases to the same effect. In State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 286, 59 Am. Rep. 710, it was held after an extended review of the authorities that "a combination of two or more persons to effect an illegal purpose, either by legal or illegal means, whether such purpose be illegal at common law or by statute, or to effect a legal purpose by illegal means, whether such means be illegal at common law or by statute, is a common-law conspiracy. Such combinations are equally illegal whether they promote objects or adopt means that are per se indictable, or promote objects or adopt means that are per se oppressive, immoral, or wrongfully prejudicial to the rights of others. If they seek to restrain trade, or tend to the destruction of the material property of the country, they work injury to the whole people." In State v. Buchanan, 5 Harr. & J. 317, 352, 355, 9 Am. Dec. 534, the court of appeals of Maryland adjudged that "every conspiracy to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act for an illegal, fraudulent, malicious, or corrupt purpose, or for a purpose which has a tendency to prejudice the public in general, is at common law an indictable offense, though nothing be done in execution of it, and no matter by what means the conspiracy was intended to be effected, which may be perfectly indifferent, and makes no ingredient of the crime, and, therefore, need not be stated in the indictment." Again: "There is nothing in the objection, that to punish a conspiracy where the end is not accomplished, would be to punish a mere unexecuted intention. It is not the bare intention that the law punishes, but the act of conspiring, which is made a substantive offense by the nature of the object to be effected." In State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46, the court said: "Any one man, or any one of several men acting independently, is powerless; but when several combine and direct their united energies to the accomplishment of a bad purpose, the combination is formidable. Its power for evil increases as its number increases. . . . The combination becomes dangerous and subversive of the rights of others, and the law wisely says that it is a crime." In Reg. v. Kenrick, 5 Q. B. 49, Chief Justice Denman said that by the law of conspiracy as it had been administered for at least the previous hundred years any combination to prejudice another unlawfully was considered as constituting the offense, and that the offense consisted in the conspiracy and not in the acts committed for carrying it into effect.

It seems entirely clear upon authority that any combination or conspiracy upon the part of these employés would be illegal which has for its object to cripple the property in the hands of the receivers and to embarrass the operation of the railroads under their management, either by disabling or rendering unfit for use, engines, cars or other property in their hands, or by interfering with their possession, or by actually obstructing their control and management of the property, or by using force, intimidation, threats or other wrongful methods against the receivers or their agents or against employés remaining in their service, or by using like methods to cause employés to quit or prevent or deter others from entering the service in place of those leaving it. Combinations of that character disturb the peace of society, and are mischievous in the extreme. They imperil the interests of the public, which may rightfully demand that the free course of trade shall not be unreasonably obstructed. They endanger the personal security and the personal liberty of individuals who, in the exercise of their inalienable privilege of choosing the terms upon which they will labor, enter or attempt to enter the service of those against whom such combinations are specially aimed. And as acts of the character referred to would have defeated a proper administration of the trust estate, and inflicted irreparable injury upon it, as well as prejudiced the rights of the public, the circuit court properly framed its injunction so as to restrain all such acts as are specifically mentioned, as well as combinations and conspiracies having the object and intent of physically injuring the property or of actually interfering with the regular, continuous operation of the railroad by the receivers.

Some reference was made in argument to the Act of Congress of June 29, 1886, legalizing the incorporation of national trades unions. 24 Stat. at L. 86, chap. 567. It is not perceived that this reference is at all pertinent to the present discussion. That act does not in any degree sanction illegal combinations. It recognizes the legal character of any association of working people having two or more branches in the states or territories of the United States, and established "for the purpose of aiding its members to become more skillful and efficient workers, the promotion of their general intelligence, the elevation of their character, the regulation of their wages and their hours and conditions of labor, the protection of their individual rights in the prosecution of their trade or trades, the raising of funds for the benefit of sick, disabled, or unemployed members of the families of deceased members, or for such other object or objects for which working people may lawfully combine, having in view their mutual protection or benefit." Associations of that character are authorized to make and establish such constitutions, rules, and by-laws as they deem proper to carry out their lawful objects. Those objects as defined by congress are most praiseworthy and should be sustained by the courts whenever their power to that end is properly invoked. What we have said about illegal combinations has no reference to such associations, but only to combinations formed with the intent to employ force, intimidation, threats or other wrongful methods whereby the public will be injured, or whereby will be impaired the absolute right of individuals, whether belonging to such combinations or not, to dispose of their labor or property upon such terms as to them seems best.

The principle that a combination or conspiracy of two or more persons to injure the rights of others is illegal, although nothing may have been done in execution of that intent, has been embodied in the statutes of Wisconsin, in which state the present cause is pending. By an act passed April 2, 1887, it was declared that "any two or more persons who shall combine, associate, agree, mutually undertake or concert together for the purpose of willfully or maliciously injuring another in his reputation, trade, business or profession, by any means whatever, or for the purpose of maliciously compelling another to do or perform any act against his will, or preventing or hindering another from doing or performing any lawful act, shall be punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not more than one year or by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars." And by a subsequent act, passed April 25, 1887, it 25 L. R. A.

was declared that "any two or more employers who shall agree, combine, and confederate together for the purpose of interfering with or preventing any person or persons seeking employment, either by threats, promises, or by circulating or causing the circulation of a so-called black list, or by any means whatsoever, or for the purpose of procuring and causing the discharge of an employé or employes, by any means whatsoever, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for a period of not more than one year, or by a fine of not less than fifty dollars, or by both." 1 Wis. Laws 1887, pp. 299, 860, chaps. 287, 849; 2 Wis. Rev. Stat. §§ 4466a, 4466b.

This legislation was followed by an act published May 8, 1887, providing: "§ 1. Any person who by threats, intimidation, force or coercion of any kind shall hinder or prevent any other person from engaging in or continuing in any lawful work or employment, either for himself or as a wageworker, or who shall attempt to so hinder or prevent, shall be punished by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than six months, or by both fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court. Section 2. Any person who shall individually or in association with one or more others, willfully break, injure, or remove any part or parts of any railway car or locomotive, or any other portable vehicle or traction engine, or any part or parts of any stationary engine, machine, implement or machinery, for the purpose of destroying such locomotive, engines, car, vehicle, implement or machinery, or of preventing the useful operation thereof, or who shall in any other way willfully or maliciously interfere with or prevent the running or operation of any locomotive, engine, or machinery, shall be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail or the state prison not exceeding two years, or by both fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court." 1 Wis. Laws, chap. 427, p. 463.

It thus appears that combinations and conspiracies by two or more persons, with the intent to injure the rights of others were illegal at common law, and are public offenses in the state where this cause is pending.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the circuit court properly refused to strike from the writs of injunction the words, "And from combining and conspiring to quit with or without notice the service of said receivers, with the object and intent of crippling the property in their custody or embarrassing the operation of said railroad."

We come next to that clause in the writ of injunction of December 22, 1893, expressly relating to "strikes."

What is to be deemed a strike within the meaning of the order of the circuit court? In the opinion of the circuit judge, made a part of the record, we are informed that at the argument below the definition proffered to the court by the intervenors as one recognized by the labor organizations of the country was as follows: "A strike is a concerted cessation of or refusal to work until or unless certain conditions which obtain or are incident to the terms of employment are changed. The employé declines to longer work, knowing full well that the employer may immediately employ another to fill his place, also knowing that he may or may not be re-employed or returned to service. The employer has the option of acceding to the demand and returning the old employé to service, of employing new men, or of forcing conditions under which the old men are glad to return to service under the old conditions."

The learned circuit judge said that a more exact definition of a strike was "a combined effort among workmen to compel the master to the concession of a certain demand by preventing the conduct of his business until compliance with the demand." And he said: "It is idle to talk of a peaceful strike. None such ever occurred. The suggestion is an impeachment of intelligence. All combinations to interfere with perfect freedom in the proper management of one's lawful business, to dictate the terms upon which such business shall be conducted, by means of threats or by interference with property or traffic, or with the lawful employment of others, are within the condemnation of the law. It has been well said that the wit of man could not devise a legal strike, because compulsion is the leading idea of it. A strike is essentially a conspiracy to extort by violence; the means employed to effect the end being not only the cessation of labor by the conspirators, but by the necessary prevention of labor by those who are willing to assume their places, and, as a last resort, and in many instances an essential element of success, the disabling and destruction of the property of the master; and so, by intimidation and by the compulsion of force to accomplish the end designed."

Under this view of the nature and object of strikes the injunction was directed, generally against combinations and conspiracies upon the part of employés with the design or purpose of causing a "strike" on the lines of railroads operated by the receivers, against the ordering, recommending, advising, approving the employés to join in a "strike," and against the ordering, recommending, or advising any committee or class of employés to "strike" or to join in a "strike."

If the word "strike" means in law what the circuit court held it to mean, the order of injunction, so far as it relates to "strikes," is not liable to objection as being in excess of the power of a court of equity; indeed, upon the facts presented by the receivers and admitted by the motion of the intervenors, it was made the duty of the court to exert its utmost authority to protect both the property in its charge and the interests of the public against all strikes of the character described in the opinion of the circuit judge.

But in our judgment the injunction was not sufficiently specific in respect to strikes. We are not prepared, in the absence of evidence, to hold as matter of law that a combination among employés having for its object their orderly withdrawal in large numbers or in a body from the service of their employers, on account simply of a reduction in their wages, is not a strike within the meaning of that word as commonly used. Such a withdrawal, although amounting to a strike, is not, as we have already said, either illegal or criminal. In Farrer v. Close, L. R. 4 Q. B. 602, 612, Sir James Hannen, afterwards Lord of Appeal in Ordinary, said: "I am, however, of opinion that strikes are not necessarily illegal. A strike is properly defined as 'a simultaneous cessation of work on the part of the workmen,' and its legality or illegality must depend on the means by which it is enforced and on its objects. It may be criminal, as if it be a part of a combination for the purpose of injuring or molesting either masters or men; or it may be simply illegal, as if it be the result of an agreement depriving those engaged in it of their liberty of action, similar to that by which the employers bound themselves in the case of Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 El. & Bl. 47, 66; or it may be perfectly innocent, as if it be the result of the voluntary combination of the men for the purpose only of benefiting themselves by raising their wages, or for the purpose of compelling the fulfillment of an engagement entered into between employers and employés, or any other lawful purpose."

In our opinion the order should describe more distinctly than it does the strikes which the injunction was intended to restrain. That employés and their associates may not unwittingly place themselves in antagonism to the court's authority and become subject to fine and imprisonment as for contempt, the order should indicate more clearly than has been done that the strikes intended to be restrained were those designed to physically cripple the trust property or to actually obstruct the receivers in the operation of the road, or to interfere with their employés who do not wish to quit, or to prevent by intimidation or other wrongful modes, or by any device, the employment of others to take the places of those quitting, and not such as were the result of the exercise by employés in peaceable ways of rights clearly belonging to them and were not designed to embarrass or injure others or to interfere with the actual possession and management of the property by the receivers.

In our consideration of this case we have not overlooked the observations of counsel in respect to the use of special injunctions to prevent wrongs which, if committed, may be otherwise reached by the courts. It is quite true that this part of the jurisdiction of a court of equity should be exercised with extreme caution and only in clear cases. Brown v. Newall, 2 Myl. & C. 558, 570. Mr. Justice Baldwin, in Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co., 1 Baldw. 205, 217, properly said: "There is no power the exercise of which is more delicate, which requires greater caution, deliberation, and sound discretion, or is more dangerous in a doubtful case, than the issuing an injunction. It is the strong arm of equity that never ought to be extended, unless in cases of great injury where courts of law cannot afford an adequate or commensurate remedy in damages. The right must be clear, the injury impending or threatened, so as to be averted only by the protecting preventive process of injunction; but that will not be awarded in doubtful cases, or new ones not coming within well established principles; for if it issues erroneously an irreparable injury is inflicted, for which there can be no redress, it being the act of a court, not of the party who pays for it. It will be refused till the court are satisfied that the case before them is of a right about to be destroyed, irreparably injured, or great and lasting injury about to be done by an illegal act; in such a case the court owes it to its own suitors and its own principles to administer the only remedy the law allows to prevent the commission of the act." The authorities all agree that a court of equity should not hesitate to use this power when the circumstances of the particular case in hand require it to be done in order to protect rights of property against irreparable damage by wrongdoers. It is, Justice Story said, because of the varying circumstances of cases "that courts of equity constantly decline to lay down any rule which shall limit their power and discretion as to the particular cases in which such injunctions shall be granted or withheld." "And," the author proceeds, "there is wisdom in this course; for it is impossible to foresee all the exigencies of society which may require their aid and assistance to protect rights or redress wrongs. The jurisdiction of these courts, thus operating by special injunction, is manifestly indispensable for the purposes of social justice in a great variety of cases, and, therefore, should be fostered and upheld by a steady confidence." Story, Eq. Jur. § 959b.

In using a special injunction to protect the property in the custody of the receivers against threatened acts which it is admitted would, if not restrained, have been committed and would have inflicted irreparable loss upon that property and seriously prejudiced the interest of the public as involved in the regular, continuous operation of the Northern Pacific Railroad, the circuit court (except in the particulars indicated) did not restrain any act which upon the facts admitted by the motion it was not its plain duty to restrain. No other remedy was full, adequate, and complete for the protection of the trust property, and for the preservation of the rights of individual suitors and of the public in his due and orderly administration by the court's receivers. "It is not enough," the court said in Boyce v. Grundy, 28 U. S. 8 Pet. 210, 7 L. ed. 655, "that there is a remedy at law; it must be plain and adequate, or in other words, as practical and efficient to the ends of justice, and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity." And the application of the rule that equity will not interfere where there is an adequate remedy at law must depend upon the circumstances of each case as it arises. Watson v. Sutherland, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 74, 79, 18 L. ed. 580, 582. That some of the acts enjoined would have been criminal, subjecting the wrongdoers to actions for damages or to criminal prosecution, does not therefore in itself determine the question as to interference by injunction. If the acts stopped at crime or involved merely crime, or if the injury threatened could, if done, be adequately compensated in damages, equity would not interfere. But as the acts threatened involved irreparable injury to and destruction of property for all the purposes for which that property was adapted, as well as continuous acts of trespass, to say nothing of the rights of the public, the remedy at law would have been inadequate. "Formerly," Mr. Justice Story says, "courts of equity were extremely reluctant to interfere at all, even in regard to cases of repeated trespasses. But now there is not the slightest hesitation, if, the acts done, or threatened to be done, to the property would be ruinous or irreparable, or would impair the just enjoyment of the property in future. If, indeed, courts of equity did not interfere in cases of this sort, there would (as has been truly said) be a great failure of justice in this country." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 928. So, in respect to acts which constitute a nuisance, injurious to property, if "the injury is of so material a nature that it cannot be well or fully compensated for the recovery of damages, or be such as from its continuance or permanent mischief might occasion a constantly recurring grievance, a foundation is laid for the interference of the court by way of injunction." Kerr, Inj. 1666, chap. 64, and authorities there cited. This jurisdiction, the author says, was formerly exercised sparingly, and with caution, "but it is now fully established, and will be exercised as freely as in other cases in which the aid of the court is sought for the purpose of protecting legal rights from violation."

In the course of the argument some reference was made to the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies." It is not necessary in this case to decide whether, within the meaning of that statute, the acts and combinations against which the injunction was aimed would have been in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states. This case was not based upon that act. The questions now before the court have been determined without reference to the above act and upon the general principles that control the exercise of jurisdiction by courts of equity.

For the reasons we have stated the order complained of is reversed in part and the cause is remanded with directions to sustain the motion to strike out, and modify the injunction, to the extent indicated in this opinion.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Washington, Appt.,
v.

(8 Wash. 194.)

Mere solicitation to commit adultery is not an attempt to commit the crime.

(February 6, 1894.)

A PPEAL by the state from an order of the Superior Court for Douglas County granting defendant's motion to arrest judgment after a verdict convicting him of an attempt to commit adultery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. K. Pendergast, for appellant:

Adultery is a crime in the state of Washington.

2 Hill's Code, P. C. § 198.

Although "adultery" is not defined by the statute, and although adultery is not a criminal offense at common law, yet the statute is valid, for as far as the definition of adultery is concerned, resort is had, by our courts, to the definition given the term by the ecclesiastical courts.

See 2 Whart. Crim. L. 9th ed. §§ 1717, 1720, 1721. Also Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. 509, and note to 82 Am. Dec. 289.

A person may be convicted of an attempt to commit a crime whether such attempt is successful or unsuccessful.

See 2 Hill's Code, P. C. §§ 302, 303.

An attempt to commit adultery is a common-law offense.

State v. Avery, 7 Conn. 266, 18 Am. Dec. 105.

A common form of "attempt" is the soliciting of another to commit a crime.

Ibid.; 1 Bishop, Crim. L. 7th ed. §§ 767, 768b, 768c, 768d; 1 Whart. Crim. L. 9th ed. § 179; Stabler v. Com. 95 Pa. 818, 40 Am. Rep. 656.

Under our statute it is immaterial about the name given to the crime, if the facts set out in the information show that an offense has been committed (whether it be an unlawful "at-

NOTE.—Criminality of solicitation to crime which is not consummated.

I. How far punishable as assault.

II. How far punishable as attempt.

III. How far punishable as solicitation.

The numerous attempts which have been made to punish solicitation to crime indicate a popular feeling that such conduct should be punished.

I. How far punishable as assault.

In certain cases of sexual crimes the contention has been made that solicitation constituted an assault and was punishable as such, but the courts have uniformly refused to countenance such contention, and have held that mere solicitation was not and could not be an assault.

Thus mere verbal solicitation of a woman for sexual intercourse does not constitute an assault. State v. White, 52 Mo. App. 285; State v. Priestly, 74 Mo. 24.

Solicitations, persuasions, and arguments are not sufficient to constitute an assault with intent to commit rape. People v. Fleming, 94 Cal. 308.

So a charge of attempt to assault by soliciting and persuading is not good. Rex v. Butler, 6 Car. & P. 368.

And an indictment for assault with intent to commit rape is not supported by evidence of mere solicitation. State v. Owsley, 102 Mo. 678.

II. How far punishable as attempt.

The authorities are not so uniform upon the question how far solicitation is an attempt. But the weight of authority is in accord with STATE v. BUTLER, that it is not an attempt. The very definition of attempt precludes the possibility of its including a mere solicitation.

A solicitation to set fire to a building is not within a statute providing for the punishment of an attempt to set fire to buildings. McDade v. People, 29 Mich. 50.

A solicitation to commit incest is not indictable as an attempt. Cox v. People, 82 Ill. 191.

Mere delivery of poison to another and soliciting him to place it where it will kill a third person, is not an attempt at murder. Stabler v. Com. 95 Pa. 818, 40 Am. Rep. 653.

See also 47 L. R. A. 108.

Soliciting a person to administer poison to another is not punishable under a statute providing for the punishment of attempts. Hicks v. Com. 86 Va. 223.

So delivering poison to an agent with directions to him to cause it to be delivered to another for the purpose of killing him, is not an attempt under the statute. Reg. v. Williams, 1 Car. & K. 589, 1 Den. C. C. 89.

So mere solicitation to a child to permit an act of sexual intercourse is not an attempt to commit rape within the provisions of a statute punishing such attempt. State v. Harney, 101 Mo. 470.

There are, however, authorities on the other side.

Thus in Griffin v. State, 26 Ga. 493, the court held that a solicitation to another to commit larceny is indictable as an attempt.

And in some cases the court has found that the addition of other acts to the solicitation has been sufficient to constitute an attempt.

Thus an attempt to commit a felony is committed by soliciting a person to set fire to the dwelling house of another, and giving him matches for that purpose, besides offering him a reward, although the matches are not used for that purpose, and the offer is rejected. State v. Bowers, 15 L. R. A. 199, 35 S. C. 232.

So preparing materials for the commission of an arson, followed by a solicitation and attempt to hire another to commit it, are within a statute punishing an attempt. McDermott v. People, 5 Park. Crim. Rep. 102.

So procuring poison and giving it to a child with directions to place it where it will kill a third person, is an attempt to murder. Collins v. State, 3 Helsk. 14.

If, as a result of the counsel and encouragement, an attempt to commit murder is made, the one giving the encouragement may be indicted as a principal in the attempt. Reg. v. Clayton, 1 Car. & K. 123.

III. How far punishable as solicitation.

In some cases solicitation is made punishable by statute.

Thus the Statute 10 Geo. II., chap. 34, § 10, made solicitation to commit murder a capital felony. See Reg. v. Murphy, Jebb, C. C. (Tr.) 315.

tempt" or an unlawful "solicitation") it is sufficient, and the name of the offense may be omitted altogether, or if the name is given it may be rejected as surplusage.

State v. Carey, 4 Wash. 434; Watson v. State, 2 Wash. 504.

In Smith v. Com., 54 Pa. 209, 93 Am. Dec. 600, nothing but a bare solicitation was charged, "and the manner of this is not even hinted." This is far different from the case at bar, where it is charged that the solicitation was by direct invitation, by word of mouth, and by offer of the payment of money, etc., and further, an overt act is charged equivalent to the sending of a letter, to wit, the laying on of hands in a lewd and lascivious manner.

The promise of the payment of money to incite the doing of a criminal act is equivalent to the actual tender of the money.

Walsh v. People, 65 Ill. 58, 16 Am. Rep. 569; People v. Ah Fook, 62 Cal. 493; O'Brien v. State, 6 Tex. App. 665.

At present all attempts to commit either statutory or common-law felony or misdemeanor are misdemeanors.

1 Bishop, Crim. L. 7th ed. § 728, p. 432, § 772, p. 464; Bishop, Statutory Crimes, 2d ed. § 183, p. 126.

So the Statute 24 & 25 Vict., chap. 100, § 4, makes guilty of a misdemeanor a person endeavoring to persuade to the commission of murder. Reg. v. Most, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 244, 14 Cox. C. C. 583, 50 L. J. M. C. 116, 44 L. T. N. S. 823, 29 Week. Rep. 760, 45 J. P. 605.

So the Massachusetts Act of 1863, chap. 91, made punishable the enticing or soliciting of a person to leave the commonwealth for the purpose of entering into the military service elsewhere. Com. v. Jacobs, 9 Allen, 274.

And it has been held that solicitation to commit arson is an "act toward the commission of" arson within a statute making such act punishable. State v. Hayes, 78 Mo. 307.

But under a statute against persuading others to enlist with enemies at war with the country, one cannot be punished unless the incitation is successful, and the person solicited actually enlists. Republica v. Roberts, 1 Dall. 89.

Of course in such cases there can be no question and the difficulty comes when the claim is made that solicitation is punishable at common law.

Charging solicitation slanderous.

There are a number of cases in which it has been held slanderous per se to charge one with soliciting the commission of crime. The earlier cases of this class are not put distinctly on the ground that the charge implies a crime, and are not very valuable authorities upon this question. In fact Lord Holt in the case of Rex v. Higgins, 2 East, 8, refused to consider them altogether. The later cases, however, are put distinctly upon the ground that such words charged the commission of a crime and were therefore actionable. They are therefore given here for what light they may throw upon the question.

It is actionable to charge that plaintiff sent a letter to one, and therein willed him to poison his wife. Pascoe v. Mondford, Cro. Eliz. 747.

It is actionable to charge that plaintiff would have robbed the house of J. S. if J. D. would have consented to it. He persuaded J. D. unto it. Levermore v. Smith, Cro. Eliz. 710.

It is actionable to say of plaintiff that he "went to 25 L. R. A.

There is only one case where a court can arrest the judgment in a criminal action, where the proceeding is by information, to wit:

On the ground that the facts stated in the information do not constitute a crime of misdemeanor.

Laws 1891, § 83, p. 62.

For a criticism on Shannon v. Com. 14 Pa. 226, see 2 Bishop, Crim. L. 7th ed. § 184, note.

See section 604 of volume I., of same in respect to hiring one to commit a crime; and for summary, see volume I., section 772a.

No appearance for respondent.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was charged with attempting to commit adultery, and was tried and convicted. The body of the information is as follows: "Comes now E. K. Pendergast, prosecuting attorney for Douglas county, in the state of Washington, and by this, his information, as provided by law, charges one James Butler with the crime of attempting to commit adultery in the following manner, to wit: He, the said James Butler, on the 8d day of September, A. D. 1892, in the D's house, and would have had him to rob B's house." Froude v. Froude, 2 Lev. 205.

It was held libelous to charge that "T. and one G., agreed to have hired a man to kill me." Tibbott v. Haynes, Cro. Eliz. 191. The ground of the decision was that for such conduct T. might be bound to his good behavior.

Charging giving a woman with child money to get a drug to kill the child is actionable for by it the person's credit is impaired. Cockaine v. Witnam, Cro. Eliz. 49.

In Deane v. Eton, 1 Bulstr. 201, it was held that words spoken of a sheriff that he had placed a woman in a certain person's house to poison her were actionable, as tending to the discredit of the one of whom they were spoken, and a case was cited in which it was held that words charging a woman with having written a letter to another to secure him to poison her husband were actionable.

In Cardinal's Case cited in Eaton v. Allen, 4 Coke 16, it was held actionable to say, "If I had consented to M. C. T. H. had not been alive", but in Eaton v. Allen it was held not actionable to say of one, "he is a brabler and quarreler, for he gave his champion counsel to make a deed of gift of his goods to kill me, and then to flee out of the country." But the ground on which that decision is put does not seem to be very clear. Coke says that it was because the purpose or intent of a man without act is not punishable, while Croke (Cro. Eliz. 684), says it was because the first part of the clause is not actionable, and the latter part is merely a qualification of the first, and is, therefore, not itself actionable.

In Demarest v. Haring, 6 Cow. 76, an action for slander, in which the charge was a solicitation to commit murder, the court held it to be actionable per se on the ground that it was a high misdemeanor for one person to solicit another to commit murder.

So charging one with attempting to bribe another to burn a straw stack is actionable per se. Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

In Crofts v. Brown, 3 Bulstr. 167, a charge against plaintiff that he "keepeth men to rob me" was held not actionable on the ground that it charged no act, but the judges seemed to agree that if the charge had been that he "had hired men to rob me" county of Douglas and state of Washington, did unlawfully, willfully, maliciously, and feloniously intend then and there to have carnal knowledge of the body of one Caroline Skett, the lawful wife, then and there, of one Julius Skett, who was then alive; and the said James Butler, in pursuance of the said unlawful, willful, malicious, and felonious intent, then and there falsely, wickedly, unlawfully, and maliciously, by means of promises of the payment of money, and by direct invitation by word of mouth, and by laying on of hands by the said James Butler upon the person of the said Caroline Skett in a lewd and lascivious manner, and in the absence of all other persons except the said James Butler and the said Caroline Skett, and by various other means, did solicit and incite, and endeavor to persuade and procure, the said Caroline Skett to have sexual intercourse, then and there, with him, the said James Butler; and the said James Butler was then and there the lawful husband of one certain person other than the said Caroline Skett, and whose true name is to said prosecuting attorney unknown,—all of which is contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Washington." A motion in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the information did not charge any offense, was made, which the court granted, and ordered the defendant discharged. The state appeals.

No brief has been filed by the respondent. From the argument of appellant it seems that some question was raised as to whether adultery is a crime in this state; but without going into the question as to whether our statutes upon this subject, which were enacted while we were under a territorial form of government, were repealed by virtue of certain congressional legislation affecting the territories, we will, for the purposes of this case, take it for granted that they are in force. No statement of facts was settled, and the testimony introduced at the trial is not here. The only question presented and argued by appellant is as to whether solicitation to commit adultery is an attempt to commit adultery. It is not contended that Caroline Skett was a consenting party, or willing to commit the act with the defendant. The information contains no such allegation, and the case stands as though she was an unwilling and resisting party. It is not contended that there such words would be actionable, for then an act would be charged to have been done.

In Bray v. Andrews, 7. Moore, 63, the court divided on the question whether or not it was actionable to say that plaintiff "sent his man to kill me."

And it was held not actionable to charge "thou hast hired one W. to kill me," in Murrey's Case, 2 Bulstr. 203.

Solicitation a crime in itself.

There is practical agreement among the courts that solicitation to the commission of some crimes is a crime in and of itself. As to what solicitations come within this rule the courts are not in accord and probably never will be. With reference to some offenses there would be little ground for difference of opinion either that solicitation to commit them was or was not a crime. But with reference to others, individual judgments will differ even as to the advisability of making them statutory offenses.

In State v. Bowers, 15 L. R. A. 199, 35 S. C. 262, it is said that soliciting another to commit a felony is a crime distinct from that of attempting to commit a felony.

So it is an indictable offense at common law for one to solicit another to commit a felony or other aggravated offense, although the solicitation was of no effect, and the crime counseled is not in fact committed. Com. v. Flagg, 135 Mass. 545. In that case the offense solicited was the burning of a barn.

Com. v. Willard, 23 Pick. 476, was a prosecution for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor, and the question before the court was as to the power to compel the purchaser to testify against the defendant, when he declined to testify on the ground that it would tend to criminate himself. This question is not within the scope of this note for the reason that in it the solicitation was effective but as the reasoning of the court seems to have had much influence upon the discussion of the question in other cases, it seems a necessary part of the law upon the subject. Although the offense was consummated, the court from its reasoning and the cases cited, seems to make no distinction between ineffectual and effectual solicitation. It says: It is 25 L. R. A. difficult to draw any precise line of distinction between the cases in which the law holds it a misdemeanor to counsel, entice, or induce another to commit a crime, and where it does not. In general, it has been considered as applying to cases of felony, though it has been held that it does not depend upon the mere legal and technical distinction between felony and misdemeanor. One consideration, however, is manifest in all the cases, and that is, that the offense proposed to be committed, by the counsel, advice, or enticement of another is of a high and aggravated character, tending to breaches of the peace or other great disorder or violence, being what are usually considered mala in se or criminal in themselves, in contradistinction to mala prohibita, or acts otherwise indifferent than as they are restrained by positive law. . . . We know of no case, where an act which, previously to the statute, was lawful or indifferent, is prohibited under a small specific penalty, and where the soliciting or inducing another to do the act, by which he may incur the penalty, is held to be itself punishable. Such a case perhaps may arise, under peculiar circumstances, in which the principle of law, which in itself is a highly salutary one, will apply; but the courts are all of opinion that it does not apply to the case of one who, by purchasing spirituous liquors of an unlicensed person, does, so far as that act extends, induce that other to sell in violation of the statute.

The attempt to draw the line between offenses the solicitation to which is indictable and those in which it is not has not been very successful. Many of the cases have been made to turn, as will be seen infra, on whether or not they are felonies or misdemeanors, or as suggested in Com. v. Willard, 23 Pick. 476, upon whether they were mala prohibita or mala in se.

But in Rex v. Butler, 6 Car. & P. 366, the judge states that he recollects a case in which a person was tried and convicted for soliciting an engraver to make a plate from which false bills of exchange might be made, at a time when the making of such engraving was only a misdemeanor.

In State v. Baller, 26 W. Va. 90, 53 Am. Rep. 66, the court says: "Except in those few cases in which the common law makes solicitation to do certain was any act on the part of the defendant going to an attempt beyond soliciting the said Caroline Skett, and endeavoring to obtain her consent. Is mere solicitation an attempt to commit adultery? It being impossible for one alone to commit adultery, as that requires the co-operation of two persons, it would seem to follow logically that one acting singly could not make an attempt. One person could no more attempt to commit adultery than he could attempt to commit a riot, which, under our statutes, requires the participation of three or more persons. The instances given in the books where the solicitation of another to commit a crime is held to be an offense generally relate to those acts or crimes which can be performed or committed by one person, or where the solicitation to commit the crime is an offense in itself, as distinguished from an attempt. It is urged that a person may be convicted of adultery, or of an attempt to commit adultery, although not a direct participant in the act, by reason of aiding or abetting; but in such a case, where an attempt is charged against such third person, it should appear that there were two persons willing to commit the act of adultery, and that something was done in the way of an attempt. The cases upon this subject are very limited in number. The case of State v. Avery, 7 Conn. 266, 18 Am. Dec. 105, cited by counsel for appellant, which was decided in 1828, does not sustain his contention. That case was based upon a letter sent by the defendant to the wife of another man, containing words importing that she had acted libidiously towards the writer, and inviting her to an assignation for adulterous purposes; and it was held that the writing and sending of such letter was libelous. It was further said that it was immaterial to inquire whether the facts stated in the information amounted to a libel, or a solicitation to commit a greater crime, for, if they constituted an indictable offense within the jurisdiction of the superior court, it was sufficient for the purposes of that case. It was not decided that solicitation was an attempt to commit adultery. In Smith v. Com. 54 Pa. 209, 98 Am. Dec. 690, decided in 1867, it was held that such solicitation did not amount to an attempt.

A distinction has been sought to be drawn, in this particular, to the effect that solicitation to commit adultery is indictable as an attempt in those states where adultery is a acts a substantive crime, . . . solicitation to commit a crime is generally not a substantive crime, and never can be properly an attempt to commit a crime."

But that rule does not allow for the growth of the common law which is certainly a thing of growth. In fact, indictments for solicitation to crime are of comparatively modern origin, and in some cases have not been used until quite recently.

The true rule would seem to be that suggested by Judge Lawrence in Rex v. Higgins, 2 East, 5, who made the question of indictability depend upon whether or not it is prejudicial to the community. This would have to be determined by the average sense of the community which is the ultimate source of all human law. Of course the average sense of different communities will differ, but no more than on any other question.

Solicitation to murder.

As stated supra, there has for some time been a statute in England making punishable solicitation to murder. But it seems that it was an indictable offense even before the passage of the statute. In Rex v. Higgins, supra, Lawrence, J., refers to a case, Rex v. Guy, in which an indictment was sustained for soliciting to murder.

Under an indictment for murder the evidence was that the accused gave a person poison to administer to another, which was done, but discovered in time so that the victim was not killed. Accused was found guilty, and a majority of the judges held both indictment and conviction proper in treating the prisoner as a principal soliciting, and not as an accessory before the fact. Reg. v. Murphy, Jebb, C. C. (1r.) 315.

One sending a letter to a person about to be delivered of a child, advising her to kill it in a certain way pointed out, which letter is intercepted before it reaches the addressee, may be convicted of an attempt to solicit and incite to the murder of the child. Reg. v. Banks, 12 Cox, C. C. 383.

Solicitation to commit murder, accompanied by an offer of money as a reward for so doing, is an offense at common law. Com. v. Randolph, 146 Pa. 83. In that case the court evaded the effect of the decision in Smith v. Com. 54 Pa. 209, 98 Am. Dec. 25 L. R. A.

696 (solicitation to adultery), by making a direct distinction between solicitation to commit felony and to commit mere misdemeanors.

Solicitation to fight a duel.

Somewhat analogous to the cases of solicitation to murder are those of solicitation or challenge to fight a duel. In many of the states this is made a crime by statute. But it is also held to be indictable at common law.

To challenge another to fight a duel is a misdemeanor. Rex v. Rice, 3 East, 551.

So endeavoring to provoke the sending of a challenge is a misdemeanor. Rex v. Phillips, 6 East, 464, 2 Smith, 550.

Sending a challenge to fight a duel is indictable. State v. Taylor, 1 Treadway, Const. 107, 3 Brev. 243.

In Com. v. Tibbs, 1 Dana, 624, the court intimates that an intimation of a desire to fight a duel might provoke such a combat, and so be indictable as a misdemeanor.

The Philadelphia court of criminal sessions held that giving a challenge to fight with fists was indictable in Pennsylvania. Com. v. Whitehead, 9 Law Rep. 143.

Sending a challenge to fight a duel is indictable under the North Carolina statutes. State v. Farrier, 8 N. C. 487.

Arson.

In People v. Bush, 4 Hill, 183, the court said with reference to an indictment for soliciting arson, that the mere solicitation to commit a felony is an offense, whether having been actually committed or not. But in that case there were facts sufficient, in the opinion of the court, to constitute an attempt.

And the argument in State v. Bowers, 15 L. R. A. 199, 25 C. 262, tends to show that the court regards solicitation to arson as indictable although the facts in that case were held sufficient to make out an attempt.

Larceny.

In Rex v. Higgins, 2 East, 5, it was held that to solicit a servant to steal his master's goods is a misdemeanor. Lord Kenyon said: "The offense im-felony, which was the case in the state of Connecticut, while in Pennsylvania adultery was but a misdemeanor. The distinction attempted to be drawn, it seems to us, is not sound in principle. It is based on the ground that in trivial misdemeanors the law will look upon an attempt to commit them as not of sufficient gravity to justify or call for punishment. The decision of the case last cited, however, was not founded upon this distinction, although it recognizes the fact that such a one has been sometimes made, in citing State v. Avery. The court evidently entertained a different view. The opinion says: "An attempt to commit a misdemeanor is a misdemeanor, whether the offense is, created by statute or was an offense at common law. These were the words of Baron Parke in the case of Rex v. Roderick, 7 Car. & P. 795, delivered in the year 1837. They have been adopted by the compilers on criminal law. 1 Russell, Crimes, 46; 1 Archbold, Cr. Pl. 19; Whart. Crim. L. 79, 873." And apparently this had the sanction of the court. The reasons given in that case showing why solicitation should not be held an attempt to commit adultery apply with equal force whether adultery be a misdemeanor or a felony. These relate to the difficulty of determining what is a solicitation. "What expressions of the face," says the court, "or double entendres of the tongue, are to be adjudged solicitation? What freedoms of manners amount to this crime? Is every cyprian who nods or winks to the married men she meets upon the sidewalk indictable for soliciting to adultery? And could the law safely undertake to decide what recognitions in the street were chaste, and what were lewd? It would be a dangerous and difficult rule of criminal law to administer." If adultery is a crime in this state, it is a felony, and, if solicitation is an attempt to commit adultery, it is a criminal offense here. Pen. Code, § 803. It will be observed that this section makes no distinction between an attempt to commit a felony and an attempt to commit a misdemeanor, except as to the degree of punishment; and the distinction above mentioned could not be recognized puted to this defendant is of the most serious kind, no less than that for his own wicked gains he solicited and incited a servant to rob his master. And can it be a question in a country professing to have laws subservient to justice and morality, whether this be an offense? So it is, however, that a great number of cases had been cited, some of which, I confess, tended not to enlighten but to perplex my mind. But it is a matter of satisfaction that the more modern cases have gotten rid of a great deal of jargon on the subject. I dismiss at once from my consideration all the cases of actions for slander. Lawrence, J., makes the question of the indictability of the offense depend upon whether or not it is prejudicial to the community. And all the judges agreed that the solicitation was an offense in and of itself, and did not treat it as an attempt.

In that case Lawrence, J., refers to King v. Broom, an indictment for soliciting the commission of a felony.

Rex v. Higgins, was followed in Reg. v. Quall, 4 Fost. & F. 1075.

And Reg. v. Gregory, 10 Cox, C. C. 459, 1 L. R. 1 O. C. 77, 98 L. J. M. C. 60, 18 L. T. N. S. 383, 15 Week. Rep. 774.

In Reg. v. Daniell, 6 Mod. 99, which was an indictment for enticing an apprentice to leave his master's service, there are some dicta of Lord Holt to the effect that advising one to rob or kill is not indictable, but he also said that persuading a servant to steal his master's goods might be indictable.

But there are statements in Reg. v. Callingwood, 2 Ld. Raym. 1116, 6 Mod. 283, which are to the effect that an indictment for soliciting a servant to take away his master's goods must allege that he took them away. In that case, however, it seems that defendant had received the goods, and this statement is explained in Rex v. Higgins, so as to deprive it of its weight as authority against the position that solicitation is a crime. The case went off, however, upon another count in the indictment, so that all that was said upon the subject of taking the goods was dicta.

Assault.

It is a misdemeanor to persuade, instigate, or incite another to commit an assault and battery, although it is not in fact committed. United States v. Lyles, 4 Cranch, C. C. 469.

Sexual crimes.

In England the spiritual court had jurisdiction of solicitation of chastity. Riaut v. Gallifard, 7 Mod. 78; Lockey v. Dangerfield, 3 Strange, 1100.

And therefore a mere solicitation of chastity was not indictable in the common-law courts. Reg. v. Pierson, Salk. 832.

But there were sexual crimes which were indictable.

Thus sending a soliciting letter to a boy inciting him to commit an unnatural crime is indictable, although the letter is intercepted before it reaches him, so that he never reads it. Reg. v. Ransford, 13 Cox, C. C. 9.

But solicitation to commit sodomy is not an infamous crime within 4 Geo. IV., chap. 54, § 2, providing for punishment of threats to accuse one of an infamous crime, with a view to extort money. Rex v. Hickman, 1 Moody, C. C. 34.

In this country where there is no spiritual court and sexual offenses have become punishable, in the law courts, there is a direct conflict upon the question whether or not solicitation to adultery is indictable.

In Connecticut the court are committed to the opinion that an information will lie against one for soliciting a woman to commit adultery. State v. Avery, 7 Conn. 263, 18 Am. Dec. 105.

In Pennsylvania, however, it has been held that an indictment charging that one had "solicited, incited, and endeavored to procure" a married woman to commit adultery is not good. Smith v. Com. 54 Pa. 209, 93 Am. Dec. 686. In that case the court distinguishes State v. Avery, on the ground that in Connecticut adultery is a felony, while in Pennsylvania it is not. And there is a further distinction made that in the Connecticut case there was the overt act of sending a letter, while in the Pennsylvania case there is no overt act shown.

There is no way of harmonizing these cases except upon the ground that in Connecticut adultery is regarded as a much more serious offense than it is in Pennsylvania, and that solicitation to commit the offense is regarded as prejudicial to the community in the one state while in the other it is not.

In Reg. v. Tyrrell [1894] 1 Q. B. 710, it was held to be no indictable offense for a girl under sixteen to solicit a man to a criminal knowledge of her although the act was consummated, and rendered here, even if adultery was but a misdemeanor under the statutes. It may be well to note, however, what some of the courts and law writers have said relating to the subject under consideration. In the case of Com. v. Willard, 23 Pick. 476, it was held that the purchaser of spirituous liquor sold in violation of the statute does not subject himself to any penalty, either at common law, as inducing the seller to commit a misdemeanor, or under the statute. It was said in that case: "It is difficult to draw any precise line of distinction between the cases in which the law holds it a misdemeanor to counsel, entice, or induce another to commit a crime, and where it does not. In general, it has been considered as applying to cases of felony though it has been held that it does not depend upon the mere legal and technical distinction between felony and misdemeanor. One consideration, however, is manifest in all the cases, and that is that the offense proposed to be committed by the counsel, advice, or enticement of another is of a high and aggravated character, tending to breaches of the peace or other great disorder and violence, being what are usually considered mala in se, or criminal in themselves, in contradistinction to mala prohibita, or acts otherwise indifferent than as they are restrained by positive law." In the case of Com. v. Harrington, 3 Pick. 26, it was held that the letting of a house for the purposes of prostitution, with the intent that it should be thus used, was an offense at the common law. The keeping of such a disorderly house was not a felony, but a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated character tending to general disorderly breaches of the peace, and a common nuisance to the community. There was no statute in Massachusetts relating to it. In Wharton on Criminal Law, 9th ed. § 179, in speaking of solicitations, the author says: "Are solicitations to commit crime independently indictable? They certainly are, as has been seen, when they, in themselves, involve a breach of the public peace, as is the case with challenges to fight and seditious addresses. They are also indictable when their object is interference with public jus-the man liable to punishment under the terms of the statute.

In Maryland it has been held that a solicitation to a pregnant woman to take drugs for the purpose of effecting a miscarriage is not a misdemeanor. Lamb v. State, 37 Md. 524. In that case the argument of both the court and the dissenting judge seems to turn upon the further question of whether or not a solicitation was an attempt.

Avoidance of legal process.

There is an early English case on this subject against the indictability of such an offense but the ground upon which the decision was placed is not in accord with the reasoning of later cases.

An indictment for persuading an apprentice to withdraw himself from his master so that he would not be taken on a warrant which had been procured against him for an offense which he had committed, was held bad because it did not appear that the apprentice had withdrawn himself from the warrant "and if he did not so, the persuasion was nothing." Vaughan's Case, Popham, 134.

Bribery.

Many kinds of bribery are made punishable by statute, but the principle seems to be in accord with the common-law rule.

Offering money to a counselor of the king for procuring an appointment to office is a misdemeanor at common law. Rex v. Vaughan, 4 Burr. 2494.

In United States v. Worrall, 2 Dall. 385, the indictment contained two counts. One charged that defendant "wickedly contriving and contending to bribe and seduce" a public officer from the performance of the trust and duty imposed in him, wrote a letter, which is set out, and which offered money if a public contract was awarded to defendant. The other count charged that defendant "wickedly, advisedly, and corruptly did solicit, urge, and endeavor to procure" the officer to give defendant a preference in the awarding of the contract. It does not seem to have been doubted that an offense had been committed, but the court was divided in opinion as to its power to punish it in the absence of statute, but a light sentence was finally imposed upon defendant.

An offer to receive a bribe must be regarded as a solicitation to bribe, and as such is punishable at 25 L. R. A. common law. Walsh v. People, 65 Ill. 53, 16 Am. Rep. 569.

An information will lie for attempting to bribe a voter at an election. Rex v. Plympton, 2 Ld. Raym. 1377.

So in Hefelton v. Lister, Cooke, 88, a defendant was committed to the fleet for offering money to plaintiff's attorney to go out of court and permit the justification of certain worthless bail whom defendant had offered.

Interference with witnesses.

An unsuccessful endeavor to prevent a witness from attending to testify before the grand jury is a substantive offense punishable at common law. State v. Carpenter, 20 Vt. 2.

Endeavoring to cause a witness to absent himself from a prosecution is an indictable offense. State v. Keyes, 8 Vt. 57, 30 Am. Dec. 450.

To solicit a witness recognized to appear in a criminal case to absent himself from the trial is indictable. State v. Ames, 64 Me. 393.

In Rex v. Lady Lawly, Fitzg. 263, an indictment was sustained against defendant for endeavoring to keep away from a trial a witness material to prove an offense for which a third person was indicted.

An offer to bribe a witness is punishable by statute in Texas. Jackson v. State, 43 Tex. 421.

In Schofield's Case, Cald. 400, an anonymous case is cited in which it was held a misdemeanor to attempt to suborn a witness.

In Reg. v. Turvy, Holt, 364, Lord Holt said: To persuade and solicit to perjury is a crime.

So in later cases it has been held that solicitation to perjury is indictable. State v. Holding, 1 McCord, L. 51; Rex v. Johnson, 2 Show. 1.

But in State v. Baller, 26 W. Va. 90, 53 Am. Rep. 66, the court decided that giving one money to give to a witness to induce him to stay away from a trial, is not an attempt to induce the witness to stay away.

Interference with jury.

In State v. Sales, 2 Nev. 239, the court held that there could be no indictment for attempting to commit embezzlement, but that there might be an indictment for soliciting another to commit the crime.

tice; as, where a resistance to the execution of a judicial writ is counseled, or perjury is advised, or the escape of a prisoner is encouraged." "But," says the author, "is a solicitation indictable when it is not either (1) a substantive indictable offense, as in the instances just named, or (2) a stage towards an independent consummated offense?" And he says: "The better opinion is that, where the solicitation is not in itself a substantive offense, or where there has been no progress made towards the consummation of the independent offense attempted, the question whether the solicitation is, by itself, the subject of penal prosecution, must be answered in the negative;" and he maintains that solicitation is not an attempt to commit adultery. In speaking of the subject further, he says: "For we would be forced to admit, if we hold that solicitations to criminality are generally indictable, that the propagandists, even in conversation, of agrarian or communistic theories, are liable to criminal prosecutions; and hence the necessary freedom of speech and of the press would be greatly infringed. It would be hard, also, we must agree, if we maintain such general responsibility, to defend, in prosecutions for soliciting crime, the publishers of Byron's Don Juan, of Rousseau's Emile, or of Goethe's Elective Affinities. Lord Chesterfield, in his letters to his son, directly advises the latter to form illicit connections with married women. Lord Chesterfield, on the reasoning here contested, would be indictable for solicitation to adultery. Undoubtedly, when such solicitations are so publicly and indecently made as to produce public scandal, they are indictable as nuisances or as libels; but to make bare solicitations or allurements indictable as attempts not only unduly and perilously extends the scope of penal adjudication, but forces on the courts psychological questions which they are incompetent to decide, and a branch of business which would make them despots of every intellect in the land. What human judge can determine that there is such a necessary connection between one man's advice and another man's action as to make the former the cause of the latter? An attempt, as has been stated, is such an intentional preliminary guilty act as will apparently result, in the usual course of natural events, if not hindered by extraneous causes, in the commission of a deliberate crime. But this cannot be affirmed of advice given to another, which advice such other person is at full liberty to accept or reject. Following such reasoning, several eminent European jurists have declined to regard solicitations as indictable, when there is interposed between the bare solicitation, on the one hand, and the proposed illegal act, on the other, the resisting will of another person, which other person refuses assent and co-operation." In a somewhat later work (1 Bishop, Crim. L.), a partially contrary view is indorsed. This author goes further. In section 768 he says: "Though, to render a solicitation indictable it is, as in other attempts, immaterial, in general, whether the thing proposed to be done is technically a felony or a misdemeanor, still, as the soliciting is the first step, only, in a gradation reaching to the consummation, the thing intended must, on principles already explained, be of a graver nature than if the step lay further in advance." He is of the opinion that solicitation is an attempt to commit adultery as a necessary step or ingredient in the offense. Section 767.

The question is a somewhat vexed one under the conflict of authorities relating to the various phases of the subject. The inquiry in this case is not whether solicitation to commit adultery is an offense in itself of a distinct character but whether it is an offense because it is an attempt to commit adultery. The instances of such solicitation which have been brought to the attention of the courts are but few indeed, extending over a long period of years, but resort can be had to some of a kindred nature, or perhaps, more properly, which have a bearing on some of the principles involved. In the case of Rex v. Butler, 6 Car. & P. 368, decided in 1834, sometimes cited, it was said: "An attempt to commit a misdemeanor created by statute is a misdemeanor itself;" citing Rex v. Harris, 6 Car. & P. 129. In Shannon v. Com., 14 Pa. 226, it was held that a conspiracy to commit adultery was not an offense; and in Miles v. State, 58 Ala. 890, a similar decision was arrived at. Adultery was but a misdemeanor, however, in that state also, though it is not apparent that any importance was attached to this fact in either of these cases. In Cox v. People, 82 Ill. 191, it was held that solicitation to commit incest was not an attempt to commit the crime of incest, which was a felony. We have not failed to note the criticism of this case, and the citation it relies on from Wharton's Criminal Law, above quoted by Mr. Bishop in his valuable work. But the case also relies on Smith v. Com. and Com v. Willard, supra; and these cases are authority, as we view them, with other authorities herein cited, on the ground that the distinction mentioned sometimes drawn between attempts to commit felonies and attempts to commit misdemeanors, or between attempts to commit grave, as distinguished from trivial, misdemeanors, is not a well-established one, nor well founded, when viewed merely as an attempt, and not as a substantive offense.

Now, it seems to us that solicitation to commit adultery is no part of the act of adultery itself, and consequently cannot be held to be an attempt. What is it? It involves the expression of a desire and a willingness on the part of one person to commit the act of adultery with another, and an attempt to get that person's consent, but no more. Follow it a step further. Suppose the consent of the other person is obtained, and, in pursuance of it, if there is no immediate opportunity to gratify the then mutual desire, a conspiracy is entered into to commit the offense between these persons, which involves the expressed consent and agreement of both of them, and some understanding between them as to when and where the offense shall be committed, and the naming of a propitious time and place to commit it. It seems that this would be much more in the way of an attempt than the case presented here; and, if that does not amount to an offense or an attempt, how can it be said that such an intention and willingness, coupled with solicitation upon the part of one person only, can amount to an attempt to commit the offense? We are of the opinion that the judgment of the Superior Court should be affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

WEST PUBLISHING CO. v. LAWYERS' CO-OPERATIVE PUBLISHING CO.

1. A valid copyright may be held by one reporting judicial decisions for his original work published in connection with the opinions and syllabi prepared by the judge.
2. The compiler of a digest has no monopoly of the opinions, decisions, and syllabi prepared by the courts and judges, even though he has previously published them in copyrighted pamphlets.
3. Copyrighted headnotes suitable for use in a digest prepared by the publisher of a series of reports and a digest cannot be used by a subsequent compiler of a digest either directly or by way of suggestion to lighten his labors, except as a guide to verify the accuracy of his work or detect errors, omissions, or other faults.
4. The doctrine of confusion of goods is not applicable to a suit to enjoin the publication of a digest of judicial decisions as an infringement of a copyright, where there is no connection between the pirated paragraphs and those which are the result of original and honest labor.

5. Proof that a digest containing 38,000 paragraphs separate and distinct from each other contains 808 paragraphs which infringe the copyrights of another raises no presumption that the remainder of the work is an infringement.
6. Complainant in a suit for infringement of a copyright of a digest is not relieved of the burden of proving the infringement by the fact that he proves part of his case and convinces the court that it will be difficult to prove the rest.
7. Mala fides cannot be imputed to the compiler of an annual digest of judicial decisions in using copyrighted reports published during the year for the purpose of making such digest.
8. The publication of a digest of judicial decisions will not be enjoined on proof that less than one per cent of the number of paragraphs therein infringe the copyrights of another publisher, as such infringing paragraphs can readily be separated from the remainder of the book.

(November 7, 1894.)

NOTE.—This appears to be the first case upon the question of the right to use published opinions for digest purposes, and the authorities bearing upon it are all cited by court or counsel. The novelty of the subject is sufficient to justify the publication of the opinion delivered upon the motion for the preliminary injunction which was as follows:

Coxe, District Judge:

I have delayed deciding this motion until the last moment before starting for the New York circuit, and have given to its consideration all the time which could be spared from other matters even more pressing. I have reached the conclusion that the temporary stay should be vacated; that the defendant should enter into a bond, if required to do so, conditioned to keep an account of all digests sold and for the payment to the plaintiff of such damages as the court may award in case the final decree is for the plaintiff; that an injunction should issue restraining future infringements of the plaintiff's copyrights, and also restraining the selling of the present digest to all persons except the defendant's regular subscribers, and those with whom it has contracted to deliver copies by agreements made before the service of these motion papers.

I do not pretend that this order does absolute justice, but I think that it approaches as near to that result as any order that can be made, while the matters in dispute are undetermined. My reasons for this conclusion may be hastily summarized as follows: Both parties compile and publish law digests. The moving papers present some 55 instances of alleged piracy in the defendant's digest. Since the argument, another statement, containing 108 similar instances, has been forwarded; making in all 163 alleged cases of piracy. Some of these employ language so nearly identical with the copyrighted language that the presumption is well-nigh conclusive that it was copied from the plaintiff's books. As to others the contention is made by the defendant that the similarity of language is accounted for by the fact that both paragraphs were copied verbatim from the opinion of the court. It is impossible to verify this contention without a long, wearisome and complicated comparison, which the court has no time to make, and should not be called upon to make. I am confident that if this examination is sent to a referee it will delay the matter for several weeks at least. The plaintiff having failed to satisfy the court, in view of the defendant's affidavits, that an injunction should issue at once, the court will hardly be justified in permitting the preliminary stay to continue in order that the plaintiff may have time to make a stronger case. If the stay continues it will work great injury to the defendant, for which there is little, if any, redress. Should it subsequently appear that the defendant is right as to a large proportion of the paragraphs in dispute it will be too late to offer any reparation for the serious injury which has been done. The court should be very sure, much surer than it can be at present, that the plaintiff is right before dealing so fatal a blow to the defendant.

The defendant's digest has been issued during the past year in semi-monthly pamphlets which have been regularly sent to the plaintiff, who is a subscriber. Their contents, presumably, were known to the plaintiff several months ago. The plaintiff has waited until the defendant's digest is printed and ready for delivery, and now seeks to have the alleged pirated paragraphs stricken out or the entire volume suppressed. If this action had been commenced two months ago the court would have had ample opportunity to determine with accuracy what is and what is not pirated. The defendant would then have been directed to omit objectionable matter, which could have been done without great injury or expense. Now, however, an injunction will compel the mutilation of a completed edition, and perhaps, a printing of a new edition, with its attending expense and delay. I cannot think that the court will be justified in so harsh a measure where the infringing matter is so small a proportion of the entire work. It is said that the total number of cases digested in defend-

ON final hearing of a suit brought to enjoin the alleged infringement of copyrights by a digest containing about 38,000 paragraphs and to recover damages for such infringement. Decree making permanent a temporary injunction against 303 paragraphs and denying general injunction asked for.

The opinion handed down upon the granting of the temporary injunction was reported in 58 Fed. Rep. 265.

Statement by Coxe, District Judge:

This is an action in equity to restrain the infringement of five hundred and seven copyrights covering that number of pamphlets, published by the complainant, containing reports of decided causes in the state and federal courts.

A motion for an injunction pendente lite having been made the question of infringement was referred to a master who filed a report finding infringement in three hundred and three paragraphs. The master also filed the following opinion, which sufficiently states the facts in controversy.

"This is a reference to the master to hear and determine the issues raised on motion for injunction pendente lite in a copyright case and to report the portions of defendant's publications that infringe the copyright of complainant.

"There is practically no dispute on the facts alleged in regard to publication and copyright, the question of piracy being the real issue.

"The complainant, the West Publishing Company, assumes to report decisions of all the courts of last resort (and some of the intermediate courts) in this country in what is called the National Reporter System. The system is made up of various parts or reporters, the United States being divided territorially into convenient and appropriate districts for the purpose, about a dozen in number. Each reporter is published weekly in pamphlet form, and contains the current opinions of the courts of its respective district, preceded by headnotes and preliminary statements. These opinions are obtained by complainant from official sources at great expense, and with few exceptions are by far the earliest publication thereof. Ninety per cent at least of the opinions published are published for the first time in complainant's system, and in some cases, as in this court, it is practically the only publication made.

"The original work of complainant in these weekly parts—that is, the headnotes and preliminary statements (excepting those prepared by the courts or foreign reporters)—and all other matter therein, except the opinions, are copyrighted. Taking the headnotes of these weekly parts as a basis, complainant constructs and publishes a digest in monthly parts, which monthly parts, with additions of selected cases and references to official reports, go to make up its Annual Digest—a single volume, called the 'American Annual Digest.' The volume for the year 1892 (with the monthly parts and reporters on which it is based) is the one in suit, the digest year being from September to September.

"The defendant, the Lawyers' Co-operative Publishing Company, publishes, among other publications, the General Digest of the United States, a work of the same purport as the American Annual Digest, and compiled in the main from parts which they publish semi-monthly, the General Digest Annual for the year 1892 ant's book is 19,000. The disputed paragraphs, therefore, assuming that all are pirated, amount to less than 1 per cent. It is apparent that the damage to the defendant, should an injunction issue as prayed for, would be entirely out of proportion to the damage which the plaintiff will suffer if the preliminary writ is refused. The plaintiff has already supplied its customers with the digest published by it for 1892. It has had no interference from the defendant, and it cannot be maintained, therefore, that the defendant's digests are likely to displace any of the plaintiff's digests or entice away any of the plaintiff's customers.

It is the duty of the court in all these cases to take into consideration the situation of both parties, and not to issue the writ except in the plainest cases, where the result will be irreparable injury to the defendant without corresponding advantage to the plaintiff. It is always wiser, in such cases, to wait for the final proofs.

In Sargent v. Seagrave, 3 Curt. C. C. 553, 557, Judge Curtis said: "The court looks to the particular circumstances to see what degree of inconvenience would be occasioned to one party or the other by granting or withholding the injunction."

In McNeill v. Williams, 11 Jur. 344, the vice-chancellor said: "The court has, of late years especially, given great weight to the consideration of the question, which of the two parties to the dispute is more likely to suffer by an erroneous or hasty judgment of an interlocutory nature against them; and to the consideration also of the very possible if not probable effect which an injunction may have to the defendant's prejudice in an action. I have in this case to weigh, on the one hand, the suspicious nature of the defendant's case, for suspicious, I confess, upon the present materials, it appears to me to be, and the probable mischief from not interfering at present in his favor, if he should ultimately prove to be right; and, on the other hand, the possibility—the rational possibility—for I am unable to bring myself to deny the rational possibility—that the plaintiff may be right. I have also to consider the mischief generally that may be done by interfering in this stage of the cause if the defendant shall ultimately appear to be right, including particularly the possible prejudice which may be created against them in an action by the existence of an injunction. Upon the whole, I think the ends of justice in this case will be better answered by abstaining from granting the injunction at present."

In Bramwell v. Halcumb, 8 Myl. & C. 732, the chancellor said: "It is obvious that it is the interest of both parties that the injunction should be dissolved; for if, in consequence of piracy, the defendant is, in fact, selling the plaintiff's work, the plaintiff will have the profits of the publication; but if, on the contrary, no piracy has been committed, a very great hardship is inflicted on the defendant."

In Spottiswoode v. Clarke, 3 Phil. Ch. 157, the facts were in many respects similar to those in the case at bar. The chancellor said: "But the greatest of all objections is that the court runs the risk of doing the greatest injustice in case its opinion upon the legal right should turn out to be erroneous. Here is a publication which, if not issued this month, will lose a great part of its sale for the ensuing year. If you restrain the party from selling immediately you probably make it impossible for him to sell at all. You take property out of his pocket and give it to nobody. In such a case, if the plaintiff is right, the court has some means at least of indemnifying him, by making the defendant keep an account; whereas, if the defendant be right, and he be restrained, it is utterly impossible to give him compensation for the loss he will have sustained. And the effect of the order in that event will be to commit a great and irremediable injury."

See also, High on Injunctions, § 1026; Walker, Patents, § 702; Drone, Copyright, pp. 517, 518.

It is thought that the plaintiff will be fully protected if its copyrights are respected in the future and damages are paid for whatever injury it may have sustained from past infringements, and especially so, if the defendant is enjoined from selling its digests to new customers until it has proved its innocence of the present charge.

being the volume claimed by complainant to contain pirated matter in infringement of complainant's copyright.

"The defendant is a subscriber to the various reports of complainant, and receives them in the usual weekly parts, and in these publications are found at least nine tenths of the opinions used by them from which their digest paragraphs are claimed to be written. These weekly parts are distributed on their receipt among the defendant's several editors who from these pamphlets write the digest paragraphs which appear first in the semi-monthly parts of the General Digest and thereafter in the Annual.

"From the testimony of the defendant it appears that its digest paragraph writer, when using the reporter, has before him in his work the syllabus and preliminary statement prepared by complainant, the same being directly followed by the opinion, and that without referring to the syllabus in any manner he constructs his digest paragraph from the opinion and that alone.

"Defendant's publication is principally the work of eight editors, who have each been sworn and given similar testimony to the effect that they had instructions never to consult the headnotes of other publications, unless the same were made by the court; that they never used in any way the headnotes of complainant's publication, and some of them that they never read the headnotes either before or after they had finished their work, even for comparison. One of the editors, however, Mr. Coffin, in his deposition stated that he invariably read the syllabi of complainant the first thing, but he made no use of them in his work; and Mr. Greenhoot that he sometimes did read them and sometimes not; but with two exceptions, where he could not find different expressions, he never made use of complainant's headnotes. Another, Mr. Hill, testified that after he had formulated his headnotes he sometimes compared his work with complainant's for curiosity merely.

"These editors in reply to questions as to the average amount of work they are capable of performing in a day in writing digest paragraphs from the opinions in complainant's publications, state variously, but it is between twenty and forty cases in a day's work; Mr. Greenhoot testifying that he averaged between eight and ten in an evening's work; Mr. Rich and Mr. Herrick that they averaged between thirty and forty in a day, and Mr. Havland between twenty and thirty in a day.*

"In reply to this line of testimony complainant produces as many editors of its own staff, who testify to the impossibility of doing in a day the amount of original paragraph writing claimed by defendant's editors. Their testimony shows that from their experience the average is between four and seven cases a day, but that in preparing paragraphs from the headnotes of their own reporters for use in the digest they could then do between thirty and forty cases in a day. Mr. Appleton, one of the complainant's principal editors, testifies that defendant's editor Greenhoot, who testified that his capacity was eight to ten cases in an evening's work, when employed by complainant in 1889 and for several years prior, was unable to do more than three cases in a day's work of eight hours.

"The only witness produced not in some way connected with the parties was Mr. Sickels, the New York Court of Appeals reporter, who was called by complainant. In a number of respects he substantiated the testimony of complainant's editors. He testified mainly from his own extensive experience as a reporter, stating that he considered himself a rapid worker; that he averaged in reporting but little more than four cases a day; that if a digester had before him and utilized the headnotes of other writers it might be possible to do as many as twenty to thirty cases in a day's work; otherwise, he did not deem it possible to average more than from four to six cases in a day.

"With these facts set forth complainant introduces and points out to the master some five hundred paragraphs taken from defendant's General Digest with the corresponding paragraphs from complainant's reporters and digesters from which it is claimed defendant's paragraphs are pirated. These represent, of course, but a small portion of the complete work, which consists of some thirty-eight thousand digest paragraphs, and complainant insists that many more can be presented, but that it is unable to do so within the time limited, and the examples furnished are sufficient to show for the purposes of this motion.

"The master has examined with much labor and care all the opinions from which these headnotes have been taken and made comparison with headnotes of the same cases wherever they have since been made by official reporters.

"The identity between the paragraphs of most of the examples on first inspection is, indeed, remarkable. When taken in connection with the opinions, however, some are found to be simply direct quotations therefrom; some in which a portion are quotations from the opinion and the original work is entirely different, and some expressing in similar terms and phrases quite a different idea. Such cases where there is nothing else indicating piracy the master has first endeavored to eliminate.

"The cases in which errors have been copied, of which there are a number, are, as a rule, sufficient unto themselves as a proof of piracy.

"The cases in which clearly original language and construction are followed—not phrases and modes of expression common to every digester, but such original language or construction that it does not seem that two reporters separately digesting the same opinion could possibly use with such marked similarity—these there has been no hesitancy in reporting.

"In a number of cases it seems as though defendant's digester, after reading the headnotes of the reporter, had gone through the opinion to see if the wording of the headnote was to be found therein. If it were found there, even in disconnected phrases, he used it also, making use of the original labor of selection and ar.

*To demonstrate their ability to do this work at the rate stated, an offer was made of an actual test of work by defendant's editors in the presence of the master, and under such conditions as he thought proper to impose, but this was opposed by the complainant, and the master did not allow the demonstration.—[Ed.]

rangement. If the language were not there in hæc verba, he employed synonyms, and, if necessary, resorted to rearrangement and transposition.

"In many instances reported the paragraphs are practically verbatim copies, and it seems as though rearrangement has been resorted to to make the paragraphs comply with the different theories on which the two digests are based, complainant using the concrete method, endeavoring to express the actual point decided with reference to the actual facts, so as to distinguish a case from others, while defendant uses the abstract method, giving the principle of law decided and endeavoring to make it general.

"That this cause is an anomaly in copyright litigation is in some respects true, but the contention that subsequently the case of Myers v. Callaghan in no wise furnishes a precedent for its determination can hardly be sustained. In some respects the cases are analogous, and, in so far as they are, a precedent is certainly furnished. In both cases complainant's publications are used by defendant in editing or digesting; in both defendant's editors state their work to be independent; in both, in the majority of cases, there is the appearance of independent labor without regard to complainant's work, yet in both it is apparent that complainant's work has been used, and, in some instances, words and sentences copied without change; in others changed in form only. Judge Drummond, in his opinion (5 Fed. Rep. 726), afterwards concurred in by the Supreme Court, says: 'The conclusion is irresistible that, for a large portion of the work performed in behalf of the defendants, the editors did not resort to original sources of information, but obtained that information from the volumes of Mr. Freeman (the complainant). Undoubtedly it was competent for an editor to take the opinions of the Supreme Court, and possibly from the volumes of Mr. Freeman, and make an independent work; but it is always attended with great risk for a person to sit down, and with the copyright of a volume of law reports before him, undertake to make an independent report of a case. It is not difficult to do this, going to the original sources of information—to the decisions of the court, the briefs of counsel, the records on file in the clerk's office—without regard to the regular volumes of reports. Any one who has tried it can easily understand the difference between the headnotes of two persons, equally good lawyers, and equally critical in the examination of an opinion, where they are made up independent of each other; and, bearing in mind this fact, it seems to be beyond controversy that, although in many, and perhaps most, instances there is a very considerable difference between the headnotes of the defendant's volumes and those of the plaintiff, the latter have been used in the preparation of those of the former.'

"The simple question for the master is, Are these digest paragraphs presented the work of independent labor or not?

"There is little doubt but that in almost every instance defendant's digester read the opinion, and there is no testimony to the contrary, and it may be that defendant's digesters are more rapid workers than complainant's, or that one may construct more original digest paragraphs than syllabi in a given time; but that many of complainant's paragraphs have been more or less utilized by some of defendant's digesters cannot be gainsaid. Neither can it be said that both parties have gone to the same sources of information in the same sense that the expression is generally used.

"No fair-minded person can compare the headnotes in pamphlet No. 12, of Volume 29, Pacific Reporter (and there are other like cases),* with the digest paragraphs made by defendant's editor from the opinions in this number, and published in the General Digest, and doubt for a moment piracy, and particularly when the digester had before him headnotes already prepared, even when his testimony goes to show that no use has been made of the headnotes.

"It is claimed by defendant that its work is the result of independent labor, and that the resemblances are simply innocent coincidences. In some of the examples, perhaps, this is so; in others, certainly, it is not; and the master's report sets out in detail such cases that seem to be from themselves, in connection with the various opinions, clearly cases of piracy. In some cases where doubt has arisen as to the possibility of the work having been performed without reference to complainant's headnotes, this being a preliminary and not a final hearing, defendant has been given the benefit of the doubt.

"It is the duty of the master to report the facts and to identify such of the paragraphs presented to him as appear to have infringed the copyright. It does not seem to be within the province of the master to go further than this, though the briefs suggest it, and it seems that the report presented herewith fulfills all the requirements.

"May 22, 1898.

"W. S. Doolittle, Master."

Mr. Rowland Cox, for complainant:

Defendants entered our field and took our grain and ground it into flour.

As any separation of that which they own from that which they have stolen is impossible, their book from cover to cover, is piratical.

When the bill of complaint was filed defendant answered unreservedly, without the semblance of caution, that in no form or manner had it been guilty of piracy.

An examination of the master's report will satisfy the court that concerning the charge of piracy there is not the beginning of any room for difference of opinion.

"If," said Vice-Chancellor Wood, "the defendant had absolutely denied having received any assistance from the plaintiff's work, the court would have had a plain course, the animus furandi being made out."

Drone. Copyright, 403, and cases cited.

The defendant, in its purpose to save labor and expense by the use of our publications,

*Number 12 of volume 29 Pacific Reporter was one of a small number of books which contained most of the cases in which infringements were found, and which during a time of extra hurry were sent to be digested by persons at a distance, and who were not on the regular editorial staff of defendant.—[Ed.]

did not intend to copy a single original word therefrom. Probably it did not intend to recognize the conceptions of complainant's editors as found in their compositions. It may even be true that defendant's editors studiously endeavored to avoid the adoption of what they considered complainant's original matter. Their object, the theory of their scheme, contemplated the appropriation of neither words, nor ideas, which were original with complainant.

A digest is nothing more than an index, which is accurate or inaccurate to the extent that it hits or misses the operation of the judicial mind.

The ideas, propositions, and suggestions of every opinion are, being understood, necessarily the same to every mind. The court reaches a conclusion, and the conclusion is the same thing to all men. When it is embodied in a headnote, there is no original thought of any kind. The reporter simply formulates a statement or definition of the conclusion. The thought that is back of his headnote, the idea which he clothes in words, is always and under all conditions a matter of public right.

In this way a digest is neither more nor less than a road-book or directory; and as far as the defendant made use of the same ideas that we did, apart from its omission to seek and find for itself, it committed no wrong.

The defendants received each week ten of complainant's publications. [Reporters.]

These numbers the defendants received and used. They did not use them for the purpose of reproducing, in disguised form, the touch and finish, which constitute the personal equation of their contents. They used them merely to save time and labor, to save themselves the necessity of going to the original sources of information, and to reduce the outlay of time and thought which the task before them, if honestly executed, involved.

Their use was of the most comprehensive character.

They used, in brief, every copy-righted part of every copy-righted number [Reporter] as it came to them, and all these things they used for the purpose of producing a book [Digest] which would compete in the market and take the place of our book. [Digest.]

From the language of the opinions they took whatever they saw fit on the assumption that there was no possible impropriety in their doing so.

The general test of piracy is the same as in the case of compositions wholly original. The principle is well established that the later compiler can escape the penalty of piracy only by going to the common sources for materials and information, and producing a work by his own labor.

Drone, Copyright, 417.

All original materials from which maps are made are open to all. But no one has the right to avail himself of the enterprise, labor, and expense in the ascertainment of those materials, and the combining and arrangement of them, and the representing them on paper.

Farmer v. Calvert Lithographing, Engraving & Map Pub. Co. 1 Flipp. 223.

The defendant has been most completely mistaken in what he assumes to be his right to deal with the labor and property of others. In the case of a dictionary, map, guide-book, or directory, when there are certain common objects of information which must, if described correctly, be described in the same words, a subsequent compiler is bound to set about doing for himself that which the first compiler has done.

He is not entitled to take one word of the information previously published without independently working out the matter for himself so as to arrive at the same result from the same common source of information; and the only use he can legitimately make of a previous publication is to verify his own calculations and results when obtained.

"The defendant could not take a single line of the plaintiff's directory for the purpose of saving himself labor and trouble in getting his information."

The later compiler of a rival publication must go to the common sources for materials, and his composition must be the product of his own labor. If, to a material extent, he copies from the protected work, or appropriates the results there found, it is piracy.

Drone, Copyright, p. 894, and numerous cases cited.

In all cases, he must obtain the information at his own expense and by his own labor, independently of the copyrighted work which may be used only as a guide.

Drone, Copyright, p. 896; Banks v. McDavit, 18 Blatchf. 166.

Where there has been an intermingling of that which is lawful with that which is unlawful, in such a way that the two cannot be separated, the wrongdoer will be made to bear the consequences of his act and the whole book will be treated as a piracy.

Story, Bailm. ¶ 40; 2 Bl. Com. 205; Mawman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 385; Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 668, 32 L. ed. 562.

There can be no doubt that by using type of different sizes an examination of the opinion was greatly facilitated. The particular arrangement represented complainant's labor and outlay, and is protected by the law of copyright.

It is not material to inquire to what extent the defendant availed itself of the subject of the copyrights. That which was copyrighted to some extent assisted the defendant in every paragraph it made.

Myers v. Callaghan, 5 Fed. Rep. 733.

The things done by complainant in connection with its publications supplemented and added to and gave a new character to the original sources of information. The crude metal was molded into an efficient tool. The iron was shaped to form a hammer, and was provided with a handle. The defendant had the right to go to the public mine where the iron was found, and take at will; but it took our hammer—took it by the handle in its hand, and used it.

If we accept the statements of the defendant and its editors—that, using our publications, they were able to digest thirty or more cases a day—and the statements of complainant and its editors that working as they worked, from original sources, only five or six cases a day could be disposed of—there is no escape from the conclusion that the things which represented our labor and outlay, and which were covered by our copyrights, were used by the defendant.

The doctrine which is involved is not unlike that applied in Falk v. Howell, 37 Fed. Rep. 202; Schumacher v. Schwenke, 25 Fed. Rep. 466.

The defendant has been guilty of piracy, and it has used the copyrighted publications and by using them it has accomplished what was impossible by using the original sources. It has had the profit and advantage of our labor and outlay; but it challenges us to point out exactly and in detail just what it has stolen. It is in possession of the fruits of our labors. It got for nothing what cost us many thousands of dollars and years of industry and it got it by using our copyrighted publications.

Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 666, 32 L. ed. 562.

As soon as piracy is established the onus is shifted and the pirate is called upon to explain, and unless he solves the difficulty the presumption is that all he has done is the work of a pirate and to be condemned as such.

Drone, Copyright, p. 428.

The defendant employed its editors to work "by the case." It laid complainant's syllabi open before them. The presumption is that it knew the character of those it employed. In brief, it selected "a negligent agent" and furnished him with the tools which would make his negligence a sure source of injury to the complainant. And, when the "negligent agent" is convicted, it refuses to make any effort to segregate his piratical paragraphs; in effect insisting upon using them. Under such circumstances, its conduct admits of no justification, and all that it has done must be condemned.

Kelly v. Morris, L. R. 1 Eq. 702.

In view of common errors the presumption is against the book that contains them.

Drone, Copyright, p. 429.

When a considerable number of passages are proved to have been copied by the copying of the blunders in them, other passages which are the same with passages in the original book must be presumed prima facie to be likewise copied, though no blunders occur in them.

Mawman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 394.

The law by which the case is governed is expounded by the Supreme Court in Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 617, 32 L. ed. 550.

Mr. Peyton Boyle, Vice-President of complainant, also filed a brief, of which the following is an abstract:

Defendant's Digest was published in combination with a series of selected cases to be used as a substitute for complainant's "National Reporter System."

In nearly every instance a digest of a set of reports is intended to be used as a key to such reports. The digest in such case facilitates the use and stimulates the sale of the reports, and is a direct benefit to the owner of the reports. In this case defendant's digest is not intended to be used as a key to the reporters digested, but to be used as a substitute for those reporters. In order to effect this purpose, defendant's digest is published in combination with defendant's reports of selected cases, known as the Lawyers Reports Annotated, which digest and reports constitute in their entirety a single reporting scheme or system of current reports and digests.

The Lawyers' Reports Annotated report all the "generally valuable" cases in full, and the Digest gives abstracts ("safe for citation without full report") of all the cases reported by complainant. This system is as comprehensive in its scope as the "National Reporter System," though less full in detail.

The system of the defendant, as in the case of the complainant, is also published in the first instance in pamphlet parts, and in most instances in advance of the publication of the official reports.

It is clear from the reasoning in Sweet v. Benning, 16 C. B. 482, that a digest infringes the copyrights of the reports digested, when, as in this case, it is published in a form which renders it an effective substitute for such reports.

Mr. William F. Cogswell for the defendant.

Defendant having substituted new paragraphs for those condemned by the master immediately upon the filing of his report, counsel for defendant confined his argument to the public right to use published opinions, and to defendant's fair use of complainant's publications, in digesting, without attempting to controvert the master's finding of 308 infringing paragraphs.

Coxe, J., delivered the following opinion:

It must be regarded as settled law in the United States that an author has no exclusive property in a published work except under some act of congress, and then only when he complies with the provisions of the act. Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 593, 8 L. ed. 756; Banks v. Manchester, 23 Fed. Rep. 143, affirmed 128 U. S. 244, 252, 32 L. ed. 425, 429.

A reporter can have no copyright in the opinions delivered by the court or in the syllabi prepared by the judges. Wheaton v. Peters, and Banks v. Manchester, supra; Banks v. West Pub. Co. 27 Fed. Rep. 50; Nash v. Lathrop, 142 Mass. 29.

A reporter may acquire a valid copyright for the headnotes, footnotes, tables of cases, indexes, statements of facts and abstracts of the arguments of counsel, where these are prepared by him and are the result of his labor and research. So he may have a copyright for a digest or synopsis of judicial decisions and the selection and arrangement of cases relating to a particular branch of the law. The copyright protects only the original work of the reporter. Myers v. Callaghan, 5 Fed. Rep. 726, 10 Biss. 139, 20 Fed. Rep. 441, affirmed, Callaghan v. Myers, 128 U. S. 617, 32 L. ed. 550; Connecticut v. Gould, 34 Fed. Rep. 819; Gray v. Russell, 1 Story, C. C. 11; Davidson v. Wheelock, 27 Fed. Rep. 61; Drone, Copyright, 159, 160.

The compiler of a digest has no monopoly of the opinions, decisions, and syllabi prepared by the courts and judges, even though he has previously published them in copyrighted pamphlets. These opinions, decisions, and syllabi are free alike to all digesters. But when notes suitable for use in a digest have been prepared from these common sources of information and properly secured by copyrights a subsequent compiler in the same field is not permitted to avail himself of this original work and save time and labor for himself by copying from the property of others. He may use the copyrighted matter as a guide in the preparation of his own work to verify its accuracy, or detect errors, omissions or other faults, but in all other respects he must investigate for himself. He may take the original opinions and prepare from them his own notes, "but he cannot exclusively and evasively use those already collected and embodied by the skill and industry and expenditures of another." Banks v. McDivitt, 13 Blatchf. 163, and cases cited; Gray v. Russell, supra; Drone, Copyright, p. 394.

Where the pirated portions can be separated from the portions not subject to criticism the injunction should go, not against the entire work, but against the infringing portions. The doctrine of "confusion of goods" which has sometimes been invoked to suppress an entire publication is not applicable where the infringing portions cannot be pointed out and separately condemned. Banks v. McDivitt, supra; Lawrence v. Dana, 4 Cliff. 1, 84, 85; Mawman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 885; Greene v. Bishop, 1 Cliff. 186, 203; Little v. Gould, 2 Blatchf. 165, 186; Story v. Holcombe, 4 McLean, 806; List Pub. Co. v. Keller, 80 Fed. Rep. 772; Farmer v. Elstner, 83 Fed. Rep. 494; Drone, Copyright, pp. 527, 530.

Apply these principles to the case at bar.

The complainant has valid copyrights for the original work prepared by its editors and published in the various pamphlets composing its systems of reports.

The opinions of the judges and the syllabi prepared by them are not covered by the complainant's copyrights and these the defendant, considering the matter from a purely legal point of view, had a perfect right to use. The defendant had a right to copy the opinions, decisions, and syllabi prepared by the court from the complainant's publications, or from any other source, and use them precisely as other matter which is free to the public. The defendant could lawfully prepare notes, abstracts, and paragraphs from these free sources of information, collect them and publish them in a digest of its own. In doing this its editors had no right to avail themselves of the complainant's original work. They were forbidden not only from copying the work of the complainant's editors, but also from using that work in any way to give them suggestions or to lighten their labors. In short, they were not at liberty to appropriate directly or indirectly the matter which the complainant has protected by copyrights.

The master to whom the question of infringement was referred has, with great diligence, compared the suspected paragraphs pointed out by the complainant with the alleged corresponding paragraphs in the copyrighted works and has reported three hundred and three instances of piracy.

The court has examined the master's report sufficiently to be convinced that it is a conservative report and, without reviewing his work in detail, accepts it as establishing the fact that the above number of paragraphs infringe.

As the defendant's digest contains about thirty-eight thousand paragraphs the infringement thus established is considerably less than one per cent. At the trial for the first time complainant presented some seven hundred additional paragraphs which it asserted to be infringements. Assuming as to these that the same proportion of pirated paragraphs should be established as in those submitted to the master, still the infringing matter would amount to less than three per cent. In this connection it should be remembered that the complainant has had the defendant's book in its possession for two years. As the result of two years' examination, assuming that the court should find with the complainant upon every one of the paragraphs pointed out by it as infringing its copyrights the total pirated matter would amount to less than four per cent. It must, of course, be conceded that a large part of the defendant's book, having been compiled from other publications and from syllabi prepared by the courts, is not covered by the complainant's copyrights.

The situation then is this:

Matter proved to be piratical about five eighths of one per cent.

Other designated matter, alleged to be piratical, between one and two per cent.

Matter not affected by the complainant's copyrights about twenty-eight per cent.

Regarding the remaining portions of the work,—about seventy per cent,—no direct proof is offered.

The defendant contends that this seventy per cent must be presumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty. The complainant, on the contrary, insists that it must be presumed fraudulent from the proof already adduced.

The complainant argues that the defendant's editors had the copyrighted books before them when they prepared their digest paragraphs; that they are shown to have done five times more work than other editors engaged in like occupation; that they are proved to have pirated three hundred and three paragraphs and the presumption is that the entire book is so tainted with fraud that it should be suppressed.

The court is of the opinion that in a work like a digest which has the general characteristics of a directory, an index or a road-book, where each paragraph is separate and distinct from every other and can be removed without in any way destroying the effect of the remaining paragraphs, it would be establishing a most dangerous precedent to condemn the entire work when less than one per cent is proved to be piratical. This would be substituting conjecture for proof and in a case, too, where the proof is accessible.

Where infringement exists in copyright cases it is usually susceptible of proof. There are always some indications which disclose the presence of the pirate. The court does not understand that this is denied, but it is said that it will consume a decade to examine and compare all the remaining paragraphs and that the complainant should not be required to enter upon such task.

Bluntly stated the proposition is this: A party, upon whom the onus probandi rests, is entitled to a decree for the entire relief demanded if, instead of proving his case, he proves a part and convinces the court that it will be difficult to prove the rest.

Were this the case of an ordinary book like a history or a novel and the court were convinced that though disguised the plot and plan of the work had been appropriated and the characters reproduced, though under different names, there would be no hesitation in condemning the entire work.

Here, on the other hand, there is no connection whatever between the pirated paragraphs and the paragraphs which are the result of original and honest labor. The former can be removed and the complainant's rights protected and without depriving the defendant of the fruits of the work which is fairly its own. It is not a case where the doctrine of "confusion of goods" is applicable because the complainant's goods can be separated from the defendant's; it will take time, but it can be done.

If the complainant is given the sweeping decree asked for the defendant will be prevented from publishing even the twenty-eight per cent of matter to which the complainant does not pretend to lay claim. If the defendant should eliminate from its work every paragraph which the complainant has pointed out as infringing, the remaining thirty-six thousand paragraphs could not be sold by the defendant. Indeed, should the defendant issue a new edition with every paragraph eliminated which has been designated as open to the slightest suspicion of piracy it would still be under the ban of such a decree. The court cannot believe that such a decree would be just.

Though the defendant, through some of its editors, has been guilty of inequitable conduct in appropriating to its use the result of the complainant's labors the punishment it should receive should not be out of all proportion to the offense. To charge the defendant with thirty-eight thousand piracies because it is shown to be guilty of three hundred and three is pushing the law of presumptive evidence far in advance of any reported case.

Equity seems to demand that the defendant be permitted to use what is honestly its own and restrained from using what it has taken from the complainant. By such a decree the rights of all will be preserved.

The learned counsel for the complainant argue the cause as if the defendant was, in effect, reproducing the copyrighted pamphlets of the complainant and was endeavoring to supersede and supplant these publications. It is thought that such is not the case. The defendant does not publish reports, except of selected cases, and the bill does not charge that these infringe the complainant's copyrights. The book with which the defendant's digest actually competes is the complainant's digest which is issued after the defendant's.

The defendant's digest in no way supplants the copyrighted reports. Indeed, by advertising them extensively, it would seem that it must assist in extending their sale.

It appears to the court that this is an important distinction which should not be lost sight of. It is not a case where, as in Callaghan and Myers, the defendant's books were published in order that they might be substituted for the complainant's books; where the paging, order of cases, statements of facts, etc., were intended to be similar. In short it is not a case where in every volume there are unmistakable indicia that the defendant worked from the copyrighted portions of the complainant's volume and intended to produce an almost identical book. In a case like Callaghan and Myers the fact that the infringer worked from the copyrighted books is, of course, a most important factor, but in the case of an index or a digest the compiler is not guilty of bad faith in using the book that he is digesting. He must use this book. Not only should a digest tell, in brief, what has been decided, but it should also inform the reader where the decision is to be found in full. This of necessity requires an examination of the reports. To prepare a digest without such an examination would be an impossibility. A digest prepared only from the manuscripts of the judges would be a ludicrous excrescence which would not be harbored in any library. It would be about as valuable as a city directory which contains the names of the citizens, but omits to mention where they reside.

As the complainant, by reason of its large facilities, is able, as a rule, to place the decisions of the courts before the profession in advance of other publishers, it is obvious that any one who makes a true and useful digest of "the year's gist" must examine the complainant's publications. If the complainant's contention is correct that a digester may not take a "copyrighted book in his hands" the making of digests is at an end.

The court is unable to perceive how mala fides can be imputed to the defendant because, in making an annual digest, it uses the reports which have been published during the year.

Without pursuing the subject further it is thought that the complainant must be contented when it has maintained and vindicated its privileges under the law of copyright; that the defendant should be punished to the extent that it has been guilty of an infraction of that law and held accountable for every infringement which can be fairly laid at its door. Beyond this the court cannot go; it cannot consider matters not embraced in the issues joined by the pleadings or enter upon a course of speculation and presume wholesale piracy from the proof now before the court or from the alleged unfair business methods of the defendant in its relations with the complainant.

The court can discover nothing in the case of Callaghan v. Myers, which is at variance with these views.

As the complainant at the argument waived further accounting, it follows that the complainant is entitled to a decree making the temporary injunction permanent, with costs.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina
v.

Raphael BEHRMAN.

(.....N. C.....)

1. All who claim to know the provisions of the unwritten laws of a foreign country are competent to explain them, un-

[NOTE.—Oral proof of foreign laws.

b. Of foreign countries.

VI. Proof of practices under statutes.
VII. State statutes.
VIII. The English doctrine.

The decision in the principal case, so far as it relates to proof of foreign laws, is based upon the construction placed by the court upon the provisions in the North Carolina code, and is quite comprehensive.

In the opinion in chief the court states that "any person" otherwise competent may testify as to such laws "after having stated that he has had opportunity to learn what they are," but holds that the statute relieves it from all doubt and difficulty by allowing "all who claim to know the provisions of foreign laws the privilege of explaining them to courts and juries."

The dissenting opinion of the chief justice would seem to be in keeping with the majority of the decisions of other courts and also with that of the same court in Moore v. Gwynn, 37 N. C. 187, referred to in such opinion.

In most of the states in the Union the statutes and codes contain very similar provisions, but it does not appear from the decisions that they have received such a liberal construction.

The courts have mostly held that such laws, if unwritten, must be proved as facts by parol evidence of competent persons instructed in the law; by witnesses skilled in the law; by those conversant with the law; by persons acquainted with such law; by experts; by attorneys practicing in the courts of such foreign state; by one appearing to be well informed therein whether a lawyer or not.

There are, however, decisions of other courts which seem to be more liberal, it having been held that the evidence of a witness informed in such law whether a lawyer or not was competent to prove such law; that an intelligent person or one familiar with such laws might give evidence thereof. So a person who has placed himself in a position to make himself acquainted with such law has been held competent.

The English decisions show that in that tribunal the evidence must be that of properly qualified witnesses whose knowledge and experience have been gained by study and practice; of witnesses of competent skill; of witnesses learned in the law; by anyone who though not a lawyer or a person who by reason of his having filled any public office may be presumed to be acquainted with the law, is or has been in a position where the probability is that he has become acquainted therewith.

It has also been taken from the opinions of learned professors, and eminent writers.

In the absence of proof to the contrary, the common law of one state will be taken to be the same as that of a sister state and such is the legal presumption. *Seaborn v. And this presumption must prevail unless a different rule is shown to exist, either by some modification of that law peculiar to that state, or in consequence of some statute. Inge v. Murphy, 10 Ala. 385; Du Val v. Marshall, 30 Ark. 230.

Yet such presumption does not exist in the case of the Indian nations, whose usages and customs establishing their own laws must be proved. Du Val v. Marshall, supra.

The states, although united under a federal head, are as to their local laws as distinct from each other as any foreign nations can be, and no legal presumption can exist that the judges or citizens of one state can have any knowledge of the laws of another; they must be placed upon the same legal grounds with foreign laws, and then the rule applies that the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of must be produced. State v. Twitty, 9 N. C. 441, 11 Am. Dec. 779.

As to the manner of authenticating the law, there is no general rule except this, that no proof shall be received which presupposes better testimony behind and attainable by the party. Ennis v. Smith, 45 U. S. 14 How. 400, 14 L. ed. 472; Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 153, 36 Am. Dec. 153.

The general principle is that the best testimony or proof shall be required that the nature of the thing admits of. Phillips v. Gregg, supra; Molina v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 209; Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 Serg. & R. 84, 16 Am. Dec. 520; Isabella v. Peoot, 3 La. Ann. 337.

It applies to foreign laws as it does to all other facts. Churoh v. Hubbard, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 249; Hall v. Costello, 48 N. H. 176, 2 Am. Rep. 207.

With respect to the laws of other countries, the rigid rule should be followed. The Pawashick, 3 Low. Dec. 142.

There is no difference between the laws of a foreign country and the laws of the different states of the Union in this respect. Brackett v. Norton, 4 Conn. 517, 10 Am. Dec. 179; Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 153, 36 Am. Dec. 153.

No reason exists for holding that the laws of other states shall be ascertained in a different manner, when deciding on the effect of a record, from that in which they are ascertained in other cases. Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 223.

Whatever the court may take notice of, or learn calls himself her husband, is competent as an acknowledgment by him of their relations.

4. A paper purporting to be the original certificate of marriage by a rabbi in a foreign country, verified by the signature and seal of the official minister, is admissible as res gestæ to prove the marriage, in a criminal prosecution, where one of the parties testifies that it was given to her at the time of the marriage.

5. The constitutional right of an accused to confront the witness against him does not exclude, in a criminal prosecution, the use of a certificate of marriage made at the very time of the marriage by the rabbi who performed the marriage ceremony.

Where the averments did not indicate whether the law was statutory or established by the precedents of the Illinois courts, it was held that the law of another state, when depended upon in a court of a sister state, was nothing but a fact, and must be pleaded as any other fact, with sufficient distinctness so that the court upon a statement of facts might judge what the effect of the law was. *Roots v. The mode of proof of the written law is to be by the production of a duly authenticated copy. Owen v. Boyle, 15 Me. 147, 32 Am. Dec. 143.

It was so held in Brimhall v. Van Campen, 8 Minn. 13, 32 Am. Dec. 113. The note upon which the action was founded was made in New York, and on a Sunday, and there was no finding as to what the New York laws upon the subject were.

And the evidence is addressed to the court and not to the jury. Pickard v. Bailey, 26 N. H. 152; Hooper v. Moore, 50 N. C. 130; Hall v. Costello, 48 N. H. 179, 2 Am. Rep. 207.

The courts of a country are presumed to be acquainted only with their own law. Monroe v. Douglass, 5 N. Y. 447.

What is the law of another state, or of a foreign country, is as much a question of law as what is the law of our own state, but the court is presumed to know judicially the public laws of its own state, while in respect to private laws and the laws of other states and foreign countries, this knowledge is not presumed but must be proved as facts, otherwise the court cannot know or take notice of them. Hooper v. Moore, supra.

So with respect to a private law. Biddis v. James, 6 Binn. 321, 6 Am. Dec. 458.

But it is a fact not necessarily to be found by a jury. Book v. Lauman, 24 Pa. 435.

Like other facts they must be proved to exist before they can be received in a court of justice. Church v. Hubbard, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 187, 2 L. ed. 249.

It has been held that whatever the court may take notice of, or may learn from reported decisions, it may also be informed of by the testimony of witnesses learned in the foreign law. Hoes v. Van Alstyne, 20 Ill. 202.

A witness called to prove the laws of a foreign country should be first asked whether the law, as to which he is about to testify, is a written or an unwritten law. Isabella v. Peoot, 2 La. Ann. 537.

The sanction of an oath is required for their establishment, unless they can be verified by some other such high authority that the law respects it not less than the oath of an individual. Church v. Hubbard, supra.

Whether written or unwritten the law must be verified by an oath. If written it must also be verified by an exemplification of a copy under the great seal of the state, or by a copy proved to be a true copy by a witness who has examined and compared it with the original, or by a certificate of an officer lawfully authorized by law to give the copy, which certificate must be duly proved, or by statutes received by the government from foreign governments under authority of law authorizing reciprocal interchange of statutes. Molina v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 209.

Such methods of authentication may, however, be relaxed or changed as necessity, either physical or moral, may require where there is reason to believe they are attainable, and where a rigid adherence to them would probably produce extreme inconvenience or manifest injustice. Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 158, 36 Am. Dec. 158.

To require, respecting laws or other transactions in foreign countries, that species of testimony which their institutions and usages do not admit of would be unjust and unreasonable, and will never be required by the court, it being testimony which is not attainable. Church v. Hubbard, supra.

Such modes of proof are not, however, to be considered exclusive of others, especially of codes of laws, and accepted histories of the law of the country. Ennis v. Smith, 55 U. S. 14 How. 400, 14 L. ed. 472.

The best proof of the proceedings of a foreign court are the original records. Spaulding v. Vincent, 24 Vt. 501.

Foreign laws, promulgated by our government, have been allowed to be read without further proof. Owen v. Boyle, 15 Me. 147, 32 Am. Dec. 143; Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 23, 2 L. ed. 37.

They can only be known so far as they are proved.

The qualification of the experts, or other questions of competency, or evidence, must be passed upon by the court. Kline v. Baker, supra.

The peculiar circumstances of each case must, however, enter into the consideration of the question of the competency of the evidence. Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watta, 158, 86 Am. Dec. 158.

II. The unwritten or common law.—Lex non scripta.

When the question arises, What is a foreign law? if an unwritten law, it must be proved by the testimony of disinterested and intelligent witnesses. Woodbridge v. Austin, 2 Tyler, 364, 4 Am. Dec. 740.

No other testimony than that of witnesses is attainable. Isabella v. Pecot, 2 La. Ann. 387.

The general laws of a foreign state or country may be proved by parol, where it does not appear that such law exists as statute or written law, and of which law an authenticated copy of the record might be produced. 'Re Roberts' Will, 8 Paige, 446, 4 L. ed. 497; Lincoln v. Battelle, 6 Wend. 475; Dyer v. Smith, 12 Conn. 384; Merritt v. Merritt, 20 Ill. 65; McDeed v. McDeed, 67 Ill. 545; Emery v. Berry, 28 N. H. 473, 61 Am. Dec. 622; Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 Serg. & R. 84, 16 Am. Dec. 520; Martin v. Payne, 11 Tex. 222; Consequa v. Williams, Pet. C. C. 225; Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watta, 158, 86 Am. Dec. 158; Tyler v. Trabue, 8 B. Mon. 306; Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 38, 2 L. ed. 27; Inge v. Murphy, 10 Ala. 885; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Smith, 74 Ill. 197.

Even though the law is only a usage that has acquired the force of law, it must be proved as such. Bryant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 434.

In admiralty as in other courts. The Pawashick, 2 Low. Dec. 142; Talbot v. Seeman, supra; The Prince George, 4 Moore, P. C. C. 21; The Peerless, 1 Lush. Adm. 106, 13 Moore, P. C. C. 484, 30 L. J. Adm. 30; Le Louis, 2 Dod. Adm. 201.

They must ordinarily be proved by parol evidence of competent witnesses, instructed in the law under oath. Phillips v. Gregg, Tyler v. Trabue, Talbot v. Seeman, Inge v. Murphy, Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Smith, and McDeed v. McDeed, supra.

By eminent jurists, and other legal characters, who have opportunities to become experienced therein. Wilson v. Smith, 5 Yerg. 399.

By some intelligent person of the country whose law is to be proved. Chanoine v. Fowler, 3 Wend. 173; Kenny v. Clarkson, 1 Johns. 385, 3 Am. Dec. 326.

By the testimony of witnesses skilled therein. McNeill v. Arnold, 17 Ark. 154, 167; Barkman v. Hopkins, 11 Ark. 157; Biesenthal v. Williams, 1 Duv. 323, 35 Am. Dec. 623.

By the testimony of witnesses conversant with such laws. Territt v. Woodruff, 19 Vt. 184; Mowry v. Chase, 100 Mass. 79; Greasons v. Davis, 9 Iowa, 219; Molina v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 269.

By witnesses acquainted with the law. Zimmerman v. Helser, 38 Md. 274; Robinson v. Clifford, 3 Wash. C. C. 1; Gardner v. Lewis, 7 Gill, 379; Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 Serg. & R. 84, 16 Am. Dec. 520.

If unwritten by the testimony of experts. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 28 Md. 287, 92 Am. Dec. 688; De Sobry v. De Laistre, 2 Harr. & J. 191, 3 Am. Dec. 536; Gardner v. Lewis, supra; Condit v. Blackwell, 19 N. J. Eq. 193; Frith v. Sprague, 14 Mass. 455; Molina v. United States, supra; Ennis v. Smith, 55 U. S. 14 How. 400, 14 L. ed. 472.

By an attorney duly admitted to practice in all the courts of such state. Brenner v. Luth, 23 Kan. 581.

By any one appearing to be well informed therein whether a lawyer or not. Hall v. Costello, 23 N. H. 178, 2 Am. Rep. 207.

By those acquainted with the law, but this rule may be varied by statute. Pierce v. Indseth, 106 U. S. 546, 27 L. ed. 254.

Parties conversant with the unwritten law of a foreign state are considered as experts. Greasons v. Davis, supra.

All persons who practice a business or profession which requires them to possess a certain knowledge of the matter in hand are experts so far as expertness is required. Bird v. Com, 21 Gratt. 800.

A foreign law may be proved by any person familiar with it, whether a lawyer or one who has acted under it as a justice of the peace, or other officer, or a mere layman. Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177, 66 Am. Dec. 234.

A lawyer residing in another state and of mature age is prima facie competent as an expert to prove the law of that state without further evidence of qualification. Ibid.

It may be proved by any person who, though not a lawyer, or not having filed any public office, is, or has been, in a position to render it probable that he would make himself acquainted with it. American L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Rosenagle, 77 Pa. 507.

Whether a professed lawyer or not, who appears to the court to be well informed on the point. Hall v. Costello, supra.

They may be proved by parol evidence of such a nature as the institutions and usages of the foreign country admit of. Isabella v. Pecot, 2 La. Ann. 387.

And when so proved, such laws are for the construction of the court. Consequa v. Williams, Pet. C. C. 225.

They may be proved as well by public history, and decided cases as by witnesses. Inge v. Murphy, 10 Ala. 885; Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 Serg. & R. 84, 16 Am. Dec. 520.

Books of reports of a sister state are conceded to be proper evidence. Ibid; Raynham v. Canton, 3 Pick. 233; McRae v. Mattoon, 13 Pick. 63.

Common law may be considered as custom which may be proved by parol which cannot be otherwise proved in the absence of reports. Raynham v. Canton, supra.

In Ames v. McCamber, 124 Mass. 90, it was held that the books of reports of cases adjudged in the courts of any of the states of the United States were competent evidence of the unwritten or comto the court and it was stamped by the court. She produced also a paper, of which the following is a translation:

"On the third day of the tenth month, according to the Hebrew calendar, in the year 5640, at that time the son, Raphael, of the father by the name of Aaron, said to Sarah Dinah, the daughter from Noah, that she will be his wife according to the laws of Moses.

He says he will support her and take care of her from that day until they are separated by death. It is mutually agreed by them to be man and wife, and he will clothe her and take care of her, as becomes necessary from husband to wife. He further agreed that she shall share with him all his wealth, and, if any should come and try to take any of it from him, she shall have the preference of it. This mon law of that state, under section 84 of chapter 181 of the General Statutes of Massachusetts. Pembocot & K. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 12 Gray, 244, 71 Am. Dec. 753, to the same effect.

As a general rule, the decisions of courts of justice are the evidence of what is common law. McDeed v. McDeed, 87 Ill. 545.

The text-writers furnish us with their statements of the law, and that would certainly be good evidence upon the same principle which renders histories admissible. Pitcon's Case, 30 How. St. Tr. 492.

The unwritten law of England may be proved here, not by experts only, but also by text-writers of authority, and by the printed reports of adjudicated cases, and be construed with the aid of text-books as well as experts. The Pawashick, 2 Low. Dec. 142.

But it has been held that reports of adjudged cases are not evidence of what is the law of the state or country in which they are pronounced. Gardner v. Lewis, 7 Gill, 379.

Unwritten laws in the practice of the courts of other states are provable by parol evidence. McRae v. Mattoon, 18 Pick. 58.

A custom or usage, before it has ripened into a law, so to be judicially noticed by the courts, may be proved by parol as a fact. Innerarity v. Heirs of Mims, 1 Ala. 600.

It cannot be proved in any other mode. Ibid.; Merritt v. Merritt, 20 Ill. 65.

The certificate of a consul of the United States under his seal was held not sufficient evidence of a foreign law. Church v. Hubbard, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 187, 2 L. ed. 249.

And as it is competent to prove it by evidence of those who are conversant with it, it is equally competent to prove in the same manner the practice and usage under the written or statute law. Greason v. Davis, 9 Iowa, 219.

In Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 274, 3 L. ed. 222, it was held that if foreign laws and regulations respecting trade be not proved to have been in writing as public edicts, they must be proved by parol.

If the rate of interest upon a note depends upon usage having the force of law it may be proved by parol, if shown to depend upon usage. Tryon v. Rankin, 9 Tex. 595.

There is no difference whether it is a law regulating trade, or a law on any other subject, the rule from its nature is universal. Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 Serg. & R. 84, 16 Am. Dec. 520.

One witness shown to be skillfully conversant by long practice of the foreign law, who adds the sanction of an oath, answers the demands of the law and the evidence is sufficient to prove such foreign law. Molina v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 209.

The common law, as modified by the decisions of the state courts, may be proved by the production of the accredited reports of the decisions. Ingo v. Murphy, 10 Ala. 885.

But this is not the only means for obtaining the requisite information, and the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts of England sometimes act on the certificate of officers accredited by government where laws are certified. Ibid.

A priest or minister is a competent witness to prove the law of another state or country upon the subject of marriage. Bird v. Com. 21 Gratt. 800.

The laws of a foreign state assigned for the direction of its own affairs cannot be noticed in the courts of other states, unless proved as facts. Allen v. Watson, 2 Hill, L. 319.

The laws of a sister state are provable like other foreign laws, and cannot be taken notice of in the absence of proof. Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 223, 76 Am. Dec. 269.

A gentleman practicing before the privy council is not an expert to give evidence concerning the law of those countries, for which the privy council is the ultimate court of appeal. Cartwright v. Cartwright, 25 Week. Rep. 684.

Where parol evidence of the laws of the state of Mississippi, in relation to the mode of transferring slaves, was refused by the court without proof that it was not governed by statute, the court held that parol evidence must be admitted of the lex non scripta but not of the lex scripta, and that to require evidence of the absolute silence of the lex scripta was error, the proper course being to permit the evidence to be given and to stop when parol evidence of the contents of a statute is adduced. Newsom v. Adams, 2 La. 153, 22 Am. Dec. 126.

The common law of a foreign country may be proved by respectable and intelligent witnesses, but foreign statutes cannot be so proved. Kenny v. Clarkson, 1 Johns. 385, 3 Am. Dec. 336, in which case it was sought to prove the effect of English Statute, 25 Geo. III., chapter 60, as to the effect of the non-insertion of a certificate of registry of a bill of sale.

In Barkman v. Hopkins, 11 Ark. 157, the plaintiff offered the depositions of one skilled in the laws and familiar with the practice of the state of Louisiana, and also the laws of the state of Louisiana purporting to be published under the authority of the state. It was held, the depositions being regularly taken, that the evidence was competent legal evidence for the purpose of proving the laws and practice of that state.

Where in an action to establish a will, a witness, an attorney and counsellor at law, offered to prove the practice and usage regarding the execution of wills with respect to the witnesses signing in the presence of each other, for the purpose of showing what the law was, the court rejected the testimony, the evidence being offered upon a question of law and not upon a question of fact for the jury. Gaylor's App. 48 Conn. 82.

The common law, for the most part made up of customs, may be proved by parol, so held where an attorney was called to prove by parol the law of New York in regard to the delivery of a promissory note. Merritt v. Merritt, 20 Ill. 65.

Where, in an action on an Ohio note, it was urged that by common law in that state it was usurious, and that effect should be given to the laws of that state in determining the validity of the instrument, the court held, no law of Ohio having been proved on the trial as it should have been in order to justify the court in acting under it, under 2 Revised Statutes, such law must be proved by putting in evidence the books of reports of decisions of the agreement holds from this day as long as they shall live.

(Signed) Raphael and Dinah Behrman."

This paper was signed by the rabbi and given to witness at the time of the marriage.

"To remembrance from your dear husband,

Raphael Behrman, who resides in the city of Norfolk, Virginia, at No. 48 Bank Street.

(Signed) Raphael Behrman."

"Give the enclosed picture to our dear child, so that he will know his unbeknown father.

(Signed) Raphael Behrman."

She testified "This is a picture of my husband; he sent it to me from Norfolk, Va., to supreme court of that state. Billingsley v. Dean, 11 Ind. 331.

Evidence showing marriage law to be the same as the law in that state was held good in the absence of proof to the contrary. State v. Nadal, 69 Iowa, 478.

It is competent to prove the law of a foreign state by an attorney of that state, duly admitted to practice in all its courts. So held in a case wherein it was sought to prove the rate of interest obtainable in California, but the evidence did not show whether the rate established was imposed by statute, or had grown up as a custom and usage of the state, the court holding such evidence prima facie, competent and sufficient. Brenner v. Luth, 28 Kan. 561.

Where the law attempted to be proved was not a statutory or written law of the state of Pennsylvania, but the unwritten law as established and expounded by judicial decisions of the supreme court of that state, it was held it could be proved by the testimony of witnesses instructed in the laws of that state. Tyler v. Trabue, 8 B. Mon. 306.

Where a member of the bar was called to prove the plaintiff's right to recover under the particular case in the courts of his own state, it was held his evidence was properly received to prove, by the common law as it existed in such state, that the plaintiff was entitled to his action. Layton v. Chalon, 4 La. Ann. 318.

Where in replevin, the plaintiff read in evidence a deed, proving it by the testimony of the subscribing witnesses made before the lord mayor of London and certified under his official signature and seal of office, the court held that as such authentication would be sufficient to authorize the deed to be read as evidence of title by the laws of that province, if properly proven, the property being such in that province, and the deed sufficient to pass the title there, it should be so regarded here. Owen v. Boyle, 15 Me. 147, 22 Am. Dec. 143.

An exception exists in the courts of the United States, by receiving the printed volume of the laws of the states of the Union as prima facie evidence. Ibid.

In Armstrong v. Risteau, 5 Md. 271, 59 Am. Dec. 115, the common opinion of eminent jurists, whose learning and experience were often employed in ejectment cases under the provisional and state governments, was allowed as evidence of what the law was then considered to be, on a point upon which there were no cases to the contrary.

Where witnesses learned in the law stated as their opinion that the clauses and provisions of a deed of trust, according to the laws of Kentucky, were legal and sufficient to convey to the grantee the property set forth therein, and that no statute of that state was known to such witnesses affecting their opinion or bearing upon the point, the reputation and professional standing of the witnesses entitling them to credit, it was held they were wholly unimpeachable and entitled to credit. Wilson v. Carson, 12 Md. 84.

In Consolidated Real Estate & Fire Ins. Co. v. Cashow, 41 Md. 59, the evidence of a witness at the sale in question, made after due public notice and advertisement as required by the laws of the state of New York, he being an expert learned in the law, was held admissible, the court stating that the fact that the witness practiced in that state and was a lawyer by profession authorized in the absence of opposing proofs the inference that he practiced his profession in the state or city of his residence, which made him competent to testify in respect to the matter about which he was examined.

A witness not a lawyer but a magistrate of several years having, from his mercantile employments, become acquainted with the law in relation to notarial instruments, was admitted as a witness as to the laws of Canada upon the point. Pickard v. Bailey, 26 N. H. 132.

Where it was sought to prove the validity of a Canadian marriage law, by the evidence of an English barrister practicing in Canada, the evidence was refused upon the grounds above stated. Cartwright v. Cartwright, 26 Week. Rep. 684.

Where it was sought to establish the due execution of a will, the court held that the laws, which were incorporated and formed the general laws of Cuba, and the other Spanish colonies, were not to be considered in the nature of statute laws, and admitted the testimony of the witnesses as to the due execution of the will, according to the law of the testator's domicile. Re Roberts' Will, 8 Paige, 448, 4 L. ed. 497.

In Brush v. Wilkins, 4 Johns. Ch. 506, 1 L. ed. 918, a will being executed with the solemnities required to pass real estate, which descended to the heir-at-law subject to the dower of the wife, the laws of Denzara on the point being proved as a matter of fact by a person acquainted with the laws of that place, who had long resided there and sustained a judicial office, it was held the evidence produced was competent and sufficient in the absence of all other proof.

Where the question in issue was the manner of the colonial laws of Spain, as to the mode of celebrating marriages, it was held that the testimony of witnesses, who were not read in the law prior to the year 1791, as to the custom of the marriage of Protestant settlers in the Spanish colony of Mississippi by a justice of the peace, was receivable in evidence to establish a marriage, no better evidence to the contrary being produced, the witness showing that such marriages were held valid by the political power of the state. Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 158, 36 Am. Dec. 158.

In Jones v. Maffet, 5 Serg. & R. 523, it was held that the unwritten laws of a foreign country might be proved by professional men or others conversant with and having the means of knowledge.

In the above case the evidence given was that of an Irish barrister conversant with the laws of the country, to the effect that he received printed acts from the king's printer in Ireland, who delivered them to him as authenticated copies of the several acts of parliament, printed by him and his predecessor in office, by virtue of the king's patent, and that such copies would be received in all courts in Ireland as authentic documents, and that the printed statute book or copies of the particular acts printed by the king's printer, were receivable in evidence without any proof of their having been compared with the original rolls, such evidence was admissible.

In an action by a wife against her husband's executor to recover money loaned to the husband

London, and the writing on the back is his." She came to Norfolk from London on a ticket sent her by defendant. Witness stated that she was familiar with the marriage law in Russia, and that she was married according to that law.

Zander and Album were sworn as court interpreters, and testified that the marriage certificate was written in German and the marriage contract in Chaldean.

Album testified that he was familiar with the law of marriage among the Jews in Russia, and that in Riga it is left with the rabbi, who gives the certificate, which is then carried to the court and the Russian stamp put on it. That defendant had admitted to witness that while the parties resided in New Orleans, after which the husband went to Philadelphia where he resided until his death, plaintiff produced in evidence a written document, and proved the advance by the deposition of two witnesses, the defendant pleading inter alia, coverture of the wife, which she met by offering to prove by a witness and advocate of Louisiana, conversant in the laws enacted under the territorial state government, the validity of such contract with reference to property held by her paraphernalia right and the law in respect thereto; such evidence being objected to as proving the laws of a foreign country by parol, the court held that the unwritten laws must be proved by the testimony of persons acquainted with them, by public history, or by cases decided, but that an edict registered must be proved by a copy under the national seal, or by a sworn copy collated by a witness, and in this as well as in any other case of trial of fact, the best evidence which the nature of the case will admit of must be produced. Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 Serg. & R. 84, 16 Am. Dec. 580.

In the above case the court held the evidence properly admitted. Ibid.

So where the witness swore that he was the custodian of records which had existed for centuries, which had been kept by him in accordance with the laws in force at the time the entries were made therein, extracts from such records giving a family genealogy, sworn to by him, the same was held admissible in evidence. American L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Rosenagle, 77 Pa. 507.

A Spanish lawyer who had practiced law in Cuba was allowed to testify from a printed copy of the Spanish code of commerce, as to the laws regulating special partnerships in Cuba. Barrows v. Downs, 9 R. I. 446, 11 Am. Rep. 283.

Where the witnesses stated they knew a document was a perfect title to the land claimed, the practice which had long existed in the Texas courts of receiving the evidence of intelligent Mexicans, not lawyers, in reference to the laws of Spain and Mexico, in a litigation pertaining to lands, was held only admissible, in so far as it tended to information as to previous or contemporary construction of the laws of Spain and Mexico, by the officers executing them, but was no evidence as to what constituted a title to such land. State v. Cuellar, 47 Tex. 235.

Where it was objected on demurrer that the pleas in bar were defective in not setting forth the different acts of the provincial parliament under which the defendant obtained his discharge in bankruptcy, it was held that such laws were foreign and must be stated and proved as facts and set forth in the plea. Peck v. Hibbard, 28 Vt. 608, 68 Am. Dec. 605.

Where a witness testified to a marriage in a foreign state, solemnized in the manner usual and customary in such state, by a person duly authorized to celebrate the rights of marriage, and that the parties afterwards lived together as man and wife it was held satisfactory evidence of the validity of the marriage, and that it was not necessary to prove the laws of such state or to offer further evidence of a compliance with their provisions. Bird v. Oom, 21 Gratt. 800.

In Wilcocks v. Phillips, 1 Wall. Jr. 47, where a Chinaman, who, as a witness, did not state positively what the law upon a subject was, the court stated that it would have been inclined to admit such evidence, although he was not a member of the legal profession, owing to the practical necessities of mankind, and the nature and isolated and peculiar condition of the Chinese nation, nearly all that was known of the government, laws, and institutions of the country being derived from the relations of merchants, missionaries, and other persons who had been there, and that it would be too much, in the then present condition of the country, to require a party to produce certified copies of its statutes; and further that of facts, such as those, the court would take judicial notice.

In the above case the witness's statement was rejected, not being direct, responsive, and full, the court stating that if it had been it would have been received in evidence, as an exception to the rule of law, whose obligation in most cases is admitted. Wilcocks v. Phillips, supra.

Where the law in question was unwritten, being that of a custom of immemorial usage in Spain, of necessity and by authority, provable by parol evidence, the witness testifying showing himself instructed in the laws, customs, and usages of Spain, and by actual experience and practice of his profession for many years in Cuba under the Spanish law, the court held that the right of citizens of the government to sue for claims against the government was sufficiently proved by such witness. Molina v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 269.

And where a witness was introduced to prove a foreign law, who was not a practicing lawyer and member of the French bar, but whose examination showed that he had studied law as a professor in France, graduated at the University of Paris, and had since studied law as his profession from 1849 to 1856, and had engaged in legal pursuits and has been employed at Washington by the French government, to study, examine, and give information in reference to claims delivered over to him by the French legation, he was admitted as a witness and allowed to testify. Dauphin v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 221.

But a certificate of the proceedings of the court under the seal of a person who states that he was the secretary of foreign affairs, was held not evidence of foreign laws. Church v. Hubbard, 6 U. S. 3 Cranch, 187, 2 L. ed. 249.

The decrees of the Portuguese colonies, transmitted to the seat of government and there registered in the department of state, and a certificate of the fact under the great seal with a copy of the decree authenticated, was held sufficient prima facie evidence of such laws. Ibid.

The testimony of a lawyer of Norway, as to the law of that country, was held admissible under the statutes of Minnesota, which provide that the existence, and the tenor or effect of all foreign laws may be proved as facts by parol evidence, but if it appears that the law in question is contained in a written statute or code, the court may in its discretion, reject any evidence of such law that is not accompanied by a copy thereof. Pierce v. Indesth, 106 U. S. 546, 27 L. ed. 254.

III. The unwritten law—Lex scripta.

a. Of sister states.

The relation of the states to each other, as to he was married to Sarah Behrman and also to another woman.

Defendant stated that he was reared by wealthy parents in Russia near to Riga. When sixteen or seventeen years old met the woman claiming to be his wife in a house of ill-fame and maintained illicit relations with her for some time, then left her and went to Hamburg, because he had reason to believe she had robbed him. She followed him to Hamburg and he had her sent back; he then went to London, to Canada, to Norfolk, and married his wife in Washington. He had never married any other woman; had never seen the alleged license; the writing on the back of the photograph was not his; did not send for her to come over from London; had lived in Atlanta, Philadelphia, Suffolk, Rocky Mount, and matters not surrounded by the general government, is that of "foreign states in close friendship" and whatever relaxation such close friendship ought to induce or may have induced in the strict rules of proof, yet upon strict principles of evidence, the laws and public documents of one state, can be proved in the courts of another only as other foreign laws. Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 323, 78 Am. Dec. 229.

In Hempstead v. Reed, 6 Conn. 490, the written laws of the different states were held foreign, provable as facts, and not receivable as judicial notice. To the same effect, Dyer v. Smith, 12 Conn. 324.

In Tyler v. Kent, 53 Ind. 533, the court held that a person claiming to recover under the laws of another state must aver his rights under such laws, and set forth such laws so as to enable the court to determine whether such person is entitled to the relief demanded.

When the question arises, What is a foreign law? if a written law it must be produced. Woodbridge v. Austin, 3 Tyler, 364, 4 Am. Dec. 740; McNeill v. Arnold, 17 Ark. 154, 187; Byrant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 434.

The general rule is well settled, that parol evidence of the contents of a written document cannot be given, except where such original is lost or destroyed, and the fact that the paper or entry belongs to a public office and cannot be removed has never been held to allow the opening of the door to parol evidence. People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 72 Am. Dec. 49; Emery v. Berry, 28 N. H. 473, 61 Am. Dec. 622; Line v. Mack, 14 Ind. 330; Merritt v. Merritt, 20 Ill. 65; Barton v. Anderson, 1 Tex. 98; Martin v. Payne, 11 Tex. 292.

To allow such parol proof would be a violation of the rule requiring the best evidence to be adduced that the case admits. Comparet v. Jernegan, 6 Blackf. 375.

And error. McDeed v. McDeed, 67 Ill. 545.

Where the action is founded upon such a statute, a copy thereof should be filed with the complaint. Tyler v. Kent, 53 Ind. 533.

Written law exists in records and may be proved with certainty. Raynham v. Canton, 8 Pick. 298.

Under the New York Statute of 1848, however, a printed volume of the statute laws of any other state is to be admitted as prima facie evidence of such laws. Toulondou v. Lachenmeyer, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 215, 1 Sweeny, 45, 37 How. Pr. 145.

The general rule of law with reference to foreign written laws is that the statute produced must be proved to be published by authority and the copy produced must be properly authenticated. Pierce v. Indseth, 106 U. S. 546, 27 L. ed. 254; Molina v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 269; Territt v. Woodruff, 19 Vt. 184; Danforth v. Reynolds, 1 Vt. 235; Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh, 471; Zimmerman v. Helser, 32 Md. 274; People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 72 Am. Dec. 49; Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 153, 38 Am. Dec. 153; Webster v. Reese, 23 Iowa, 209; Belasner v. Texas Exp. Co. 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 457; Martin v. Payne, 11 Tex. 292.

When so published they must be accepted and cannot be treated as mere private or unauthorized publications. Wilt v. Cutler, 38 Mich. 139.

evidence. Kenny v. Clarkson, 1 Johns. 335, 3 Am. Dec. 336; Phillips v. Gregg, supra.

Such documents are usually authenticated by an exemplification of a copy under the great seal of the state, or by a copy proved to be a true copy, or by the certificate of an officer authorized by law, which certificate must itself be authenticated. Phillips v. Gregg, supra.

Certified copies from the secretary of state, or a copy printed by said authority, are evidence thereof. Line v. Mack, 14 Ind. 330; State v. Cheek, 34 N. C. 114; Taylor v. Bank of Illinois, 7 T. B. Mon. 576. In criminal as well as civil cases. State v. Patterson, 24 N. C. 346, 38 Am. Dec. 699.

Foreign written laws may be received, when found in a statute book with proof that the book has been officially published by the government which made the law. Martin v. Payne, supra.

When they show upon their face that they have been so printed, and contain such laws, they are prima facie evidence. Emery v. Berry, 28 N. H. 473, 61 Am. Dec. 622.

And when so published they are admissible without further proof or authentication. Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh, 471.

A printed statute book of any government would seem to be evidence of the statutes of that government. Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, supra, wherein the printed statute book was held evidence of the acts of the general assembly in Virginia.

They must be verified in the same manner as foreign judgments, by the exemplification of a copy under the great seal of the state, or by a sworn copy. Emery v. Berry, supra.

If the foreign law be a written law, the highest evidence should be produced in the form of an authenticated copy, or a copy proved to be a true copy by a witness who has examined and compared it with the original. Isabella v. Peoot, 2 La. Ann. 387.

An exemplification in due form is the best legal method of proving the contents of a public record. People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 72 Am. Dec. 49.

In New York and Connecticut the rule is to require the statutes of sister states to be proved in the same manner as foreign laws. Emery v. Berry, supra.

Such records do not in each case, when so presented, make their own proof, this must be shown alibunde. Bryant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 434.

Foreign laws, which have been promulgated as such by our own government, have been allowed to be read without further proof. Owen v. Boyle, 15 Me. 147, 22 Am. Dec. 143; Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 38, 2 L. ed. 27.

The rule requiring foreign laws to be verified with the sanction of an oath is relaxed in cases of the statute of sister states, on account of the constitutional ties binding the states together. Mullen v. Morris, 2 Pa. 85.

Yet it is competent for the states to admit public acts of sister states as evidence, even though not authenticated as required by the act of congress. Taylor v. Bank of Illinois, 7 T. B. Mon. 576.

Statute books of another state purporting to be under the state authority were held admissible as Whittakers. Sarah Behrman had him arrested once in Atlanta, but did not appear, and he was discharged.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Frank I. Osborne, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The statute provides that "the unwritten or common law of another state, or of a territory, or of a foreign country, may be proved as a fact by oral evidence." Code, § 1838. The plain intendment of the law is that any person who is competent to testify as to other facts, of which such person professes to have knowledge, shall be permitted to state the pertinent provisions of the unwritten laws of a foreign country, after having stated that he has had opportunity to learn what they evidence of the statute laws of that state, there being no proof to the contrary showing their repeal, State v. Abley, 29 Vt. 80, 67 Am. Dec. 754.

The statutes of the different states will only be taken notice of in the courts of the United States, when found in the official statute books of the said states. Martin v. Payne, 11 Tex. 232.

A copy of the laws printed under order of congress by the public printer, and distributed by law to the executives of the several states, for the purpose of distribution among the people, were held good evidence of such acts without further authentication. Taylor v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh. 471.

In the United States courts, and in the courts of the several states, printed volumes of the laws of the states of the Union are received as prima facie evidence. Owen v. Boyle, 15 Me. 147, 32 Am. Dec. 143.

So in Crake v. Crake, 18 Ind. 156, the statute book of Ohio, printed by authority and by the state printer, was received in evidence as prima facie the law of the state.

And the same rule applies to courts of admiralty. The Pawashick, 3 Low. Dec. 142; Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 83, 2 L. ed. 27; The Prince George, 4 Moore, P. C. C. 21.

Statutes of sister states are proved prima facie by the production of the statute book purporting to be published by authority of the state. Inge v. Murphy, 10 Ala. 385.

The printed volume purporting on its face to contain the laws of a sister state, is to be received as prima facie evidence of the statute laws of such state independent of any statutory regulation. Biesenthall v. Williams, 1 Duv. 329, 35 Am. Dec. 629.

In Paine v. Lake Erie & L. R. Co. 31 Ind. 263, the same doctrine was applied.

In Ellis v. Maxson, 19 Mich. 183, 2 Am. Rep. 51, it was held that the court would not presume that the legislature of another state had adopted the statutes of that state, and that the same must be proved before they would be passed upon, and that where it was alleged that a contract was required to be in writing, the statute making such law must be produced. Kermott v. Ayer, 11 Mich. 181, and People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 73 Am. Dec. 48, recognized and approved.

By the positive law of Michigan, printed copies of the statutes and resolves of any of the United States, if purporting to be published under the authority of the proper government, are required to be admitted in all proceedings in our courts as prima facie evidence under § 5835 of the Compiled Laws. People v. Calder, 30 Mich. 85.

It is better evidence than the testimony of any individual, who may know the general purport of the law, but cannot carry in his mind so minute a knowledge as may sometimes be necessary for the application of the law. Raynham v. Canton, 3 Pick. 223.

They may be rebutted by evidence proving them to be inaccurate. Bradley v. West, 30 Mo. 34.

The distinct authority for printing and publishing the laws need not appear in any case where they purport to be published under the authority of the government. Will v. Outler, 33 Mich. 139, 25 R. I. A.

When such statutes are authenticated in the manner pointed out by the act of congress, they must be received as evidence. Taylor v. Bank of Illinois, 7 T. B. Mon. 573.

In Hunt v. Johnson, 44 N. Y. 27, 4 Am. Rep. 681, it was held that the code simplified the mode of proof, the printed volume being made presumptive evidence of the existence of a statute, but that such proof must be produced on the trial like other facts, and could not afterwards be produced on appeal.

A sworn copy or extract from a statute, setting apart a particular day for a fast day, was allowed to be proved by parol in the same manner as other facts of general notoriety. Chamberlain v. Maitland, 5 B. Mon. 448.

In Raynham v. Canton, 3 Pick. 223, it was held that a volume purporting on the face of it to contain the laws of that state, was the best evidence next to an exemplification or authenticated copy.

Where a properly authenticated foreign statute cannot be procured, then oral evidence might be admissible. Raynham v. Canton, supra; Consequa v. Willings, Pet. C. C. 225.

There must, however, be some showing why secondary evidence becomes necessary; this is the settled American doctrine. Kermott v. Ayer, 11 Mich. 181.

Sworn copies of records of another country can be given in evidence, when better testimony cannot be procured, the party using them showing that they are the records of the court by other testimony. Bryant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 434.

In an action of assumpsit on a written guaranty for the "ultimate payment" of goods the plaintiff read in evidence sections of the civil code of Louisiana to show the law of that state in relation to such guaranty, the contract of guaranty being consummated in that state; but no evidence of lawyers or persons skilled and instructed in the laws of that state to either interpret the written law, or afford the courts the means of constructing it being given, the court held the question, as to the language of the written law of Louisiana, was settled by the production of that language itself from the civil code. Walker v. Forbes, 31 Ala. 9.

In Lee v. Mathews, 10 Ala. 332, 44 Am. Dec. 498, it was sought to prove that it was necessary, under the Alabama laws, to record a deed by the evidence of a witness, but the court held that the law must be proved that such evidence was not sufficient.

Where the action was brought upon a promissory note in Alabama and afterwards removed to Mississippi where the note was transferred, it was held that the revised code of Mississippi was competent evidence in proof of the statutes incorporated therein. Clanton v. Barnes, 50 Ala. 230.

In Clarke v. Bank of Mississippi, 10 Ark. 516, 39 Am. Dec. 243, the printed statute book of Mississippi, published by authority, was allowed to be received in evidence, such book proving the powers and capacity of the corporation to contract, the burden to discredit such book being on the defendant.

Where the defendant sought to show that the plaintiff's deeds were based upon an illegal and are. The legislature intended, evidently, that all persons who might profess to have an acquaintance with such laws should be permitted to testify what were their requirements as to the celebration of marriages, or entering into any other contracts. It is only where, by reason of peculiar skill and experience, certain persons are enabled to draw inferences from facts which the ordinary, untrained mind cannot deduce, that the services of experts become desirable, if not essential, for the enlightenment of courts and juries. Rogers, Expert Testimony, § 10, p. 18. When the question is once addressed to the common sense, and involves only the common experience and sound judgment of mankind for its solution, the opinions of experts are not admissible. Id. p. 14. What-usurious contract, reading in evidence extracts from interest statutes, of Tennessee authenticated by the certificate of a notary public of Memphis, it was held such evidence of the usury statutes of Tennessee was not admissible; that the modes of proving the laws of the states were plainly indicated by the case of McNeill v. Arnold, 17 Ark. 154, 167, et supra.

A book said to contain the statutes of Vermont and printed by a private printer, was held not admissible as evidence of the statutes of Vermont. Canfield v. Squire, 2 Root, 300, 1 Am. Dec. 71.

The title page of a volume showing that the book was published by the authority of the Ohio legislature was held good evidence. Egan v. Connelly, 107 Ill. 453.

But the publication must be authorized under seal of foreign state, the seal of the secretary of state is not enough. Slak v. Woodruff, 15 Ill. 15.

Under the evidence, Act of February 17, 1838, Revised Statutes of Indiana, p. 272, making printed statute books of any of the states of the Union, purporting to be published by authority, prima facie evidence in the courts of that state of the laws published in them, it would be incompetent to prove orally the laws of such state, and parol testimony would be insufficient for that purpose. Compant v. Jernegan, 5 Blackf. 375.

In Heberd v. Myers, 5 Ind. 94, the witness, introduced to prove the laws of New York by parol, stated that there was a written code of law for said state. The court held the question and answer taken together sufficiently showed the written law, and that under the statute its admissibility rested in the discretion of the court, which, being exercised without any obvious abuse, was not the subject of review.

Where it was merely shown that the statutes in question were printed at a certain place by a certain firm, in a given year, it not being shown that the printers were constituted state printers, or that they had done such printing by virtue of authority derived from the state, and there was nothing to rebut the conclusion that the printing was that of private enterprise, it was held such book was not receivable in evidence of the revised statutes of Ohio. Magee v. Sanderson, 10 Ind. 261.

In Magee v. Sanderson, supra, it was held that under the statute, a statute book of a sister state was not evidence, unless it purported to have been printed under the authority of such state.

Where the action was brought upon four promissory notes, the laws of Ohio, being pleaded, were proved by a certified copy from the secretary of state under the seal of the state, as evidence of the rate of interest in that state. Hall v. Harris, 16 Ind. 180.

In Vaughn v. Griffith, 16 Ind. 553, a copy of the statutes of Ohio, purporting to be printed by authority of the general assembly, and published in pursuance of an act of the general assembly, were offered and received in evidence, it appearing that they purported to be published by public authority, thus distinguishing the case from Magee v. Sanderson, supra.

In order to prove that the public library of Kentucky was a duly incorporated institution, a bound volume entitled "Acts of the General Assembly of 25 L. R. A.

the Commonwealth of Kentucky, passed at the adjourned session (January, 1871) of the General Assembly which was begun and held in the city of Frankfort, published by authority, containing what purported to be an act of incorporation of such library," was held admissible, the fair and reasonable inference from the title page showing that the volume purported to be, and was, published by authority of the state. Rothrock v. Perkinson, 61 Ind. 39.

The evidence of three witnesses, residents of Pennsylvania, thoroughly conversant with the laws as contained in Dunlap's Laws and Pardon's Digest, which they offered as evidence of the statute law of that state, was held not subject to exception, the fact that the books were received as evidence of the law being properly proved before the books were read for the law, the testimony proving the practice and usage under the statute. Greasons v. Davis, 9 Iowa, 219.

The case of Greasons v. Davis, supra, was distinguished from that of Taylor v. Runyan, 3 Iowa, 475, by reason of the averments in the petition in relation to the effect of the entries of the judgment in the record in Pennsylvania, and the evidence introduced to support such averments and to show the force and meaning of the record, where they were made and existed. The court in the latter case stated that if there had been the proper averments and evidence supporting them, and showing that these forms of entry had the effect of judgments where they were made, it might and probably would make a different case, but in such latter case there was nothing explaining the transcript and showing their effect at home.

Where the plaintiff read from a printed book, purporting from its title page to contain the civil code of the state of Louisiana, and to have been published by authority, the court held such book was competent testimony of the laws of Louisiana, and overruled the defendant's objection to the evidence. Thomas v. Davis, 7 B. Mon. 227.

The Ohio laws were allowed to be proved by the testimony of witnesses learned in the law, who incorporated sworn copies of such printed laws as their depositions. Bleenthall v. Williams, 1 Duv. 329, 85 Am. Dec. 629.

Where the defendant objected, upon the ground of irrelevancy, to the plaintiff's reading in evidence the revised statutes of Illinois, and the first volume of Breese's Illinois Reports, the court sustained the objections; the law of Illinois not being an averment sufficient to support proof of what the law was, the proper statute fixing the liability not being mentioned or referred to, there was nothing from which the court could infer the law, the averment not indicating whether such law was statutory or established by precedent of the court, the law of another state being nothing but a fact which must be pleaded as any other fact, in order that the court may judge of the effect of the law. Roots v. Merriwether, 8 Bush, 401.

Where the statutes of a sister state purported to be printed by the state authority, and as such were found in book form, they were held competent evidence. Taylor v. Bank of Illinois, 7 T. B. Mon. 576.

In Laplace v. Smith, 13 La. 91, 33 Am. Dec. 555, a-ever conflicts may have arisen between the courts of the various states in determining whether a witness should show some special training or opportunity to become instructed in such laws (Id. § 97), we are relieved from doubt and difficulty by the plain expression by the legislature of the purpose to allow all who claim to know the provisions of foreign laws the privilege of explaining them to courts and juries. It was intended that juries should judge of the skill and intelligence of witnesses testifying upon this subject, as they do when nonexpert witnesses are allowed to give their opinions as to questions of sanity. Our statute, however, is but affirmative of the principle which has been laid down as the law at an early day by some of the courts of this country. Id.

copy of the statutes of Mississippi under the great seal of the state and the certificate of secretary of state were admitted as evidence of the laws.

Where it was sought to prove by a member of the Pennsylvania bar, the statute law of that state in regard to the jurisdiction of justice of the peace, the evidence was rejected. Zimmerman v. Helser, 32 Md. 274.

A volume of the laws of the state of Vermont, upon the title page of which were printed the words "by authority," was held admissible in evidence under section 59 of chapter 94 of the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts. Merrifield v. Robbins, 3 Gray, 150.

In Ashley v. Root, 4 Allen, 504, the defendant was allowed to read in evidence a pamphlet, purporting to be the "acts, resolutions, and memorials passed at the regular session of the fourth general assembly of the state of Iowa" having upon it "the certificate of the secretary of state of Iowa" for the purpose of showing that the money was lent upon an usurious rate of interest. The court affirmed the general principle and admitted the evidence, the proof being in conformity with section 63, chap. 131, of the General Statutes.

Where a volume produced in evidence by an attorney appeared to be a volume of the New York statutes, published by authority of the state and possessing the character of identity and authenticity, provided for under the Michigan compiled laws, it proved itself as an item which was admissible, it not being shown that any change had taken place in the law since the enactment of the statute. People v. Calder, 30 Mich. 85.

But where, for the purpose of proving the marriage laws of New Jersey, a policeman and constable in New Jersey did not swear to any general knowledge of the laws of that state, but testified that he had, on account of a difficulty with his wife, looked into those laws, the court held such evidence was wrongly admitted, either as proof of or as explaining the law of New Jersey. People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 72 Am. Dec. 49.

In Kopke v. People, 43 Mich. 41, a first marriage in Ohio was proved by the evidence of an Ohio lawyer as to the statutory law in the state. The court, although no exception was based upon the admission thereof, and it did not affect the record as presented upon appeal, nevertheless suggested that statutes should be proved in a more direct way, and that the laws of Michigan, as well as the act of congress, made distinct provision on the subject. People v. Lambert, supra, approved of.

A printed copy of a document purporting to be printed by order of the governor of the state, and published by the authority of one of the co-ordinate departments of the government, was held sufficient, the intention of the Michigan statute being only to prevent mere private or unauthorized publications of another state from being admitted in evidence. Wilt v. Cutler, 38 Mich. 150.

In the above case the title page read "Revised Statutes of the state of New Jersey, passed in 1874, Trenton, printed by order of the Governor, 1874," and the volume was admitted as evidence, even though it did not purport to be published under the authority of the government of the state, as required by § 5635 of 2 Compiled Laws of Michigan.

Printed journals of the state in the house of representatives in the state of Missouri, and all public documents and reports therein contained, and all reports or documents printed by order of the state, or of either house of the general assembly, or purporting to be printed by authority thereof, are prima facie evidence to the same extent that duly authenticated copies of the original would be. Bradley v. West, 60 Mo. 34.

In Lord v. Staples, 23 N. H. 449, the court admitted a volume of the laws of another state, proved by the counselor of that state to be received in the courts thereof, and to be published by authority as evidence.

But the court did not decide in the above case that the laws of any country, merely foreign, might be so proved. Lord v. Staples, supra.

A copy of the state statute authenticated under the seal of the state, was received in evidence in State v. Carr, 5 N. H. 387, without further proof.

Where objection was made to the admission of a bound printed volume of the laws of the state of New York, by an attorney of that state, as universally received in the state of New York as the statutes of that state, it was held it was properly admitted. Hale v. Ross, 3 N. J. L. 373.

The decision in the above case was dissented from by the court in Van Buskirk v. Mulock, 18 N. J. L. 184, the court holding that such statutes, whether public or private, could only be given in evidence, and exemplified as directed by the act of congress. In the above case the court refused to receive evidence of an attorney, to the effect that a printed volume of the statutes of New York was universally received and read in that state as evidence.

An official printed copy of the Wisconsin statutes of 1854, and of the Revised Statutes of 1858, offered and read without objection, and received by the court, cannot afterwards be objected to. Condit v. Blackwell, 19 N. J. Eq. 193.

In the above case the testimony of the defendant with respect to the Wisconsin laws, although it would not have been sufficient if given by a counselor of the state, yet being given by him as defendant, and on his own behalf, the court held must be received as against him, being admitted without objection.

But in that case it was stated that the laws of Wisconsin were not in fact, or by theory of law, known to the courts of the state, and must be proved either by experts, counselors learned in the law of that state, or copies of its statutes with the decisions thereon. Condit v. Blackwell, supra.

A book purchased in a book store, purporting to contain the laws of a state, unless published by authority, would not be admitted anywhere as evidence of the written laws of any government. Packard v. Hill, 2 Wend. 411.

In Markoe v. Aldrich, 1 Abb. Pr. 55, the certificate of the recorder of the county of the recording of a mortgage was produced with that of the clerk of the court, with the seal of the court annexed attesting that he was recorder and that his signature was genuine together with the certificate of the presiding judge of that court, attesting the clerk's certificate; it was held not sufficient to prove the validity of a mortgage made in the state of Indiana.

§ 96; *American L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Rose-
agle*, 77 Pa. 514; Pickard v. Bailey, 26 N.
H. 171.

We find no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the prosecuting witness was competent to prove that she was married according to the laws of Russia, with which she said she was acquainted. It is equally clear that the writing which she testified was signed by the defendant and herself at the time of her marriage with him is admissible, not simply as corroborative, but as substantive, testimony, since, if genuine, it is a declaration of the defendant tending to establish the fact that the marriage was then celebrated. 1 Russell, Crimes, 216; *Hill v.

Hill*, 82 Pa. 518. This paper is like the English register of marriage,—not a clergy-

Where in order to prove the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of California, a member of the California bar testified that a book, containing the statutes of California published by the state printer was one of the official copies, as published by the state printer, and that it was the received official publication recognised by the bar, and that the court had no other and there was no other edition published, the court overruled the defendant's objection, which was that the book did not purport to be published by the authority of the state, and was not commonly admitted as evidence. *Pacific Pneumatic Gas Co. v.
Wheelock*, 80 N. Y. 278, affirming 12 Jones & S. 568.

In the case where the statutes of another state were received upon insufficient proof, but upon examination it was made to appear to the supreme court, by reason of facilities furnished by the secretary of state, that the copy so produced at the trial was correct, the court refused the writ. Mc-Dugald v. Smith, 88 N. C. 576.

Where a paper, purporting to be a copy of the laws of Maryland, was given in evidence but it was not certified as required, either by the laws of the United States or of North Carolina, it was held error for which a verdict de novo would issue. Ibid.

The certificate of the secretary of state, accompanied by that of the governor under the seal of the state, is a sufficient compliance with the Act of North Carolina, of 1823, Rev. Stat., chap. 1198, directing the mode of proof of sister states as to the secretary's official character. State v. Jackson, 13
N. C. 563.

In State v. Twitty, 9 N. C. 441, 11 Am. Dec. 779, a printed book entitled "Revised Code of the Laws of Virginia" was put in evidence to prove the existence of a certain corporation, and held not admissible, the court stating that such laws must be proved by duly authenticated copies with the seal of the state attached, the Act of Congress of 1790, under which every law of another state must be authenticated by having the seal of the state affixed, superseding the common law of the subject and being the highest evidence of authenticity.

A copy of a private act of assembly, printed under the authority of the commonwealth, was held evidence in Biddis v. James, 6 Binn. 321, 6 Am. Dec.
454.

Printed copies, authorized by the legislature, of state laws, whether public or private, were held to be admissible in evidence. Ibid.

In Kean v. Rice, 18 Serg. & R. 203, a printed copy of an act of assembly, published by the legislative authority of another state, was received in evidence.

A certified copy of the general statutes of Massachusetts, proved by the governor and certified by the secretary of state, under the seal of the commonwealth, was held admissible in evidence.
Grant v. Henry Clay Coal Co. 80 Pa. 208.

Where the laws are public or private, yet being printed by the public printer by order of the legislature, agreeably to a general act of assembly for that purpose, it must be considered as sufficiently authenticated. Biddis v. James, supra.

Where the plaintiff offered and gave in evidence a printed book styled "The Revised Laws of New York," and offered to read therefrom, it was held that printed volumes purporting on their face to be the laws of a sister state were admissible as prima facie evidence to prove the statute law of that state. Mullen v. Morris, 2 Pa. 85.

The record of a judgment of a court of a sister state attested by the deputy, and certified by the judge of the supreme court of the state, it appearing from the record that he was a member of the court but not the chief justice, was held not certified as directed by the act of congress and improperly admitted in evidence, the Act of Congress of 1790 declaring that the records and judicial proceedings of any state shall be proved or admitted in any other court of the United States by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate as the case may be, that the said at-testation is in due form. Lothrop v. Blake, 8 Pa. 483.

Prince's Digest of the laws of Georgia, compiled under the authority of the legislature of that state, examined and approved under authority by the governor containing a certificate of his approbation and carrying other marks of authenticity, was held admissible in evidence of the laws of Georgia.
Allen v. Watson, 2 Hill, L. 319.

The admissibility of the book, however, was put upon the ground that it was commonly known by the bar and the bench, that in Georgia, which was only separated from South Carolina by the Sava-nah River, it was received as evidence for the statute law of that state, a copy of the same being in the legislative library of the state of Tennessee, presented as containing the statute laws of Georgia. Ibid.

The laws of Missouri, before they became a part of the Union, were held to be provable as facts from the best sources, such as eminent jurists, and other legal characters who had opportunities to become experienced in them, as well as by the public documents of the country. Wilson v. Smith, 5
Yerg. 399.

In Foster v. Taylor, 3 Overt. 191, it was held that the court could either recur to its own knowledge of the judiciary system of a sister state, or look into the printed statutes of such state, to ascertain facts within such statutes. Phillips v. Gregg, 10
Watts, 158, 38 Am. Dec. 168.

While, under the common law, the law of another state must be averred and proved as any other fact, in Tennessee the averment in such case would only be necessary and would be considered in the courts of that state by copies of the statute, purporting or proven to have been published by the authority of the state from whence it comes, under section 3800 of the Tennessee Code. So held in Hobbs v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 572, as to inferior courts.

In Tryon v. Rankin, 9 Tex. 586, where the question was as to the plaintiff's right to recover interest on a promissory note, the court held such right did not exist at common law, it was generally the creature of statute and therefore could not be proved by parol; and further that if the rate of interest depended upon usage having the force of law, it was susceptible of proof by parol, but it must be proven as a usage.

The case of Burton v. Anderson, 1 Tex. 83, which man's certificate, but a paper signed by the parties. "Proof of the register there [says Campbell, J., in People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 849, 73 Am. Dec. 49] is proof of the act of the party, as much as proof of his signature to a deed would be."

After the witness testified that the words on the back of a picture of the defendant were in his handwriting, and that the writing was sent to her together with the picture, the writing was competent as an acknowledgment by him of the relations subsisting between them, just as was the written statement signed by him at the time of the marriage. 21 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 121.

A much graver question was raised, however, by admitting, in the face of objection, decided that the act of congress did not exclude other modes of authentication of state laws, and admitted the statute books purporting to be published by state authority as evidence, was held to be superceded by the provisions of the statute. Martin v. Payne, 11 Tex. 232.

The act of congress does not preclude the establishment of other means of authentication, or proof by the states themselves. Ibid.

Where the evidence rejected was a compilation of the statutes of Tennessee, which did not purport to have been published by the authority of the state, or to be official in its character, it was held that they were not receivable in evidence, as, under the act of congress, only books purporting to have been printed by state authority were admissible, the statute not extending to private and unofficial publications. Ibid.

The testimony usually produced is a sworn copy of one who has compared it with the original proceedings, or an exemplified copy certified by the clerk, and the presiding judge, and the seal of the court with the broad seal of the province or kingdom to the appointment of the judge, with the proper certificate from the office of appointment. Spaulding v. Vincent, 24 Vt. 501.

A village charter was held to be a public law of which the court should take judicial notice. Winooski v. Gokey, 49 Vt. 282.

A copy of a manifest taken from the books of a custom house is a copy of a record, and may be given in evidence when properly proved. United States v. Johns, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 412, 1 L. ed. 868.

An exemplification of a law of a state under the great seal thereof is admissible in evidence without any other attestation. Thompson v. Musser, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 453, 1 L. ed. 222.

The written or statute laws of foreign countries are to be proved by the laws themselves if they can be procured, if not, inferior evidence of them may be received. Consequa v. Willings, Pet. C. C. 225.

The laws of the other states, printed under authority, are evidence when proved to be so printed. State v. Stade, 1 D. Chip. 303.

In Ennis v. Smith, 55 U. S. 14 How. 400, 14 L. ed. 472, the Code Civil of France with its indorsement "Les Garde des Sceaux de France a la Coeur Supreme des Etats Unis" was offered as evidence to prove that the law of France was for the distribution of the funds in question and it was held that such indorsement was sufficient to make the code evidence.

b. Of foreign countries.

Foreign law is to be proved as a fact, if written or statutory, by the law itself or exemplified copies. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 28 Md. 287, 33 Am. Dec. 688; De Sobry v. De Laistre, 3 Harr. & J. 191, 3 Am. Dec. 535; Gardner v. Lewis, 7 Gill. 379.

The written foreign laws may be verified by an oath, or by an exemplification of a copy under the great seal of a state, or by a copy proved to be a true copy by a witness who has examined and compared it with the original, or by a certificate of an officer properly authorized by law to give the copy, which certificate must be duly proved. Ennis v. Smith, 55 U. S. 14 How. 400, 14 L. ed. 472.

The written foreign law may be proved by a copy of the law properly authenticated. Ibid.

To prove the written laws of any foreign nation, a copy of such laws should be produced. Gardner v. Lewis, supra; Robinson v. Clifford, 2 Wash. C. C. 1; Picton's Case, 30 How. St. Tr. 492.

Otherwise it cannot be taken as evidence. Hempbill v. Bank of Alabama, 6 Smedes & M. 50; Gardner v. Lewis, and Robinson v. Clifford, supra.

The usual mode of proving a statute law of a foreign state is by an exemplification of the statute, certified by the proper officer and in the proper manner. Allen v. Watson, 2 Hill. L. 312.

The laws of a foreign nation, designed only for the direction of its own affairs, are not to be noticed by the courts of other countries, unless proved as facts. Talbot v. Seaman, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 1, 2 L. ed. 15.

The written law of a foreign country is subject to the same rules as all other written instruments of evidence of a public nature, and as the original cannot be produced, can only be proved by the production of a sworn copy. Innerarity v. Heirs of Mims, 1 Ala. 600.

The written or statute laws and judicial records of a foreign state must be proved by documents properly authenticated under the seal of the state, or a sworn copy must be produced. Lincoln v. Battelle, 6 Wend. 475.

Authenticated copies of written laws, or other public instruments of foreign governments, must be produced and verified upon the sanction of an oath, unless verified by some other high authority which the laws respect not less than the oath of an individual. Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watta, 153, 36 Am. Dec. 158.

A person offered as a witness and expert in foreign law may state a written law without producing it, and he may produce the copy of the statutes or code of the foreign country and refer to the same for the purpose of refreshing his recollection as to the law. Barrows v. Downs, 9 R. L. 446, 11 Am. Rep. 238.

The statute laws of nations foreign to the United States could not formerly be proved by parol, but now the court has a discretion on this point. Line v. Mack, 14 Ind. 380; Comparet v. Jernegan, 5 Blackf. 375.

Where a defendant, in an action of ejectment, offered to prove by a witness the function and authority exercised by the Spanish commandant at Mobile, under the Spanish government, that they did exercise the civil, military, executive, and judicial powers, and that their decisions therein were conclusive, unless appealed from, and also that they determined all questions concerning lands, both as to the king and individuals, and that the commandant was empowered and authorized by the Spanish government, by written orders from the king and other superior officers; that these orders as well as the regulations by which they were governed were in writing,—it was held that the court committed no error in refusing the testimony, as a foreign written law can only be proved by an exemplification of the law itself. Innerarity v. Heirs of Mims, 1 Ala. 600.

In the above case there was no offer to prove the existence of a usage or custom for which there was no warrant by any written order or regulation, the proof being an attempt to prove the legal effect the attestation of the celebration of the marriage by the rabbi of the city of Riga, which was certified by the signature and seal of the official minister. We cannot satisfactorily dispose of this case without determining what documentary testimony can be admitted on the trial of criminal prosecutions without invading the constitutional right of a defendant to confront his accusers. The right to cross-examine one's accusers was never held to exclude the dying declarations of one who, by the act of the accused, was no longer able to confront him on the trial, provided the declaration was made in the certain expectation of death. State v. Mills, 91 N. C. 581; State v. Tilghman, 83 N. C. 513; State v. Williams, 67 N. C. 13; State v. Shelton, 47 N. C. 360, 64 Am. Dec. 587; Green v.

of orders and regulations admitted to be in writing, which were therefore properly rejected. Ibid.

The printed volume of the laws of the British province, which was proved by the testimony of subscribing witnesses before the lord mayor of London, and certified by him under his official signature and seal of office, which was sufficient to authorize the deed to be read in evidence of title by the law of the province, was held to be sufficient evidence to pass the title here. Owen v. Boyle, 15 Me. 147, 32 Am. Dec. 143.

Where the books admitted purported to contain the laws of the province, printed by the printer to his majesty, and distributed by the government to its officers, and cited and read in the courts there as laws in force, regulating the administration of justice, receiving the sanction of the executive and judicial officers of the province as containing its laws, the latter fact being proved by the oath of witnesses, the court held such evidence equally satisfactory as the exemplification of a roll found in the possession of the custos rotulorum, accompanied by the oath of the person making it; and was no departure from the rule requiring the best evidence. Owen v. Doyle, supra.

The evidence of an attorney from Canada, concerning the Canadian law of interest, was held inadmissible to show the terms of a Canadian statute in Kermott v. Ayer, 11 Mich. 181.

In an action upon a bill of exchange, it was held that the commerce code of France, being written law, could not be proved by the production of a printed book, admitted to be conformable to the official edition of the code published by the government. Chanoine v. Fowler, 3 Wend. 173.

In the above case the chancellor of the French consulate of New York produced a book in the French language containing the code, but not the official edition of the laws of France, although the witness stated that it was conformable to that edition, and that he regulated his official conduct by the laws as contained in that book, which, he stated, was an exact copy of the laws furnished by the French government to his consul, and the defendant agreed to so consider it, but the court held such book was not evidence of the laws of France. Ibid.

The notarial certificate only proves the correctness of the translation. Lincoln v. Battelle, 6 Wend. 473.

The laws regulating the Court of Consulado of Havana were held not provable by a printed book purchased in Havana purporting to contain the royal charter establishing that court, the written laws of other states being proved by an exemplification, and not by the printed statute book of such states. Packard v. Hill, 3 Wend. 411.

Where the defendant sought to prove his discharge from a debt, by virtue of a royal grant of the king of Denmark, and of the proceedings under it, the proclama which preceded the grant being considered as a law of the kingdom of Denmark or as a judicial proceeding, the evidence of a sworn witness who swore that he knew that such grant was issued, and that all necessary notices were given, and that the copy and notarial translation of the proclama annexed to the witness's deposition was duly authenticated, and that full 25 L. R. A.

faith and credit would be given to such authentication in the courts of Denmark, was held inadmissible as evidence. Lincoln v. Battelle, supra.

Where the original instrument upon which suit was brought could not be produced, as by the laws of the Spanish province in which it was executed the original remained with the notary before whom it was executed, copies certified and signed by the notary being delivered to the parties and receivable in evidence in all the Spanish courts,—upon the question whether the lex loci ought to prevail so as to allow such copies as evidence, the court inclined to the opinion that they ought not to be received as sufficient per se, but were not entirely to be disregarded and treated as nullities, but ought to be received as forming part of the inferior evidence of execution when the original could not be produced and proved. Mauri v. Hefferman, 13 Johns. 53.

In order to ascertain the exact state of the law at a particular date, including its construction and effect, the evidence of a person who testified that he had practiced law in Havana for twenty-four years, had been the consulting lawyer of one of the tribunals, and a judge, and the book to which he referred purported to be the Spanish Code of Commerce of 1823, it was held that the book was admissible as showing the law of Cuba, and to support the evidence and refresh the recollection of the witness. Barrows v. Downs, 9 H. L. 446, 11 Am. Rep. 233.

Marine ordinance of foreign countries, promulgated by the executive by order of the legislature of the United States, may be read in the courts of the United States without further authentication or proof. Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch 1, 3 L. ed. 15.

Where the claimant offered in evidence of the French law volumes of the fourth, twenty-fourth, and others of the Bulletin Des Lois, sent to the supreme court by the French government, they were held admissible in evidence without further proof for the purpose of proving the French law. Dauphin v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 221.

In Thompson v. Musser, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 458, 1 L. ed. 222, a copy of an act of assembly of another state, contained with other acts in a pamphlet printed by the printer of the commonwealth, was held to be good evidence where the court below permitted the declaration to be amended before the writ of the jury had been sworn, and then had the jury sworn again and received their verdict without the consent of the defendant.

The English written law was allowed to be proved by printed statutes, proved to be officially published by that government, a copy of the statutes being shown, to the reasonable satisfaction of the court, to be genuine. The Pawashick, 3 Low. Dec. 142.

Where the defendant's counsel offered to prove by a witness the contents of two decrees of the king of Spain, the court refused the evidence, stating that although the unwritten law of foreign countries might be proved by witnesses, the written law could be proved only by itself. United States v. Ortega, 4 Wash. C. C. 581.

Where the proof exists, and the provisions of the bankrupt law of a province, at the time the dis-

State, 66 Ala. 40, 41 Am. Rep. 744. Where a witness who was examined on a preliminary hearing or on a former trial of the same indictment has since died or become insane, or is too ill to be present, or has been induced by the prosecutor or defendant to remove from the state, his testimony may be proved on a subsequent trial, when it appears that the accused was present, and had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness when such testimony was delivered. State v. King, 86 N. C. 603; State v. Grady, 83 N. C. 646; State v. Valentine, 29 N. C. 225; State v. Taylor, 61 N. C. 508.

Where facts, from their very nature, can only be proved by a record, or a duly authenticated copy of a record, proof of them does not fall within the constitutional in-charge was granted, was made without the production of any copy of the statute, it was held irregular, as some copy of the law, which the witness could swear was recognized in the province as authoritative, should have been produced. Spaulding v. Vincent, 24 Vt. 501.

IV. Modifications of the common law.

Statutory modification of the common law must be proved by the production of authenticated copies of the statutes, and cannot be otherwise judicially noticed. Newton v. Cooke, 10 Ark. 169.

V. Construction of written laws.

The question of the exposition, interpretation, and adjudication, which might never have been evidenced by books or writings, is properly shown by the testimony or opinions of competent witnesses, instructed in the law of the state, such expositions and interpretations being well understood as the rules of law produced by the court, from the written words of the code upon a particular state of facts. Walker v. Forbes, 31 Ala. 9; Dyer v. Smith, 12 Conn. 384.

It may be learned by parol what the true meaning or construction of a foreign statute, as settled by the practice of courts of a foreign country, is, and courts will take notice of the construction given to foreign statutes by foreign tribunals, into whose reports they may look for such construction. Hoes v. Van Alstyne, 20 Ill. 202.

The statutes of another state, and also any peculiar construction which the courts of such state may have placed upon them, when they come in question in the courts of another state must be proved by evidence as matters of fact, and if such statutes be given in evidence, but no evidence of such peculiar construction be given, the courts of the state will give the statute such construction as may be authorized by the settled construction of similar statutes in that state. Smith v. Bartram, 11 Ohio St. 660.

The construction given to a statute relating to justice suits might be as much part of the common law as any part of the common law, and capable of the same kind of proof, and it makes no difference whether the construction of the statute arises from immemorial usage and practice, or in consequence of the decisions of the highest judicial tribunals, in either case if the construction had become a part of the law of the state, it is capable of proof by the courts of another state. Dyer v. Smith, 12 Conn. 384.

Such evidence, being credible and true, must control the courts in construing the written law, even though it leads to the adoption of a consideration different from that placed upon them by the former decisions in the case. Walker v. Forbes, 31 Ala. 9.

Courts may take uniform notice of the construction given to foreign statutes by the foreign tribunals, and for this purpose will look to the reports of such tribunals. McDeed v. McDeed, 67 Ill. 545; Hoes v. Van Alstyne, 20 Ill. 202.

Where the witness was a counselor at law, and had for many years exercised the duties of the office of a justice of the peace in the state, and gave evidence to the practical construction of a statute 25 L. R. A.

regarding his courts, the evidence was held admissible. Dyer v. Smith, supra.

Where it was sought to put in evidence a statute giving the plaintiff's executors a right to proceed to execution in the same way the plaintiff might have done, the modus operandi by which the executor was to become a party not being defined, the court held that the mode of procedure rested in the practice of the courts in the same manner as the extent of meaning given to the act, and that such construction, usage, and practice might be shown in the same manner as the unwritten law might be. Greasons v. Davis, 9 Iowa, 219.

The same rule is applicable to the construction of foreign statutes. Holman v. King, 7 Met. 384.

The connection, intercourse, and constitutional ties which bind together the several states require that this species of evidence should be sufficient until contradicted. Raynham v. Canton, 3 Pick. 288.

Where the evidence consists of the parol testimony of experts, as to the existence or prevailing construction of a statute, or as to any point of unwritten law, the jury must determine what the foreign law is. Kline v. Baker, 99 Mass. 254.

The question of construction and effect of written documents, statutes or judicial opinion is for the court. Ibid.

VI. Proof of practice under statutes.

The practice and usage under the written or statute law may be proved by parol. Greasons v. Davis, 9 Iowa, 219.

By lawyers skilled in the laws, usages, and practice of such state. Blackwell v. Glass, 43 Ark. 209.

In Mowry v. Chase, 100 Mass. 79, the evidence of experts from Rhode Island was admitted for the purpose of proving the usage and practice of the court of that state, with respect to the sufficiency of service to support a judgment.

Where, in an action of debt, the plaintiff offered the depositions of a witness, skilled in the laws and familiar with the practice of the state of Louisiana, and also the laws of the state of Louisiana, purporting to be published under the authority of the state, such depositions appearing to be regularly taken, the evidence was held competent to prove the laws and practice of that state. Barkman v. Hopkins, 11 Ark. 157.

The principles established in Greasons v. Davis, supra, were followed by the court in Crafts v. Clark, 38 Iowa, 237, where the plaintiff introduced in evidence an exemplified copy of an act of the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania, showing the duty of the prothonotary of the courts of record in that commonwealth, upon the application of the holder of a note, bond, or other written instrument upon which judgment is confessed, or containing a warrant to confess judgment as to the entry of such judgments, and also evidence of an expert showing the practice of the courts of that state upon such judgments.

But a witness cannot prove the powers of a notary under a state statute. State v. Cross, 66 Iowa, 180.

VII. State statutes.

By section 2790 of the civil code of Alabama, ed. of 1886, vol. 1, transcripts of Acts of Congress, or of the statutes of any other state or territory of the hibition, since the genuineness of the original was determined by inspection, and of the copies by an examination of the certificates, and the right to confront accusers was intended to be secured to the accused, not under all circumstances, but only where it would bring with it the benefit of testing the truth of testimony by meeting a prosecuting witness face to face, and subjecting him to cross-examination. 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 735, note; Tucker v. People, 122 Ill. 592; State v. Matlock, 70 Iowa, 229; People v. Jones, 24 Mich. 235; United States v. Ortega, 4 Wash. C. C. 531, Fed. Cas. No. 15,971; Hutchins v. Kimmell, 81 Mich. 130, 18 Am. Rep. 164. Before the passage of the Act of 1823 (Code, § 1338), a printed copy of the acts of the legislature of another state was

United States, certified by the secretary of state of that state as being deposited in his office, and public or private statutes, or the proceedings of any legislative body purporting on the face of the book to be printed by authority of the government or state or territory, are made evidence without further proof.

The Revised Statutes of Arizona, ed. of 1897, title 25, chap. 4, p. 330, provides that the printed statute books of the territory of the District of Columbia, or of any state or territory of the United States, or of any foreign government purporting to be printed under the authority thereof, are receivable in evidence.

By section 2822 of the Digest of Statutes of Arkansas, ed. 1884, chap. 59, p. 620, it is provided that the printed statute books of the several states and territories of the United States, purporting to have been printed under the authority of such states or territories, shall be evidence of the legislative acts of such states or territories.

And by section 2823 of the Arkansas Digest, of Statutes ed. 1884, chap. 59, copies of any act, law, or resolution contained in the printed statute books of any of the states and territories of the United States, purporting to have been printed by authority, and which are now, or which may hereafter be deposited in the office of the secretary of this state, and required by law to be there kept, certified under the seal of the secretary of state, shall be admitted as evidence.

Section 1903 of Deering's Annotated Codes and Statutes, of California, vol. 3, p. 643, provides that all other presumptions are satisfactory if uncontradicted. They are denominated disputable presumptions and may be controverted by other evidence.

And paragraph 85 states that a printed and published book purporting to be printed or published by public authority was so printed or published. Paragraph 86, that a printed and published book purporting to contain reports of cases adjudged in the tribunals of the state or court where the book is published, contains true reports of such cases.

The General Laws of Colorado, chap. 43, section 174 of Mill's Annotated Statutes, ed. of 1891, p. 1121, provides that printed statute books of the United States and of the several states and territories, printed under the authority of such states and territories, the books of reports of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the several states and territories published by the authority of such court, may be read in evidence in all courts of the state of such acts and decisions. Re Roberts, 5 Colo. 530.

The General Statutes of Connecticut, ed. of 1888, title 13, chap. 76, p. 256, § 1087, makes public statutes printed by authority of the state enacting them, the private or special acts of the state legal evidence to be judicially noticed.

Section 1086 of the same provides for the admission of exemplified copies of the statutes of other states as evidence.

Section 1088 of the same makes reports of decisions of other states and countries the subject of judicial notice as evidence of the common law of such state or country, and of the judicial construction of the statute or laws thereof.

Section 488 of Levisse's Dakota Codes, ed. of 1885, p. 137, makes the printed copies of statutes, codes, or written laws published by authority, or commonly admitted in evidence in such states or government, admissible on all occasions as presumptive evidence.

The unwritten or common law may be proved as facts by parol evidence and the books of reports are presumptive evidence of such laws. Ibid.

The Laws of Delaware, Revised Code, ed. of 1893, page 798, section 6, make printed copies of statutes of any other of the United States, purporting to be published under the authority of the respective governments, or commonly admitted and read as evidence in the courts, prima facie evidence of such laws.

Section 7 of the same provides that the common or unwritten law of any other of the United States may be proved by parol evidence as a fact, or by the reports of cases adjudged in those courts published by authority.

And section 8 makes the existence and the tenor or effect of all foreign laws provable as facts by parol evidence, but provides that if it appears that the law in question was contained in a written statute or code, the court may in its discretion reject the evidence which is not supported by a copy of such law.

Under the Revised Statutes of Florida, ed. of 1892, title 1, chapter 15, art. 2, section 1108, printed copies of the state laws of the United States, or of any of the states and territories, purporting to be published under the authority of the respective governments, or commonly admitted and read as evidence in their courts, are admitted in all courts and on all occasions as prima facie evidence of such laws.

By section 1107 of the same, the unwritten or common laws of the United States, or of any of the states or territories thereof, are provable as facts by parol evidence and by the books of reports of cases adjudged in their courts.

And by section 1108 of the same, the existence and tenor or effect of all foreign laws are provable as facts by parol evidence, provided it does not appear that the law in question is contained in a written statute or code, the court having power in such case in its own discretion to reject any evidence of such law not accompanied by a copy of such code or statute.

Under the Georgia Code of 1882, p. 904, § 3824, the laws of the United States and the several states, as published by authority, are entitled to judicial recognition without proof.

And by section 3825, foreign laws and judgments must be authenticated under the great seal of the respective states.

The public laws of a state as published by authority, or a duly certified copy thereof properly authenticated under the great seal of the state, are receivable in evidence as the laws of such state under sections 3771, 3772, of the Code of Georgia. Simms v. Southern Exp. Co. 38 Ga. 129.

The Revised Statutes of Idaho, ed. 1887, p. 680, title 1, chap. 3, § 5000, provide that books printed or published under the authority of a state, territory, or foreign country and purporting to contain the statutes, codes, or other written law of such state, territory, or country, or proved to be commonly not admissible in our courts to prove its statute law, but a properly authenticated copy was competent both in civil and criminal actions. State v. Twitty, 9 N. C. 441, 11 Am. Dec. 779; State v. Patterson, 24 N. C. 346, 38 Am. Dec. 699. Upon the principle that we have stated, it has been held by this court that a deed duly proved and registered is competent evidence to show the transfer of land, whenever it may become material to do so either in the trial of civil or criminal actions. State v. Shepherd, 30 N. C. 195.

It is conceded that, if the paper offered had been a properly authenticated copy of the record of marriage required to be kept in a sister state, it would have been competent in a criminal prosecution. But it is needless to pass upon the question whether authentiadmitted in the tribunals of such state, territory, or country as evidence of the written law thereof, are admissible as evidence of such law.

By section 5970 of the same, a copy of the written law or other public writing of any of the states, territories, or countries, attested by the certificate of the officer having charge of the original under the public seal of the state, is admissible as evidence of such law or writing.

And by section 5971, the oral testimony of witnesses skilled therein is admissible as evidence of the unwritten law of a state, other territory, or foreign country, as are also books of reports of decisions of the court of such, which are commonly admitted as evidence in such courts.

In Illinois, it is provided by section 10 of Starr & Curtis' Annotated Statutes of Illinois, vol. 1, p. 1080, that the printed statute books of the United States and of that state, and of the several states or the territories and late territories of the United States, purporting to be printed under the authority of the said United States and states or territories, are evidence in all courts and places in that state of the acts therein contained.

By section 11, an exemplification by the secretary of the state of the laws of the other state and territory, which have been or shall hereafter be, transmitted by order of the executive or legislation of such other state or territory to the governor of that state, and by him deposited in the office of the said secretary, are admissible as evidence in any court of the state.

And by section 12, books of reports and decisions of the supreme court, and of the courts of the United States and this state, and of the several states and territories thereof, purporting to be published by authority, may be read as evidence of the decisions of such court.

By section 437 of the Indiana Revised Statutes of 1883, printed statute books of the several states and territories of the United States, purporting to be printed under the authority of those states and territories, and any copy of any statute, or any part thereof contained therein having attached thereto the certificate of the secretary of state under seal of the state certificate, the copy to be complete and correct; the statute book from which the copy is taken deposited in the office of the secretary, or in the state library, and believed by him to have been received under the authority of the state or territory purporting to have enacted the same,—is presumptive evidence in all courts of the legislative acts, public or private, of those states or territories respectively.

By section 476 of the same, the unwritten or common law of any other of the United States, or of the territories thereof, may be proved as facts by parol evidence, and the books of reports of cases adjudged in those courts may also be admitted in evidence of such law.

And by section 477, the existence and tenor or effect of the laws of any foreign country may be proved as facts by parol evidence, but if it shall appear that the law in question is contained in a written statute or code, the court shall in its discretion reject any evidence of such law not accompanied by a copy thereof.

By section 499 of McClain's Code of Iowa, ed. 25 L. R. A.

1883, vol. 2, p. 1465, the printed copies of the statute laws of that or any court of the United States, or of congress, or of any foreign government, purporting or proved to have been published under the authority thereof, or proved to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing laws in the courts of such state or government, are admitted in the courts of that state as presumptive evidence.

Section 4970 makes the public seal of the state or county, affixed to a copy of the written laws or other public writings also admissible as evidence. The unwritten law of any other state or government may be proved as a fact by parol evidence, and also by the books of reports of cases adjudged in the other courts.

Section 4465 of the Annotated Statutes of Kansas, ed. 1899, vol. 2, p. 1410, makes the printed copies in volumes of statutes and codes, or other written laws enacted by any other state, territory, or foreign government, purporting or proved to have been published by the authority thereof, or proved to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing law in the court or tribunal of such state, territory, or government, admissible by the courts on all occasions as presumptive evidence.

The unwritten or common law of any other state, territory, or foreign government may be proved as facts by parol evidence, and the books of reports of cases adjudged in the courts may also be admitted as presumptive evidence of such laws, by virtue of the same authority.

By the third section of the Kentucky Act of February 11, 1809, 2 Digest Laws, 1115, it is provided, copies of any of the printed laws of any state or territory of the United States, which may have been heretofore, or may hereafter, be received in the secretary's office, and which shall have been printed under the authority of any such state or territory, when duly certified under the hand and seal of the secretary of state, shall be admitted and recorded as evidence of such law, in like manner with such printed copy, in any of the courts, or before any judicial officer, of that commonwealth.

By section 1440 of Voorhees' Revised Laws of Louisiana, ed. 1884, p. 230, the published statutes and digests of other states are receivable in the courts of that state as prima facie evidence of the state laws to which they refer.

Section 5 of the Louisiana Act of March 14, 1855 (Acts 1855, p. 209), declaring that the public statutes and digests of other states shall be received in the courts of that state as prima facie evidence of the statute laws of the state from which they purport to emanate, does not give the court power to take judicial notice of such statutes, its only object being to dispense with the necessity of procuring written exemplifications from the statutes of sister states. Anderson v. Folger, 11 La. Ann. 269.

Under the Revised Statutes of Maine, ed. 1883, p. 709, § 108, printed copies of statutes, acts, and resolves of the United States, or of that state, or any other state or territory of the United States, purporting to be published under the authority of the government, are admissible as evidence; those of the state being sufficient and those of other states prima facie evidence.

By section 109 foreign laws may be proved by parol evidence, but when such laws appear to ex-

-ated copies of marriage records of foreign countries would be competent evidence in any criminal case, since the paper admitted purports to be the original certificate of the rabbi, verified by the signature and seal of the official minister; and unless this court is bound to know the signature and seal of that official, and that he is the custodian of marriage records, the paper must be considered, not as a record, but merely as an original certificate offered in connection with the testimony of the witness that she was married to the defendant at the date mentioned in the paper, the appended writing being but the extraofficial statement of a private person. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 498, 498. At an early period of our national history, it was held that the record of a foreign court could not be set in a written statute or code, such evidence may be rejected unless accompanied by a copy of the code or statute. The unwritten law of any other state or territory of the United States may be proved by parol and by the books of reports of cases adjudged in such courts.

The Revised Statutes of Maryland, ed. 1888, vol. 1, p. 704, § 48, the public or private statutes of the United States, or of any state or territory, are receivable in evidence from a printed volume purporting to contain the statutes of the United States; the states, or territories, and such printed volume is receivable in all cases as evidence without further authentication or proof.

By the Massachusetts General Statutes of 1886, p. 908, § 71, printed copies of the statutes of any other state and of the United States, or of the territories thereof, if purporting to be published under the authority of their respective governments, or if commonly admitted and used as evidence in their courts, are to be admitted and read as evidence in the courts of that state as prima facie evidence.

By section 73 the unwritten or common law of any of the United States or territories are provable as facts by parol evidence and the books of reports of cases adjudged therein are also admissible as evidence of such laws.

By section 73, the existence, tenor, or effect of all foreign laws may be proved as facts by parol evidence, but if it appears that such law is contained in a written statute or code, the court has a discretion to reject such evidence if not accompanied by a copy of such statute.

By the Laws of Michigan, 2 Howell's Annotated Statutes, p. 1888, as amended by the Act of May 11, 1885, vol. 3, Howell's ed. p. 3724, § 7508, printed copies of the statute laws and resolves of any other state or territory, or of any foreign state, purporting to be published under the authority, or commonly admitted and received as evidence in the courts thereof, are to be admitted in evidence in all proceedings within the state as prima facie evidence of such laws and resolves.

By section 7509 of volume 2 of the same statutes, the unwritten or common law of any other of the United States or territories, or any foreign state or country, are provable as facts by parol evidence, and the books of reports of adjudged cases are also admissible as evidence of such laws.

Under the General Statutes of Minnesota, ed. 1878, vol. 1, p. 800, title 7, chap. 73, § 53, the unwritten or common law of any state or territory of the United States is provable as a fact by parol evidence, the books of reports of cases adjudged in their courts being admissible in evidence.

By section 59 of the same statutes, the existence and tenor or effect of all foreign laws must be proved as facts by parol evidence, but if such laws are contained in a written statute or code, the court may in its discretion reject any evidence that is not accompanied by a copy thereof.

By section 2693 of the Mississippi Revised Code, it is provided that transcripts of acts of congress, or of the statutes of any state or territory of the United States, certified by the secretary of this state as being deposited in his office, and public or private statutes, or the proceedings of any legis-tive body, purporting on the face of the book to be printed by authority of the government, state, or territory are evidence without further proof.

Under the Revised Statutes of Missouri, ed. 1880, vol. 1, p. 1022, § 4831, the printed statute books of sister states, and the several territories of the United States, purporting to be printed by authority, are evidence of the legislative acts of such state or territory.

By section 4832, printed copies of the same are prima facie evidence, if certified by the secretary of state of such state, or of that state, to be a true copy under the hand and seal of such secretary, such certificate being set out in full on the title page.

By section 4832, the printed books of cases adjudged in the courts of sister states are admissible as evidence of the unwritten or common law.

By section 306 of the Code of Civil Procedure of Nebraska, printed copies in volumes of statutes, codes, or other written law enacted by any other territory, state, or foreign government, purporting or proved to have been published by authority, or proved to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing laws thereof, are to be admitted on all occasions as presumptive evidence of such laws. The unwritten or common law may be proved as facts by parol evidence, and the books of reports may also be admitted as presumptive evidence of such law.

By the New York Act of March 27, 1804, section 1, it is provided that all records and exemplifications of office books, kept in any public office of any state not appertaining to a court, shall be proved or admitted in any other court or office in any other state, by the attestations of the keeper of any such records, and the seal of his office thereto annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the presiding judge of the court in which such officer is or may be kept, or of the governor that such attestation is in due form, and by the proper officer, and such certificate, if given by the presiding justice, shall be further authenticated by the clerk, who shall certify under hand and seal of office that the presiding justice is duly commissioned and qualified. Markoe v. Aldrich, 1 Abb. Pr. 55.

Section 942 of Bliss' New York Annotated Code, vol. 1, art. 3, p. 764, provides "a printed copy of a statute or other written law of another state, or of a territory, or of a foreign country, or a printed copy of a proclamation, edict, decree, or ordinance by the executive power thereof, contained in a book or publication purporting or proved to have been published by the authority thereof, or proved to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing law in the judicial tribunals thereof, is presumptive evidence of the statute law, proclamation, edict, decree, or ordinance. The unwritten or common law of another state, or of a territory, or of a foreign country, may be proved as a fact by oral evidence. The books of reports of cases adjudged in the courts thereof may also be admitted as presumptive evidence of the unwritten or common law thereof. The Act of Congress of 1790 provides that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States, by the authenticated by the signature of even an American consul resident in such country. Church v. Hubbard, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 187, 2 L. ed. 249. And subsequently a statute was passed which empowered and made it the duty of a consul of this government to keep a record of marriages celebrated in his presence, and send copies to a specified office in this country. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4082.

attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form. Markoe v. Aldrich, 1 Abb. Fr. 55.

Section 1838 of the Code of North Carolina, provides a printed copy of a statute, or other written law, of another state, or of a territory, or of a foreign country, or a printed copy of a proclamation, edict, decree, or ordinance, by the executive thereof, contained in a book or publication, purporting or proved to have been published by the authority thereof, or proved to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing law in the judicial tribunals, shall be evidence of the statute, law, proclamation, edict, decree, or ordinance. The unwritten or common law of another state, or of a territory, or of a foreign country, may be proved as a fact by oral evidence. The books of the reports of cases in the courts thereof, shall also be admitted as evidence of the unwritten or common law thereof. And every party may also exhibit a copy of the law of such state, territory, or foreign country, duly certified by the secretary of state of this state as having been copied from a printed volume of the laws of such state, territory, or country, on file in the state library, or in the office of the governor or secretary of state.

Section 5244 of volume 2 of the Ohio Revised Statutes, ed. 1891, p. 1223, provides that printed copies of written laws enacted by any other state or territory, or by a foreign government, purporting or proved to be published by authority, or proved to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing law in the courts of such state or territory, or government, are admissible as evidence by the courts and officers of that state as presumptive evidence of such laws. The unwritten or common law of any other state or territory, or foreign government, are provable as facts by parol evidence, and the books of reports of cases adjudged in such courts are also admissible as presumptive evidence.

Section 717 of the Oregon Code provides that the oral testimony of witnesses skilled in the laws of a foreign country is admissible as evidence of the unwritten law of a sister state or foreign country, as are also printed and published books of reports of decisions of courts of such state or country. State v. Looke, 7 Or. 54.

Under the above section of the code, it was held that historical works, books of science or art are not evidence of such laws under section 748 of the code which makes historical works, books of science or art, published maps or charts made by persons indifferent between the parties, prima facie evidence of facts of general notoriety and interest. Ibid.

By the Rhode Island Public Statutes, ed. 1893, p. 599, § 44, a copy of the statutes of another state or country purporting to be published by authority, and the published ordinances of any town in that state, and the published reports of decisions of such courts, are admissible in the courts of that state as prima facie evidence of the laws of the state under whose authority they purport to be published.

By section 422 of the Code of Civil Procedure of South Carolina, ed. 1882, p. 120, printed copies in

If the paper offered is not competent, because not properly authenticated as an official record, it was not admissible at all as documentary evidence of the marriage, because, as was said in People v. Lambert, supra, a certificate merely signed by a minister, while, perhaps, it may avail in civil proceedings, if properly supported, cannot avail in criminal cases, where the defendant volumes of statutes, codes, or other written laws enacted by any other sovereignty, state, or territory, or foreign government, purporting or proved to have been published by the authority thereof, or to be commonly admitted as evidence in their courts, are admissible as presumptive evidence. The unwritten or common law of any other sovereignty, state or territory, or foreign government, are provable as facts by parol evidence, and the books of reports of cases adjudged in such courts are also admissible as presumptive evidence.

Sections 4550 to 4559 inclusive, of chapter 3, of the Code of Tennessee, ed. of 1884, p. 883, provide for the proof of foreign written laws in the courts of that state.

By article 2250 of the Revised Statutes of Texas, ed. 1890, vol. 1, p. 723, the printed statute books of such state, of the United States, of the District of Columbia, or any state or territory of the United States, or any foreign government purporting to be printed with authority, are admissible as evidence.

Under the Compiled Laws of Utah, § 431, ed. of 1876, p. 520, printed copies in volumes of state statutes, codes or other written laws enacted by any state or territory, or foreign government purporting or proved to have been published by the authority thereof, or to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing law in the courts of such tribunal, are admissible on all occasions as presumptive evidence.

By the Code of Virginia, ed. 1887, p. 738, § 3330, copies of the statutes of the United States printed by authority, and copies of the statutes of any state or territory so printed, are receivable as prima facie evidence.

By section 1684 of Hill's Annotated Statutes and Codes of Washington, vol. 2, p. 634, ed. 1891, printed copies of the statute laws of any state, territory, or foreign government purporting to be published with authority, are admissible as presumptive evidence.

The Code of West Virginia, ed. 1892, chap 12, § 4, p. 122, provides that whenever it is material to ascertain what the law, statutory or other, of another state or country, or of the United States, is or was, the court, judge, or magistrate shall take judicial notice thereof, and may consult any printed book purporting to contain, state, or explain the same, and consider any testimony, information, or argument that is offered on the subject.

Under the Statutes of Wisconsin, Sanborn and Berryman's Annotated Statutes, vol. 2, p. 2141, § 4136, printed copies of the statute laws, and all acts and resolves of congress of the United States, or of the legislature of any state or territory purporting to be published under authority, if commonly admitted and read as evidence in the courts thereof, are admissible as presumptive evidence in that state.

By section 4138, the unwritten or common law of any state or territory is provable as a fact by parol evidence, and the books of reported cases are also evidence of such laws.

The Revised Statutes of Wyoming, ed. 1887, chap. 3, § 2592, provide that printed copies of written law enacted by any other state and territory, or a foreign government purporting or proved to have is entitled to confront his witnesses. Gainey v. Relf, 58 U. S. 13 How. 472, 18 L. ed. 1071. The defendant was accused of an infamous crime, and in such cases it was said by Pearson, Ch. J., in State v. Thomas, 64 N. O. 76, that the word "confront" was intended, not simply to secure to the defendant "the privilege of examining witnesses in his behalf," but was "in affirmance of the rule of common law that in trials by jury the witness must be present before the jury and accused, so that he may be confronted; that is, put face to face." In that case the state offered certain entries made by a station agent in the books of a railroad company, when said agent was in the state of Virginia, to show that the cotton, in reference to which it was charged that a perjury had been committed, been published by the authority thereof, or to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing law in the courts thereof, are to be admitted on all occasions as presumptive evidence. The written or common law may be proved as facts by parol evidence, the books of reports of cases being admitted as presumptive evidence thereof.

By the acts of congress, it is provided that the acts of the legislatures of the several states and territories shall be authenticated by having the seal of the respective states affixed thereto; and by the Texas statute it is declared that the printed statute books of the several states and territories of the United States, purporting to have been printed under the authority of such states and territories, and a certified copy under seal of the secretary of this state, and of any act or resolution contained in the printed statute books of any state or territory of the United States, purporting to be printed under the authority of such state or territory, which is deposited in the office of the secretary of state, shall be evidence in like manner. Martin v. Payne, 11 Tex. 232.

The English Statute, 24 & 25 Vict., chap. 11, gives power to the court, when they have before them a suit involving the law of a foreign country, to cause a statement of the facts or a special case to be prepared and submitted to one of the courts of that country for the decision and certificate of the foreign law; and so reciprocally of questions arising in other countries involving the law of England.

VIII. The English doctrine.

It is a rule of English law that no knowledge of foreign law is to be imputed to the judge. Nelson v. Bridport, 7 Beav. 527, 10 Jur. 371.

A question of foreign law being one of fact, must be decided in each case on evidence adduced in it, and not by a decision or by evidence adduced in another case, although similarly circumstanced. McCormick v. Garnett, 5 De G. M. & G. 273, 18 Jur. 413, 23 L. J. Ch. 777.

Foreign laws and their application must be proved as facts as proved, by appropriate evidence of properly qualified witnesses, or by witnesses who can state from their own knowledge and experience, gained by study and practice, not only what are the words in which the law is expressed, but also what is the proper interpretation of those words, and the legal meaning and effect of them as applied to the case in question. Nelson v. Bridport, supra.

Foreign laws, not written, are to be proved by the parol examination of witnesses of competent skill. Buchanan v. Rucker, 1 Campb. 63, 9 East, 126; Millar v. Heinrich, 4 Campb. 155.

By parol evidence of a witness learned in the laws of the country. De Bode v. Beganam, 10 Jur. 217, 8 Q. B. 203.

A professional or official witness giving evidence as to foreign law, may refer to foreign law books to refresh his memory, or to correct or confirm his opinion, but the law itself must be taken from his evidence. The Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 85, 114, 8 Jur. 793.

In Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 3 Hagg. Const. Rep. 54, 81, Lord Stowell, in enumerating the authorities to prove the Scotch law of marriage, mentioned the opinions of learned professors, opinions of eminent writers, as delivered in books of great legal credit and weight, and certified adjudications of the tribunals of Scotland upon these subjects.

A question of Scotch law being one of fact, is not to be decided by authority but by the evidence. McCormick v. Garnett, supra.

Witnesses, in giving their testimony on foreign law, may refer to laws or treatises for the purpose of aiding their memory upon the subject of their examination, but in general it is the testimony of the witness, and not the authority of the law or of the text-writer detached from the testimony of the witness, which is to influence the judge. Nelson v. Bridport, 8 Beav. 527, 10 Jur. 371.

In The Sussex Peerage Case, supra, the lord chancellor stated that the witness came within the description of a person peritus virtute officii, and Lord Langdale intimated that his evidence was of the nature of that of a judge.

The written laws of foreign states can only be proved by copies properly authenticated. Millar v. Heinrich, 4 Campb. 155; Ganer v. Lanesborough, Peake, N. P. 25.

To prove the acts of state of a foreign government, copies should be produced and examined by the public archives abroad. Richardson v. Anderson, 1 Campb. 65, note a.

In the above case, a book purporting to be a collection of the treaties concluded by America, declared to be published by authority there as a regular copy of the archives in Washington, which would have been performed by the American minister a resident in England, was refused as evidence, the court holding that it was necessary to have a copy examined with the archives in America. Ibid.

A party is not bound to produce a written law or decree referred to by his witness in proving the law. Nelson v. Bridport, supra.

In Clegg v. Levy, 3 Campb. 166, the law of a foreign country requiring a stamp to the validity of an instrument being a written law, was held to be proven by an authenticated copy.

Where a Spanish law book, made out to be the laws of Spain, was produced, it was held there would be no difficulty in having it stated as the law in a special verdict. Picton's Case, 30 How. St. Tr. 462.

The general written opinion as to a foreign law given by two jurists, exhibited by them on examination and verified as the law of a foreign country, was held receivable in evidence. Nelson v. Bridport, supra.

An advocate of France, having stated that the feudal law affecting the matter in question ceased in Alsace in a certain year by a decree of the national assembly, and that he had become acquainted with that decree in the course of his study of the law, may be asked as to the contents of it. De Bode v. Beganam, 10 Jur. 217, 8 Q. B. 203.

A hotel keeper, a native of Belgium who stated that he formerly carried on the business of a merchant and commissioner of stocks in Brussels, was allowed to prove the law of Belgium on the subject of the presentment of a promissory note made in that country payable at a particular place. Vander Donckt v. Thellusson, 8 C. B. 312.

had been received by the defendant. The books were kept by the company as evidence of the conduct of its business, and were identified; but the statements recorded in them were, when offered on behalf of the prosecution, but the written declarations of the agent. His testimony was the highest evidence of the transaction, but could be heard, without the consent of the accused, only when delivered visa voce in his presence. But, while the paper was not admissible as a record or an independent declaration of the rabbi, we think it was made pertinent and competent evidence, even in a criminal prosecution, by the testimony of the witness that it was given to her at the very time of the marriage. While the certificate thus given may tend, when admitted to support the testimony of the witness to the fact of marriage, it is competent only as a part of the res gestæ; being a declaration made in the presence of the defendant, and accompanying the act of solemnizing the rite, if it did not constitute a part of the ceremony. 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 1006. It is true that the criminal act charged was the second marriage, but evidence of words or acts accompanying and reflecting light on any transaction which becomes material in the progress of a trial is admissible as res gestæ. 1 Roscoe, Crim. Ev. *26; Best, Ev. 668. It would have been competent for the witness to have repeated all that was said by the rabbi in celebrating the rite. It was equally admissible to show his declaration, oral or written, in the presence of both, that they were lawfully married, as an immediate result of what was done. 21 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 99, 103, note 1. The paper was admitted on the trial as corroborative, not as substantive,

In The Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 85, 115, it was stated to be perfectly clear that the particular mode of proving a foreign law, was not by showing to the house the book of the law for the house had not organs to know and to deal with the text of that law, and therefore required the assistance of a lawyer who knew how to interpret it.

The laws of a foreign country on a given subject may be proved by any person who, though not a lawyer, or a person who by reason of his having filled any public office, may be presumed to be acquainted with the law, or has been in a position to render it probable that he would make himself acquainted with it. Vander Donckt v. Thellusson, supra.

Where an instrument under the seal of the synagogue in a foreign country was produced for the purpose of proving a divorce, it was held no evidence, as before such document could be received it must be shown what the laws of the country were, and they must be proved by a witness. Ganer v. Lanesborough, Peake, N. P. 25.

In Ganer v. Lanesborough, supra, it was held that a Jewess might be permitted to give parol evidence of her own divorce in a foreign country, according to the custom of the Jews there.

A Roman Catholic bishop, holding the office of coadjutor to a vicar apostolic in this country is by virtue of that office to be considered as a person skilled in the matrimonial law of Rome, and therefore admissible as a witness to prove that law. The Sussex Peerage Case, supra.

Where the witness was in a position of importance, engaged in the performance of important and responsible public duties and connected with them, and in order to discharge them properly was bound to make himself acquainted with the subject of the law of marriage, his evidence was said to be the nature of that of a judge and competent. Ibid.

In Reg. v. Dent, 1 Car. & K. 97, it was held that a witness, called to prove the Scotch law of marriage, need not necessarily be at all connected with the legal profession, and the evidence of a person who stated he was born and educated in Scotland and lived there for twenty years, and was acquainted with the Scotch law of marriage, was held sufficient.

The above case was, however, expressly overruled in The Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 85, 184.

In Williams v. Williams, 3 Beav. 547, the question as to the right of parties under Scotch settlement was referred to a master to inquire as to the construction of the Scotch law, the master founding his report on the opinion of the Scotch advocates, 25 L. R. A.

upon which the court acted and ordered accordingly.

Where an application was made for the payment of funds out of court belonging to a Scotch married woman, the affidavit of a witness describing himself as an advocate practicing in the supreme court of Scotland, stating his acquaintance with the Scotch laws and that he had investigated the matter and that the Scotch law did not affect the fund, was received in evidence in Re Todd, Shand v. Kidd, 19 Beav. 582.

A petition supported by an affidavit of a Scotch advocate, as to the law of Scotland in respect to the personal estate of the wife vesting absolutely in the husband without any equity to a settlement attaching, was allowed in Hitchcock v. Clendinning, 12 Beav. 584, 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 238.

In an action for infringement of a copyright in a foreign work, a witness, expert in the law of a foreign country, was called to prove such law, and the court held that the proper course in such a case was to call the witness, who was expert in the law, and ask him on his own responsibility what the law was, and not to read any fragments of a code. Cooks v. Purday, 2 Car. & K. 209.

Where on a prosecution for bigamy, a female witness stated that she was present at the marriage ceremony which was performed in a private house in Scotland, by a minister of some religious denomination, that she herself was married in the same way, and that it was usual for people to marry in private houses in Scotland, the court rejected her testimony, holding her not a competent witness to prove the Scotch law. Reg. v. Povey, 17 Jur. 120, Deara, C. C. 82, 23 L. J. M. C. 19.

In Goods of Bonell, 1 Prob. Div. 63, 45 L. J. P. 42, 24 L. T. N. S. 32, 24 Week: Rep. 255, evidence of the foreign law, with reference to the position of a curator of the dormant inheritance of the deceased, was required, and a witness who described himself as a certified special pleader and as familiar with the Indian law, made an affidavit used in evidence. The court held that the laws of a foreign country could not be proved even by a juris consult, if his knowledge of it be derived solely from his having studied it at a university in another country. In that case there was nothing to show that the witness had any knowledge of the Italian law, but from the study of it in England, and his evidence was therefore rejected.

In Goods of Dost Aly Khan, 6 Prob. Div. 6, 49 L. J. P. 78, 29 Week: Rep. 80, in the case of a probate of a will of a Persian subject, the court allowed the affidavit of a person who deposed to the Persian law, who from his position satisfied the court that he was competent to give evidence. evidence. There is no principle upon which such testimony, amenable to the constitutional objection which we have discussed, if offered as substantive evidence, can be permitted to go to the jury in corroboration of a direct witness to the main point to which it relates. A declaration excluded by the constitution, as in violation of individual right, will not be allowed to accomplish indirectly what it is not permitted to do directly,—lead a jury to believe that a marriage was celebrated, when the guilt of the accused hinges upon the question of its solemnization.

We have been led into this discussion because it is important to understand clearly how this declaration is admissible, under the peculiar circumstances, while it would ordinarily be excluded on the trial of criminal prosecutions, as hearsay, or for the reason that it falls within the constitutional inhibition imposed for the protection of persons accused of crime. The defendant has no just ground for complaint, if the jury were allowed to consider a paper which was admissible as a part of the transaction only for the purpose of corroborating the witness to the fact of the marriage.

Clark, J., concurring:

There was objection to Album testifying, but no exception was taken, nor is any ground assigned for the objection. If the objection was that he was not sufficiently qualified as an expert, the finding of the judge below is conclusive. State v. Davis, 68 N. C. 578; Smith v. Kron, 96 N. C. 392; State v. Hinson, 108 N. C. 374; State v. Brady, 107 N. C. 822. He is presumed to have so found, if the witness was admitted as an expert. If the objection was that the witness was not an expert, that ground is not assigned, and the court is not to presume that there was error. In truth, however, the Code (sec. 1338, providing that the common law of another state or country may be proved as a fact by oral evidence) would seem to indicate that expert evidence would not be requisite. If so, when the witness testified that he knew the law as to marriage among the Jews in Russia, he was competent to testify what it was; leaving his credibility to be tested by a cross-examination as to his means of information, whether he had lived in Russia, etc. It does not appear that he had not lived there, and his testimony would indicate that he had. But, if he had not, it would have remained for the jury to say what credit should be given to his evidence. He may have acquired such knowledge by reading or otherwise, just as the same witness was admitted as a competent interpreter of German and Chaldaic without showing that he had lived either in Germany or Chaldea.

Shepherd, Ch. J., dissenting:

I cannot assent to the broad proposition that any person who simply professes to have knowledge of the unwritten laws of a foreign country, and who merely states that he has had an opportunity of learning them, is a competent witness in respect to their requirements as to the celebration of marriages, or the entering into other contracts. Our statute, providing that such laws "may be proved as a fact by oral evidence," is but in affirmance of a general principle laid down in the works on Evidence (1 Greenl. Ev. 486; 1 Whart. Ev. 803), and very clearly does not change in the slightest degree the existing rules as to the competency of witnesses by which such laws are to be established. This is plainly manifest by the declaration of this court in Moore v. Gwynn, 27 N. C. 187 (a case decided long after the statute was enacted), that "the existence of such a law could be proved only by the opinions of persons learned in that law." It would, it seems to me, be a novel thing, in our jurisprudence, to allow a plaintiff suing in the courts of North Carolina upon a contract made in another state or country to testify not only to the terms of the contract, but also to the lex loci contractus, upon his bare statement that he is familiar with such law. In the decisions of this court it will be seen that only professional witnesses have been examined; but the rule in this respect has been relaxed to some extent in other jurisdictions, and it has been laid down, as stated in American L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Roseagle, 77 Pa. 514 (cited in the opinion of the court), that "the law of a foreign country on a given subject may be proved by any person who, though not a lawyer, or not having filled a public office, is or has been in a position to render it probable that he would make himself acquainted with it."

This view seems to have been adopted by many of the courts, but it is surely no authority in support of the rule as stated in the opinion in this case. In the case above mentioned there was much more than the statement of the witness that he was familiar with the laws of a foreign country. He was a resident of that country, and he testified that he was the Catholic dean and parson at Odenheim, and that, as such, he was the proper custodian of the records of births, baptisms, marriages, and deaths of the parish. He was permitted to testify that the records had been kept according to the laws of the country. The court said: "It was his duty to know, and he testified that he did know, the law relating to the records in his charge. His knowledge was just that which the responsible head of a public office would be assumed to have of the law which had controlled the past operations of his department." Equally inapplicable, I think, is the point of decision in Pickard v. Bailey, 26 N. H. 171, the other case cited in the opinion. In that case the witness had acted as a magistrate in Canada, and had also been extensively engaged in mercantile business there, and, in such employment, had become acquainted with the law in relation to notarial instruments. He was held competent to testify that it was the sworn duty of every notary not to suffer any original paper executed before him to be taken out of his custody, and that notarial instruments are received in all the courts in Canada without further proof of the execution of the original. These cases are similar in principle to those cited in

Rogers on Expert Testimony. That author states that, "in order to prove the law of a foreign country, it is necessary that the witnesses produced to testify in respect to it should be more than ordinarily capable of speaking upon the subject." Section 96. And the cases cited by him also establish the proposition that the knowledge must be acquired in the foreign country. Section 100. See also, 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 1123.

Applying these principles to the present case, I am very certain that the testimony of the witness Alburn should not have been received. All that the witness stated as to his competency was "that he was familiar with the law of marriages among the Jews in Russia." He does not state how he acquired such knowledge, nor does it appear that he was ever in Russia in his life. For aught that appears in the record, he may have been born and raised in the county of Edgecombe, and it is not pretended that he witnessed the marriage. His testimony, therefore, is opinion evidence, only; and I am unable to see why any other resident of said county is not as competent to testify to the law of Russia, provided he simply states that he is familiar with its laws. Had this witness testified to the fact of the marriage, and that it was solemnized in the manner usual and customary in Russia, by a person duly authorized to celebrate the rites of matrimony, and the parties afterwards lived together as man and wife, his testimony would have been competent; and it would have been unnecessary to offer any further evidence of the law, in order to establish the marriage. 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 1123. And there is almost authority, remarks Mr. Bishop (Mar. & Div. 1124), "for saying that any inhabitant of a foreign country may be a witness to its marriage laws, because, as judicially observed Wotrich v. Freeman, 71 N. Y. 601, 'all residents of a country, of marriageable age and ordinary understanding, are familiar with the usual and customary forms of marriage.' The contrary was held in England, but the rule would seem to be in the line of public convenience and policy." However this may be, it is not applicable to this case, as we have seen that, notwithstanding the defendant's objection, the witness was not qualified in any way to testify as to the laws of Russia, nor was it shown that he was a Russian, or that he was ever in that country. Without discussing the subject further, I conclude that, under the most liberal rules to be found in the text-books or decided cases, the witness Alburn was incompetent, and that his testimony should have been excluded. I am also of the opinion that the general proposition that not only the law of marriage, but all other unwritten laws, can be proved in such a loose and unsatisfactory manner, is dangerous in its consequences, and contrary to our own decisions, as well as the consensus of judicial authority.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

CANADIAN PACIFIC R. CO., Plff. in Err.,

William JOHNSTON.

(61 Fed. Rep. 733.)

1. A conductor of a freight train having exclusive control thereof in relation to other employes acting under him, on the train directing its movements, occupies the position of a vice-principal toward a brakeman injured by such conductor's suddenly ordering the train to start while the brakeman was in a position of danger.
2. A statute of a foreign country providing that a cause of action for personal injuries shall be absolutely extinguished in one year, will not operate as a defense to a suit in the United States, where the injured person left such country before such statute became operative by the expiration of the year.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Vermont to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from negligence for which defendant was responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Wallace, Lacombe, and Shipman, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Joel C. Baker and Frank E. Alfred, for plaintiff in error:

Where, upon the trial, there is no sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the railroad company to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff, the court should direct a verdict for defendant.

If the existence of such a law amounts to no defense, the plaintiff below might have demurred; but having taken issue on the fact, the court are not called upon to decide whether the facts so put in issue amount to a defense. The judge on a jury trial is never to decide on the pleadings.

When a matter of defense is controverted, it is error to direct the jury that the evidence produced is insufficient to bar the action, and that the jury ought to find for the plaintiff. Messrs. Henry Ballard, Gilbert A. Davis, and A. K. Brown for defendant in error.

Shipman, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

William Johnston, the defendant in error (hereinafter called the plaintiff), brought an action at law in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Vermont against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant), to recover damages for injuries which he had received while in its employ, and, as he alleged, through its negligence. He recovered a verdict for $8,125. The facts in the case, as they appear in the bill of exceptions, are as follows:

The defendant is, and was at the time of the injury to the plaintiff, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the dominion of Canada, and having its place of business in said Canada, and at the time of the injury to the plaintiff was operating a railroad in Canada, which extended to, and ran into, the state of Vermont. The conductor and trainmen, and the plaintiff, who were running the train upon which the plaintiff was employed at the time he received said injury, were in the employ of the defendant. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant at Farnham, in Canada, about January 1, 1890. He worked a short time in the railroad yard in Farnham under said employment, and then went to work as a brakeman on freight trains, and remained in that service, continuously, up to the time of the injury for which the action was brought. At about half past 10 o'clock in the forenoon of September 6, 1890, the train upon which the plaintiff was employed as a brakeman left Newport, Vt., for Montreal. It consisted of an engine, tender, 18 freight cars, and a van, having a platform, with roof projecting over it, and a brake. Four or five of the freight cars were loaded, and the remainder of said cars were empty. Samuel Gillander was the conductor of said train, and Arthur Pinney was the forward brakeman, and the plaintiff the rear brakeman. Said conductor, said two brakemen, an engineer, and a fireman constituted the entire crew or force of employés upon said train, and the conductor had full control of all the men on the train. At Sutton Junction, in Canada, the plaintiff fell or was thrown from the top of the rear end of the rear freight car of the train, between the tracks, and was run over or upon by the van, and was badly injured. The testimony on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that before reaching Sutton Junction, and while the train was about to commence the descent of a grade down to that station, the plaintiff left the van, where he had been riding, to go to his place on the top of cars; the conductor told him that certain cars were to be set out at Sutton Junction, and where to cut them off, or pull the pin; that the cars to be set out were pretty near together, and would not require much shunting to set them off upon the side track; that the plaintiff forgot where he was to pull the pin to set out the cars, and went to the rear end of the last freight car, and asked the conductor, who stood on the front platform of the van, if a tall car in the train was to be set out; that in reply to that question of the plaintiff the conductor told the plaintiff to go and get the number of the car; that thereupon the plaintiff went forward, and looked down between the cars, and read the number, and immediately went back over the two intervening cars to tell the conductor the number of the car; that when he got within four or five feet of the rear end of the last freight car, which had no brake at that end, the train started up, without any warning to him, and went forward five or six feet, with a quick snap, and the plaintiff could not reach the van, which had been detached, nor otherwise save himself, and was by the jerk of the train thrown off, and fell upon the track in front of the van, which was slowly following the train; that the van struck the plaintiff, and ran partly over him, and he received the injuries for which he claims to recover in this action. The evidence of the plaintiff tended to show that Gillander, the conductor, as the rear of the train approached the station, pulled the pin connecting the van to the rear end of the last freight car, and applied the brake upon the van; that at the time he pulled the pin he signaled to the engineer to go ahead, without notifying the plaintiff, as he had always done before; and that it was the starting of the train in obedience to the signal of the conductor, given without notice to the plaintiff, when going to give the conductor the number of the car, in obedience to the orders of the conductor, that threw the plaintiff from the train. The evidence of the plaintiff further tended to show that at the time the van was detached the plaintiff was on the top of the freight cars, and entirely out of the sight of the conductor, and that he did not know the van was detached, or that the conductor had given any signal to go ahead, until the train started, by which he was thrown off, and that the conductor gave him no notice or warning that he was going to detach the van, or start up the train. The evidence of the plaintiff further tended to show that his place, as rear brakeman, at the time of said accident, was at the front end of the rear car, and that he was away from his position only for the purpose of going back to the rear end of the car, to tell the conductor the number of the car he had directed him to get. The plaintiff also put in evidence several of the rules of the defendant for the running of its trains, one of which read as follows:

"(92) While on the road, the conductor will have charge and control of the train and all persons employed on it, and is responsible for its movements; but when the directions of the conductor conflict with these regulations, and involve any risk or hazard, the engineer, and all who participate, will be held equally responsible."

There was no other evidence tending to show any facts of negligence of the defendant or its employes which were in any manner connected with the injuries to the plaintiff.

The evidence of the defendant tended to show that before the plaintiff left the van, at the top of the grade, as the train approached Sutton Junction, the conductor, Gillander, gave the plaintiff a written list of the number of the cars to be set from the train upon the side track, and that there was no further communication between Gillander and the plaintiff until after the injury, except what Gillander said to him when he detached the van; that Gillander supposed that the plaintiff went directly to his place on the train when he left the van; that after the van was detached it was the duty of the plaintiff, as rear brakeman, to detach the cars to be set out; that, as the rear of the train approached the station, Gillander pulled the pin which detached the van from the rest of the train, and said "All right" to the plaintiff, who he supposed was on the front end of the next car to the van; that the plaintiff was in fact standing near the rear end of said car, facing towards the engine; that as the van was detached the plaintiff signaled the engineer to go ahead, and that the train started forward in obedience to the signal of the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff fell or was thrown off as the train started.

The plaintiff testified that he was twenty-six years of age, and an unmarried man; that his father was dead, and his mother lived at White River Junction, Vt.; that in 1887 he went into the employ of the defendant, in Canada, and worked as a brakeman there for three days; that in 1888 he again went to work for defendant, in Canada, and worked two months, and commenced work again for the defendant in January, 1890, and worked until the accident, September 6, 1890; that, in the intervals of working for the defendant, he had worked upon a farm some, and in a foundry; that after the accident he remained at Sutton Junction until April, A. D. 1891, when he went to his mother's house, at White River Junction, where he had ever since remained; that he called it his home at his mother's house, and had no other.

This suit was commenced by a writ dated November 6, 1891. Upon the issue made by defendant's plea that the plaintiff's cause of action was extinguished by the law of Canada, the evidence of the defendant, given by the testimony of witnesses learned and of experience in that law, tended to show that the law of Canada was as specified in articles 2262 and 2267 of the Code of Canada:

"Art. 2262. The following actions are prescribed in one year: For slander or libel, reckoned from the day it came to the knowledge of the party aggrieved. For bodily injuries, saving the special provisions contained in article 1056, and cases regulated by special laws."

"Art. 2267. In all cases mentioned in articles 2250, 2260, 2261, and 2262, the debt is absolutely extinguished and no action can be maintained after the delay for prescription has expired."

The testimony of defendant likewise tended to show that, by the law of Canada, article 25 L. R. A.

1056 had no reference to the facts of this case, and that the claim of the plaintiff was not regulated by any special laws, and that, by said law of Canada, claims for bodily injuries are extinguished after the lapse of one year from and after the time when the plaintiff receives the injuries, but that the prescription is interrupted by any acknowledgment which the possessor or the debtor makes of the right of the person against whom the prescription runs, and a debt or claim may be revived after the prescription has run, by acknowledgment, without any new consideration.

At the close of all the evidence, the defendant moved the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, because there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant; also, because Gillander, the said conductor, and the plaintiff, at the time of the alleged injury to the plaintiff, were engaged in the same service and employment, and were fellow servants, and the defendant was not liable in law for any injury resulting to the plaintiff from the negligence of Gillander; and also that from all the evidence received, relating to the issue made upon the defendant's pleas as to the law of Canada, the defendant was not liable in this action. The court overruled said motion to direct a verdict, and submitted said cause to the jury. The court held that said law of Canada was a statute of limitation, and did not apply to this action here, and was immaterial, and that no question arose thereon for the consideration of the jury. The defendant excepted to the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, and to the submission to the jury, and to the holding of the court as to the law of Canada. The defendant seasonably excepted to the rule of liability laid down in the charge, for the several reasons set forth in its motion for a verdict.

There was no suggestion upon the trial of incompetence on the part of the conductor. Although the question of his negligence was in dispute before the jury, it was substantially conceded upon the argument before this court that, as between the brakeman and himself, he was negligent, in too hastily detaching the van from the residue of the train, and signaling to the engineer to go ahead, before he was aware that the brakeman had returned, and was in his usual place of safety. There was no negligence in the order to obtain the number of the tall car. That was given to remedy the brakeman's forgetfulness of the details of a previous order. The conductor was not, therefore, responsible for the fact that the brakeman happened to be in a place of danger. If the engineer had suddenly, and without authority, started the train, the conductor would not have been blameworthy. His negligence consisted in causing the train to be put in motion before he was aware that the brakeman had regained a place of safety. His hasty action caused the accident.

The jury having found in the affirmative upon the question of negligence, two questions of law arise upon the record: First, Is the defendant liable for the consequences resulting to the plaintiff, a brakeman upon the freight train, from the negligence of the competent conductor upon the same train, in a matter in which he was acting as conductor? Second. Was the cause of action extinguished before suit was brought, by the operation of the Canadian statute?

The decision of the first question depends, in this court, entirely upon the fact that the circumstances of this case correspond with, and do not differ from, those which controlled the decision of the Supreme Court in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 877, 28 L. ed. 787, and are within the narrow scope to which the majority of the court confined that decision,—a decision which, notwithstanding what was said and decided in the subsequent case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 868, 87 L. ed. 772, still, admittedly, remains the law of the court, as applicable to the same state of facts. In the Ross Case, a conductor of a freight train, while he was running the train, possessed the powers specified in the regulations of the company, of which the following is a part: "The conductor will have charge and control of the train, and of all persons employed in it, and is responsible for its movements, while on the road, except when his directions conflict with these regulations, or involve any risk or hazard, in which case the engineer will also be held responsible."

It was the conductor's express duty to show to the engineer of his train all orders which he received in regard to its movement, before leaving the station where they were received. On the night of the accident, the conductor forgot to tell the engineer of an order which had been received, to stop the train at a certain station, and wait for a gravel train; and in consequence a collision occurred, by which the engineer was severely injured. The action was brought against the railroad company to recover damages for this injury. The majority of the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Field, after an examination of the English decisions, and of the course of conflicting decisions in the states of this country, and of the reasoning which led to the respective results, came to a conclusion as follows: "We agree with them [the Ohio and Kentucky courts] in holding—and the present case requires no further decision—that the conductor of a railway train, who commands its movements, directs when it shall start, at what stations it shall stop, at what speed it shall run, and has the general management of it, and control over the persons employed upon it, represents the company, and, therefore, that for injuries resulting from his negligent acts the company is responsible. If such a conductor does not represent the company, then the train is operated without any representative of its owner."

The controlling reasons which led the minds of the majority to this result were stated, as follows: "There is, in our judgment, a clear distinction to be made, in their relation to their common principal, between servants of a corporation, exercising no supervision over others, engaged with them in the same employment, and agents of the corporation, clothed with the control and management of a distinct department, in which their duty is entirely that of direction and superintendence. A conductor, having the entire control and management of a railway train, occupies a very different position from the brakemen, the porters, and other subordinates employed. He is in fact, and should be treated as, the personal representative of the corporation, for whose negligence it is responsible to subordinate servants. This view of his relation to the corporation seems to us a reasonable and just one, and it will insure more care in the selection of such agents, and thus give greater security to the servants engaged under him in an employment requiring the utmost vigilance on their part, and prompt and unhesitating obedience to his orders. The rule which applies to such agents of one railway corporation must apply to all, and many corporations operate every day several trains over hundreds of miles, at great distances apart, each being under the control and direction of a conductor specially appointed for its management. We know, from the manner in which railways are operated, that, subject to the general rules and orders of the directors of the companies, the conductor has entire control and management of the train to which he is assigned. He directs when it shall start, at what speed it shall run, at what stations it shall stop, and for what length of time, and everything essential to its successful movements, and all persons employed on it are subject to his orders. In no proper sense of the terms is he a fellow servant with the firemen, the brakemen, the porters, and the engineer. The latter are fellow servants in the running of the train under his direction. As to them and the train, he stands in the place of, and represents, the corporation."

When the question came again before the supreme court, in the Baugh Case, cited supra, which presented a different state of facts, the majority of the court, who spoke through Mr. Justice Brewer, took occasion to say that in the Ross Case it was not declared to be universally true that, by reason of the mere fact that one servant has control over another, they cease to be fellow servants, but that the general language in the charge to the jury in regard to the importance to be given to this circumstance was not erroneous "when applied to the case of a conductor having exclusive control of a train, in relation to other employes of the company, acting under him, on the same train." In the Baugh Case the engineer, who directed the movement of the engine when it was not being used in connection with a train of cars, and the injured fireman, were, in the opinion of the majority, engaged in a common employment. The engineer, notwithstanding the fact of his temporary control, was not the representative of the company. The decision also rested upon the fact that the known peril was voluntarily assumed by the fireman, who thus assumed the risk. When the two cases are analyzed, it will be seen that the facts which controlled the Ross decision did not exist, in their fullness and exactness, in the Baugh Case. In the case at bar the rule of the defendant was almost in the language of the rule in the Ross Case, and declared that the conductor, when upon the road, had the charge and control of the train, and of all persons employed on it, and was responsible for its movements. There is also no question as to the actual representative character of the conductor. He had control in fact as well as in name. He directed the movements of the train,—when it should go forward, and when it should stand still. In the exercise of this authority, he moved the train too soon, without observing whether those under his control were in an ordinary place of safety, and thereby an accident happened. The significant facts in the two cases correspond, except that the negligence of the conductor, in the case at bar, was not as marked and gross as in the Ross Case. His negligence was in one of the details of the business, wherein he had authority, while the negligence in the Ross Case was in a particular which might be vital to all the lives, and to the existence of all the property, on board the train. The negligence of the two conductors differed materially in degree. It did not differ materially in its nature. The essence of the negligence of each was forgetfulness.

The second subject is the effect of the Canadian statute. There are two classes of statutes of limitations: One extinguishes the debt or claim; the other merely bars or prevents the remedy. And, as remedies are regulated only by the law of the place where they are pursued, this class of statutes created by one state does not prevent a remedy which is sought in a foreign state, but in such case the lex fori controls. Bulger v. Roche, 11 Pick. 36, 13 Am. Dec. 359. The difference between the two classes was stated by Judge Story in his learned discussion upon the general subject in Le Roy v. Crowninshield, 2 Mason, 151, Fed. Cas. No. 8,269, as follows: "Statutes of limitation may be so framed as merely to apply to the jurisdiction of a court. They may prohibit such court from taking cognizance of an action unless brought within a limited period after the right has accrued. Such statutes properly and emphatically belong to the regulation of judicial proceedings. Statutes of limitations may, on the other hand, declare, in terms, that contracts not sued for within a limited period shall be held to be utterly extinguished. Such contracts are a complete extinguishment or discharge of a contract, and constitute a universal bar, as much as a discharge under a bankrupt law."

No testimony was given in regard to the construction of the statute by the Canadian courts, and we have not found a controlling authority in the decisions of other courts, as to the construction of statutes, which use similar language. The statute purports to be one of extinguishment, but the prescription may be interrupted by acknowledgment on the part of the possessor or debtor, or the debt or claim may be revived after the prescription has run. The argument, therefore, is that, if the debt may be revived, after the full time of prescription has elapsed, the statute is not one of extinguishment. This suggestion does not meet the question, which, it is true, does not arise in this case, but which often may arise, and which is, What is the effect of the statute when pleaded and shown, in an action in a foreign country, upon a debt due from a citizen of Canada to a citizen of Canada, when the time of prescription has run before suit, without interruption, while both parties resided in Canada, and the debt has never been revived? In the case of Bulger v. Roche, supra, the debt was contracted between subjects of Nova Scotia, who remained there until the debt was extinguished by virtue of its statute of limitations; but, in the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw, the statute created no legal defense to an action by the creditor in the state of Massachusetts. The court treated the question as one arising under an ordinary statute of limitations, which merely affected the remedy. But, without attempting to pass upon what may be the effect of the statute under all circumstances, it is sufficient to say that, assuming that it possesses its largest character, and is a statute of extinguishment, it constituted no defense to the suit of this plaintiff in the state of Vermont, because, during the plaintiff's residence in Canada, it had not become operative, and had not extinguished the debt, so far as courts in states foreign to Canada are concerned. The injury happened on September 6, 1890. The plaintiff was at that time a citizen of Vermont, but after the injury he remained in Canada, until April, 1891, when he returned to his mother's and his own home, in Vermont, and remained there continuously thereafter. When, before a statute of limitations has become operative, by way of extinguishment of the debt, as between two citizens or residents of a state, one of the parties has permanently changed his national domicile, and become a citizen of a foreign state, the statute will not become an absolute bar, as an extinguishment in the courts of such foreign state. It cannot become, in the country to which he has removed, an absolute extinguishment, unless the parties resided in the country of the statute during the whole period of limitation. Wood, Limitations of Actions, 22. The reasoning which leads to this result is stated by Judge Story, in his Conflict of Laws (sec. 582), as follows: "Every nation has a complete and exclusive sovereignty to enact laws which shall limit all right of action to certain prescribed periods within its own tribunals, and to declare that after that period all rights of action shall be extinguished; and, if the parties remain domiciled within the territorial jurisdiction during that whole period, the law, ipso facto, operates in the case, and the rights of action are completely extinguished there. But the same doctrine is not true, or rather may not be true, when, before the prescribed period has arrived, one or both of the parties have changed their national domicile, for by such change they have ceased to be under the exclusive dominion of the nation whose statute of limitation has begun to operate upon their rights of action, but has not yet extinguished them. The law thereof can no longer operate on those rights; at least, not operate except within the territorial rights of the nation. Elsewhere, they can be deemed to have only an inchoate and imperfect effect, and the change of domicile suspends their power to extinguish the rights of action in the future, since they can have no binding extraterritorial force. It is no answer to say that, when once the statute begins to run, no subsequent impediment stops it from continuing to run. That is true in the nation whose laws contain such provisions, or inculcate such a doctrine. But no other nation is bound to give effect to such provisions, or to such a doctrine."

This view of statutes of extinguishment was regarded as a reasonable one by Chief Justice Tindal in Huber v. Steiner, 2 Bing. (N. C.) 202.

A subordinate question, which arises upon the pleadings, was made by the plaintiff in error. The railroad company averred, in an amended plea, that by virtue of the Canadian statute the plaintiff's cause of action was extinguished and discharged to the same extent as if it had never existed. The plaintiff traversed the plea by its replication de injuria, upon which issue was joined to the country. There was no conflicting evidence in regard to the statute. At the close of the trial the defendant moved for a direction for a verdict in its favor; one ground of the motion being that, from the evidence received relating to the issue made upon the defendant's pleas as to the law of Canada, the defendant was not liable in this action. The court overruled the motion, and, upon the Canadian statute, held that it was not applicable to the action, and that consequently no question arose thereon for the consideration of the jury, to which decision the defendant excepted. The question which arose upon the undisputed evidence was merely as to its legal effect, and the court was properly not asked by the defendant to submit a question of fact upon the statute to the jury. The exception was to the ruling of the court upon the motion to direct a verdict that the statute of Canada was not applicable, and constituted no defense. The action of the court upon the motion to direct a verdict was proper.

We perceive no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Re ESTATE OF Samuel PICKENS, Deceased.

Joseph OBENSTEIN, Appd.

(163 Pa. 14.)

1. Common reputation in a family as to who are members of the family is admissible, when no superior evidence is attainable or in a connection with superior evidence to prove pedigree, legitimacy, and marriage.
2. The presumption in favor of marriage and the legitimacy of offspring is strengthened by lapse of time, and after ninety years from the birth of issue cannot be overcome except by strong, direct, and satisfactory proof.
3. In the absence of evidence the mere denial of marriage will not defeat the presumption of the legitimacy of issue, or throw upon such issue the burden of proof of the marriage of the parents.

A PPEAL by Joseph Obenstein from a decree of the Orphan's Court for Lancaster County affirming the report of an auditor disallowing his claim to share in the estate of Samuel Pickens, deceased. Reversed.

Samuel Pickens died intestate leaving as his next of kin the issue of an uncle and three aunts, and also persons claiming to be the children of his deceased half brother. The evidence in respect to the claim of the descendants of the half brother is stated by the auditor as follows:

Benjamin Obenstein, deceased, "it is alleged, was a step-brother of the decedent, Samuel Pickens, . . . The allegation that he was a step-brother of the decedent is denied by the Pickens heirs by whom it is alleged that the said Benjamin Obenstein was an illegitimate son of Susan Brockey by one John Obenstein, and that they were never married. The said Susan Brockey afterwards became the wife of Henry Pickens, by whom she had four children, one of whom was the decedent and all of whom are now deceased. Henry Pickens died on February 24, 1861, and his wife Susan died on May 29, 1857.

"That the said claimants would be entitled to receive that portion of the fund for distribution which is personality, if they can establish by competent evidence the relationship alleged, cannot admit of doubt. What, then, are the facts upon which claimants rely to establish their relationship to the decedent and their right to the fund in question?

"That the said Benjamin Obenstein was the son of Susan Brockey, prior to her becoming the wife of Henry Pickens, the father of decedent, is virtually admitted by all concerned, and it is a conceded fact that John Obenstein was his father.

"Whether Susan Brockey was the lawful wife of John Obenstein at the time of the birth of Benjamin Obenstein, or not, is the question raised and to be decided. The evidence discloses nothing to show that John Obenstein and Susan Brockey were ever married by a minister or magistrate, nor was their marriage proved by satisfactory evidence of reputation and cohabitation. Not a single witness was called who knew anything of the life of either of them before Susan became the wife of Henry Pickens. The most that was proved to establish the fact of marriage was the declarations of the decedent to the witness, Isaac Zern, when he remarked to him some twenty years ago that Benjamin Obenstein was his half-brother; that when Benjamin died he said his half-brother had died; that when decedent's sister Betsy died, he directed the witness to go for the preacher to conduct the funeral services and to send a postal card to each of his half-brother's (Benjamin's) children. He told the same witness on another occasion that his father, Henry Pickens, had to pay too much when old Obenstein came back, so that he would go away again, that old Obenstein was a German and that when he landed in this country he was indebted for his passage across the ocean; that Benjamin came to his mother's home and married her, and her father finding that Obenstein was not free, he went and paid the fare for Obenstein and then wanted Obenstein to work two years for him. Then, he continues, Obenstein went off, and upon returning later, found that Susan was living with Henry Pickens, father of decedent, who had to pay him twenty dollars to go away again. In this the witness is corroborated by his wife, Leah Zern. In addition to the above, claimants called as a witness Susanna Obenstein, widow of the said Benjamin Obenstein, who is now about eighty-eight years of age, by whom were proven certain declarations made by Susan Brockey (then Pickens), and among other things witness asked her, how is it that Benjamin is called Obenstein and he was raised by Pickens? She replied, my first husband's name was Obenstein; we lived together not a year and had a little boy, but that he did not live long; then we lived together a couple of years longer and got another little boy and we raised that one and you have him for a husband; that Benjamin often spoke of Samuel, the decedent, and his sisters as his half-brother and half-sisters, and they spoke of him as their half brother, and that she often spoke of her having been married to Obenstein before she was married to Pickens; that decedent spoke to witness of the relationship and of Benjamin as his half-brother, and by Rev. A. J. Bachman it was proved that decedent spoke of Benjamin as his half brother and of his children as those of his half-brother.

"This is substantially and in fact all that was proved by the claimants to make out their case.

"Are the facts as above stated sufficient in law to establish the fact of the marriage of Susan Brockey and John Obenstein, and thereby establish the relationship alleged by claimants?"

The auditor decided that the facts were not sufficient to establish the claim and he dismissed the same, which action was sustained by the orphan's court.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. W. T. Brown and Howard C. Shirk, for appellant:

The rules of evidence governing cases of this kind are:

1. That the statements must be made ante litem motam.

2. The declarant must be dead; and,

3. A prior condition to both these is, that it should be proved by some source of evidence independent of the statement itself that the person making the statement is related to the family about which he speaks.

Declarations as to a family, in order to be received in evidence, must emanate from deceased persons connected with such family by blood or marriage.

1 Whart. Ev. § 216.

Can it be contended that the knowledge of the intestate Samuel Pickens goes for nothing, when he said Benjamin Obenstein was his half-brother?

Sittler v. Gehr, 105 Pa. 599, 51 Am. Rep. 207.

The term "pedigree" includes not only descent and relationship, but also the facts of birth, marriage and death, and the times when these events happened. These facts may be established by general repute in the family, proved by a surviving member of it, in all cases where they occur incidentally and in relation to pedigree.

Declarations made by a decedent whose estate is being distributed are competent to prove claimant's relationship.

Even if the marriage had not been proven by the declarations of members of the family the fact having been shown and the same being found as a fact by the auditor that Benjamin Obenstein was the son of John Obenstein, the presumption of law in favor of legitimacy attaches and is conclusive until rebutted by competent proof to the contrary.

Messrs. A. J. Eberly, William D. Weaver, and Thomas J. Davis, for appellees:

Assuming only for the sake of argument that the appellant has proven, as he claims he has, the marriage of Susan Brockey to John Obenstein before Henry Pickens married her, then, as there is no evidence whatever that a divorce had been obtained by her from John Obenstein before she married Henry Pickens, and it being in evidence that John Obenstein was living after Susan married Henry Pickens, then the issue of Henry Pickens and Susan, one of whom is this decedent, Samuel Pickens, would be illegitimate and the appellant would have no standing to inherit from him, his mother, Susan Pickens, having died before him.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contest in this case, before the auditor, was between those claiming the personal estate of Samuel Pickens, as descendants of first cousins, and those claiming as children of Benjamin Obenstein, who, it is alleged, was a half-brother of the decedent. It was admitted that Benjamin Obenstein and Samuel Pickens were children of the same mother; that the father of the former was John Obenstein, and of the latter, Henry Pickens. The marriage of their mother to Henry Pickens was amply established by proof of cohabitation and reputation, and the question was whether she had previously married John Obenstein. Benjamin Obenstein was born in 1806, and Samuel Pickens in 1812. Eighty-seven years had elapsed between the birth of the former and the time when the marriage of his parents was questioned, and there was no living witness or documentary evidence of either marriage. It was therefore a case in which pedigree could be proved only by hearsay, and it was clearly competent to prove it in that way. "Common reputation in a family connection as to who are members of the family is admissible, when no superior evidence is attainable, or in connection with superior evidence, to prove pedigree, legitimacy, and marriage." 1 Whart. Ev. § 205. The relationship of the persons who made the statements, their death, and the fact that the statements were made ante litem motam, were established by competent testimony; and there was for consideration by the learned auditor only the sufficiency of the proof. It was testified by witnesses not connected with the family—Isaac Zern and Leah Zern—that Samuel Pickens, some twenty years before his death, had introduced Benjamin Obenstein to them as his half-brother, and had afterwards spoken of him as his half-brother, and of his children as the children of his half-brother, and that he had said to them that his mother was first married to John Obenstein. Susanna Obenstein, the widow of Benjamin Obenstein, and mother of the appellant, testified that at the time of her marriage she was told by her mother-in-law, Susan Pickens, that her first husband was John Obenstein; that they had two children, one of whom died, and the other of whom was Benjamin Obenstein; that she and John Obenstein lived together three years; and that he died when Benjamin was quite young. She also testified that the previous marriage to Obenstein was frequently spoken of in the family, and the relationship of Benjamin Obenstein and Samuel Pickens fully recognized by both, and by all the members of the family. There is not one word in contradiction of this testimony, the effort of the appellees being directed to show the marriage of Henry Pickens and Susan Pickens. There is nothing in the testimony which suggests a doubt as to the legitimacy of Benjamin, except the statement, said to have been made by Samuel Pickens, that John Obenstein, after the birth of Benjamin, had gone away, and afterwards returned, when his wife was living with Henry Pickens, who had paid him to go away again. This statement must be taken in connection with the declaration made at the same time that Susan Pickens had been married to John Obenstein before her marriage to Henry Pickens; and, if illegitimacy is to be inferred from it, the taint is not in the Obenstein line of descent. In such an inquiry as this there is always a presumption in favor of marriage.

which is strengthened by lapse of time; and after ninety years it cannot be overcome except by strong, direct, and satisfactory proof. Benjamin Obenstein was admittedly the second child of a man and woman who had lived together for some time previous to his birth, in 1806. There was testimony that his mother had said that she was married to his father, who died, and that she afterwards married a second time. He was brought up in the house of her second husband, and treated as were the children of her second marriage, and retained the name of his father. He was recognized in the family as a half-brother and this relationship was acknowledged and spoken of by the decedent, and he was treated as such until his death in 1880.

The learned auditor held that, the marriage being denied, the presumption of the legitimacy of the issue did not prevail, and that the burden of proof was upon the appellant, and that the proof offered was insufficient to support his claim. To sustain this finding he cited Com. v. Stump, 53 Pa. 184, 91 Am. Dec. 198. In that case there was no proof of an actual marriage, and all the facts established at the trial rebutted the presumption of marriage until after the birth of the children. There was cohabitation, but the reputation was that there had been no marriage. Upon the facts of that case this court held that proof of cohabitation alone, without reputation, was not sufficient to establish a marriage. In this case the burden of proof to establish his relationship to the decedent was upon the appellant, but he was not confronted with the presumption of the illegitimacy of his ancestors, and not required to disprove it. In the absence of all evidence, the presumption was the other way, and, after this lapse of time, could not have been removed except by clear proof. There was nothing in the admitted facts upon which his right prima facie rested to suggest the illegitimacy of any one in either line of descent. Their common ancestor, Susan Pickens, had at different times lived with John Obenstein and Henry Pickens, and had borne children to each. The cohabitation with one commenced fully ninety years ago, and that with the other a few years later. The last survivor of these persons died over thirty years ago. There was no distinct evidence of a marriage to either, but presumably she was the lawful wife of each. Such a presumption is entirely consistent with the facts as established by the testimony; but, if conflicting presumptions arose, that in favor of innocence and legitimacy would prevail. It was error to hold that the simple denial of marriage before the auditor, without a word of testimony upon the subject, imposed upon the appellant the burden of the proof of the legitimacy of his ancestors. This burden, however, he accepted, and offered the only proof of which the subject was susceptible, which, although hearsay, was competent and conclusive. This was by evidence of statements made long before any litigation arose, by persons related to the family, and now dead. These statements establish the first marriage, the cohabitation, the birth of issue, the death of the first husband, the second marriage, the birth of children by that, and the recognition during the lives of all these parties of the relationship between the decedent and the father of the appellant. This testimony throughout was clear, distinct, and consistent, and no attempt was made to contradict it. The only doubt suggested was by the statement of Samuel Pickens that John Obenstein returned after the marriage of Henry Pickens to his mother, and was paid to go away. It must be remembered that in the same connection he said that his mother had been married to John Obenstein, and that he was speaking of a matter of which he had no personal knowledge. There is nothing in this to give rise to the presumption of the illegitimacy of Benjamin Obenstein, and there is nothing else in the case upon which such a conclusion can be based.

We are of opinion that the fair conclusion from the whole testimony is that Benjamin Obenstein and Samuel Pickens were half-brothers,—the legitimate children of Susan Pickens.

The assignments of error are sustained, and the decree of the Orphans' Court of March 29, 1894, dismissing the exceptions to the report of the auditor, is reversed and set aside, at the cost of the appellee, and the matter is referred back to the auditor, that distribution may be awarded in accordance with this opinion.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Jersey, ex rel. William O. ALLISON,

Clinton H. BLAKE

(.....N. J.....)

*1. All persons who are within the class designated by the constitution are entitled to vote for all officers elective by the people, whether the offices to be filled be created by the constitution or by legislation.

2. Such class of voters cannot be diminished or enlarged by the legislature.

3. Consequently, a statute cannot confine the right to vote for road commissioners to the freeholders of the district, nor extend it to females, or to nonresidents of the district.

(June 11, 1894.)

NOTE.—How far the right to vote is absolute.

In the case of ALLISON v. BLAKE the constitution prescribed the qualifications of an elector in elections for all officers, that were or would thereafter be elected by the people, and it was held that the legislature could not change them. This is sustained fully by all the cases on the power of the legislature to prescribe qualifications.

As to the power of the legislature to prescribe qualifications for electors where they are not defined in the constitution, or where the officers to be elected are not provided for in the constitution, it has been generally held that the legislature has that power. See note to Coffin v. Thompson (Mich.) 21 L. R. A. 632, as to right of women to vote; see also note to Wolcott v. Holcomb (Mich.) 23 L. R. A. 215, acquiring residence as a voter while attending school or public institution. This is also fully sustained by the cases throughout this note.

a. As affected by acts of congress.

Congress has the power to legislate in regard to presidential or congressional elections. Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 651, 28 L. ed. 274; United States v. Quinn, 8 Blatchf. 48; Ex parte Clarke, 100 U. S. 399, 25 L. ed. 715; United States v. Munford, 16 Fed. Rep. 223.

And in such matters if the regulations of a state should conflict with those of congress, the latter must prevail, and the former would be void. Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717.

But congress has not the power to legislate in regard to other elections, except to prevent discrimination against voters, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. McKay v. Campbell, 3 Abb. U. S. 120; Ex parte McIlwhee, 3 Am. L. T. 251, Bright. Elect. Cas. 65; United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, 23 L. ed. 568; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. ed. 588; United States v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629, 27 L. ed. 230; United States v. 25 L. R. A.

Crosby, 1 Hughes, C. C. 448; United States v. Petersburg Judges of Election, 1 Hughes, C. C. 483.

The Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution annuls the state constitution as to the classification by color. Wood v. Fitzgerald, 3 Or. 568.

But the Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution did not give blacks the right to vote, who had not the qualifications required of whites as to residence. Antony v. Halderman, 7 Kan. 50.

b. Registration.

It has been generally held that states have the power to pass reasonable registration law, in cases where the constitution provides for registration or is silent on the subject. Re Polling Lists, 13 R. L. 729; State v. Scarborough, 110 N. C. 238; Detroit v. Rush, 10 L. R. A. 171, 83 Mich. 532; State v. Bond, 38 Mo. 425; People v. Kopplekom, 16 Mich. 342; Cowan v. Prowse, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 273; People v. Hoffman, 115 Ill. 537, 56 Am. Rep. 793; State v. Dillon, 23 L. R. A. 124, 32 Fla. 545; Capen v. Foster, 12 Pick. 435, 23 Am. Dec. 632; State v. Board of Examiners, 9 L. R. A. 385, 21 Nev. 67.

But in White v. Multnomah County Comrs., 13 Or. 317, 54 Am. Rep. 532, note, 37 Am. Rep. 20, this power was squarely denied, where the constitution was silent, as the requirement of registration placed an unauthorized restriction on the voter. From the dissenting opinion it seems that the act was objected to as imposing restrictions as to time, and for many details that were not commendable in all particulars, but the court puts the decision alone on the question of power.

A clause in a registration act requiring other qualification than that of the constitution, is not valid as to such clause, but a registration law is not invalid giving reasonable time to register although some may be barred of right to vote on election day, and the law may be local. Com. v. McClelland, 33 Ky. 633.

As to what is a reasonable time to register, the INFORMATION in the nature of a quo warranto to test the title of defendant to the office of road commissioner. Judgment for relator.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George R. Dutton for relator.

Mr. W. M. Johnson, for defendant:

The only officers whose election is provided for in the constitution of New Jersey are governor, senator, members of assembly, county clerk, surrogate, sheriff, coroners and justices of the peace.

In the election of all these officers except justices of the peace (whose elections are specially provided for in art. 8, § 2, par. 8), every male citizen of the United States who shall have been a resident of this state for one year and of the county in which he claims his right to vote for five months next before the election shall be entitled to vote.

If this constitutional provision applies in full force to all other elections, then every elector possessing the qualifications of residence may vote for any officer to be elected within the county in which he claims his vote.

He could, therefore, vote in every school district in that county; he could vote at every municipal election within the county because the right is guaranteed to him by the constitution of voting in the county where he has the requisite residence.

As to all the constitutional officers he can vote for them all in the county.

State v. Wrightson (N. J.) 23 L. R. A. 548.

If, therefore, the constitutional qualification of an elector must prevail in all elections, every law providing for municipal officers or township officers prescribing a residence within the township or within the municipality is unconstitutional.

The universal practice in our state since the adoption of the Constitution of 1844, indicates that the elections of municipal and township officers have never been regarded as subject to this constitutional clause.

Under the present school laws of New Jercases do not agree, but it was held in People v. Hoffman, supra, that closing the books on the third Tuesday prior to the election was reasonable.

In State v. Scarborough, supra, and State v. Bond, 38 Mo. 435, the time for closing the books was not stated.

And in Capen v. Foster, supra, the books were kept open to the day of election, and in Re Polling Lists, 18 R. L. 723, they were closed ten days prior to election.

And in People v. Kopplekom, supra, the board did not meet at all and gave no opportunity for some to vote.

In Cowan v. Prowse, supra, the court referred to Com. v. McClelland, supra, where three days were allowed.

In State v. Dillon, supra, the lists were to be published two weeks prior to the election, and notice was to be given for two days of time and place to revise the lists in regard to a municipal election.

In State v. Board of Examiners, 9 L. R. A. 385, 21 Nev. 67, the board adopted a general registration list, for a special election held three months after a general election.

In Patterson v. Barlow, infra, the voter could have his name placed on the list, on the day of election, except in Philadelphia where the time closed ten days prior thereto.

In State v. Butts, infra, the books closed ten days prior to the election.

In Brewer v. McClelland, infra, fifty-nine days were required which exceeded the residence qualification given in the constitution.

That a registration law does not provide for registration or voting of those who become competent to vote after registration is closed ten days prior to the election, will not render the law invalid. Well v. Calhoun, 25 Fed. Rep. 865.

But if the voter is not allowed a reasonable time to register, the statute will not be sustained. Stephens v. Albany, 84 Ga. 680; Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 7 L. R. A. 99, 78 Mich. 545.

It was said in Gooding v. Brown, 23 Fla. 497, that the legislature could not provide a registration law that did not give the voter a reasonable time in which to register, but that was not the question involved.

So the law was held invalid where the voter had only three days within which to register. Owensboro v. Hickman, 10 L. R. A. 224, 90 Ky. 626.

So where only four days were given. State v. Corner, 22 Neb. 265.

So where only seven days were given. Daggett v. Hudson, 43 Ohio St. 548, 54 Am. Rep. 832.

And in Page v. Allen, 58 Pa. 333, 98 Am. Dec. 272, it was held that a registration act, not providing for a voter, whose qualification to vote may be complete after the time for registration has closed, is unconstitutional and void. This act provided for closing the registration books ten days prior to election, and is contrary to Pa. Const., art. 2, sec. 1, providing for ten days' residence in district, as the effect would be to require twenty days' residence.

See further as to residence, subhead "Other statutory conditions, etc."

A registration statute not applying alike to all persons, or requiring different residence from that in the constitution, or requiring him to prove in advance that he will be a voter at the coming election, not provided for in the constitution, is void although the constitution may provide for registration of qualified voter. Morris v. Powell, 9 L. R. A. 323, 125 Ind. 231.

An act providing that a majority of votes cast at an election for subscription shall prevail is invalid where qualified voters may not have registered for that election, and the constitution requires a majority vote of all the qualified voters of the county, for such an election. Chester & L. N. G. R. Co. v. Caldwell County Comrs, 72 N. C. 456.

Massachusetts Stat. 1885, chap. 345, § 7, forbidding registration of naturalized persons within thirty days from naturalization, is void as adding qualifications not defined or authorized by the constitution of the state. Kinneen v. Wells, 144 Mass. 497, 59 Am. Rep. 105.

And a registration law unreasonable as to proof required of naturalization or which excludes male inhabitants of Michigan living in the state on June 24, 1835, and authorized to vote under the constitution, without regard to birth or naturalization, is void. Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 7 L. R. A. 99, 78 Mich. 545.

Mississippi Code, § 3612, forbidding registration of a delinquent taxpayer, is contrary to the state Constitution, § 241, providing for registration of voters, and authorizing the voter to satisfy the election officer at time of election, that he has paid the tax. Bew v. State (Miss.) Oct. 16, 1893.

In People v. Onondaga County Canvassers, 14 L. R. A. 624, 129 N. Y. 365, it was said that no statute regulating the conduct of elections should be so construed as to place arbitrary or unreasonable sey women have a right to vote at the district meetings and are eligible to the office of trustee.

In Michigan the general school laws provide that persons may vote at school meetings who are not electors under the constitution and who have taxable property in the district. This, it is held, includes women.

Belles v. Burr, 76 Mich. 1.

In Wheeler v. Brady, 15 Kan. 26, held that a law permitting women to vote at the school meetings was valid notwithstanding women are not constitutional voters.

In Buckner v. Gordon, 81 Ky. 665, held that an act providing that voters at a municipal election shall be taxpayers, is not in violation of the constitutional provision conferring the right of suffrage on every male citizen over the age of twenty-one, etc., the office voted for not being one named in the constitution.

obstructions in the way of citizens in the exercise of the right to vote, if it did, it would conflict with the constitution, but this was not the question involved.

A registration law providing for reasonable proof of the right of the elector to vote, will be upheld. Byler v. Asher, 47 Ill. 101; Re Election of McDonough, 105 Pa. 438; State v. Baker, 88 Wis. 71; Edmonds v. Banbury, 28 Iowa, 267, 4 Am. Rep. 177.

While the constitution of Pennsylvania provides that a voter shall not lose his right because unregistered and has fixed the qualifications of voters, it is not in the power of the legislature to enlarge or abridge them, but a statute requiring those who are unregistered to take an affidavit giving the particulars as to birth, residence, naturalization, and payment of tax is valid, as not unreasonable. Re Cusick's App. 10 L. R. A. 223, 185 Pa. 459.

A registration law should be uniform in its effects or it will be void. Re Supervisors Appointment, 52 Fed. Rep. 254; Brewer v. McClelland (Ind.) 17 L. R. A. 845.

Under the Missouri constitution providing for registration, an act requiring supplemental registration is not invalid as inconsistent with uniformity, as the constitution providing for registration every two years does not prohibit intermediate registration. Ensworth v. Albin, 46 Mo. 450.

A registry law to identify and distinguish the true electors is constitutional, and uniform regulations are not enjoined by the Pennsylvania constitution; the only clause of injunction is that elections shall be free and equal. Patterson v. Barlow, 60 Pa. 54.

The provisions of the charter of Newport, withholding the right to vote for aldermen and councilmen, from registry voters, and conferring the right to vote exclusively on electors, who are qualified to vote for the imposition of a tax or the expenditure of money, is unconstitutional and void. Re Charter of Newport, 14 R. I. 665.

Under Mo. Const. 1875, art. 8, § 2, defining voters, and section 5, providing for statute of registration in cities and counties of certain size, and by art. 9, § 7, showing that special charters of cities were not affected without supplemental legislation, a previous city charter providing for registration was not affected by the provisions above, nor repealed by the clause defining voters. State v. Frazier, 98 Mo. 426.

Under Kan. Const., art. 5, § 4, requiring that the legislature shall pass such laws as may be necessary for ascertaining by proper proofs the citizens who shall be entitled to the right of suffrage, a registry law is not void as not of uniform operation al-

Mr. Joseph D. Bedle also for defendant.

Beasley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a procedure to test the title of the defendant to the office of road commissioner in the first district of Englewood township. The title thus challenged is claimed to exist by virtue of an election held under the act entitled "An act concerning public roads and parks, and creating boards for the control and management of the same," approved March 1, 1893 (Pamph. Laws 1893, p. 69). The main object of this statute is to supersede, by the introduction of new methods, the system theretofore prevailing for the formation and reparation of the public highways by the well-known township officials. The fash-though it applies only to cities of first and second class; nor invalid as imposing an additional qualification. State v. Butts, 81 Kan. 537.

c. Tax or property qualification.

If the constitution of a state provides for a tax or property qualification as a condition precedent for voting, statutes to that effect will be valid. Friesleben v. Shallcross (Del.) 8 L. R. A. 537; State v. Dillon, 23 L. R. A. 124, 32 Fla. 545; McMahon v. Savannah, 66 Ga. 217, 43 Am. Rep. 65.

And some states sustain such a statute providing tax-paying qualification as a condition precedent to voting for the office for which the constitution does not prescribe the qualifications of an elector. Buckner v. Gordon, 81 Ky. 665; Valverde v. Shattuck (Colo.) Oct. 30, 1893.

And in such a case it was held that the voting privilege could be extended to aliens, and restricted to property owners. Belles v. Burr, 76 Mich. 1.

But in St. Joseph & D. O. R. Co. v. Buchanan County Ct., 39 Mo. 465, it was held that under the Missouri constitution, providing for submitting questions of subscription to qualified voters, an act which restricts voting to property qualification is invalid.

And in Morris v. Powell, 9 L. R. A. 323, 125 Ind. 281, it was held that a statute requiring property qualification as a prerequisite to voting is void, if the constitution fixes the qualification but does not require property.

And a tax-paying qualification clause in a territorial statute, not authorized by the Act of Congress, and providing conditions on one class and not on others, is void. Lyman v. Martin, 2 Utah, 136.

d. Soldiers voting.

Where the constitution does not define the place of voting, an act to enable electors in military service to vote is not void, although conducted at a place outside the county and state. State v. Main, 16 Wis. 398; Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 573; Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 304.

And the same was held in Opinion of the Judges, 37 Vt. 665, in regard to voting for federal office.

But where the constitution intends or provides that votes shall be cast in the county of residence, a statute authorizing voting for state officers elsewhere than in the county of voter's residence is invalid. Day v. Jones, 81 Cal. 251; Bourland v. Hildroth, 26 Cal. 161; Opinion of the Justices, 44 N. H. 533; People v. Blodgett, 13 Mich. 127; Chase v. Miller, 41 Pa. 403; Opinion of the Judges, supra.

ion of this substitute is this: the township committee of the several townships of the state are required to divide "their respective townships into convenient road districts," and thereupon to "call an assembly in each of said districts" "of the freeholders of said district," upon a certain prescribed notice. The section of the act containing these directions then proceeds in these words, viz.: "At which assembly, after being organized, the said freeholders so assembled shall elect by ballot a suitable person, who shall be a legal voter in the township and a freeholder and resident in the district for which he is nominated, as a road commissioner for said district for the term of three years." The further provision is that the commissioners thus chosen shall be known as the "Public Road Board;" that they shall each take an oath of office, and a certain compensation shall be paid to them by the township collector; that they shall have the "same duties and be subject to the same penalties as overseers of the highways in the said township now have or heretofore had," and, in addition, "shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, and be subject to the same obligations and penalties as the township committee now have, had, perform or performed, or are or were subject to, in relation to the public highways, and in addition thereto shall have a general and exclusive supervision, control, and management of the public highways and sidewalks in said township," etc. Besides the powers thus specified, there are others, of a similar character, conferred upon this newly created road board. It appears by the record before the court that, in pursuance of the statute in question, the township of Englewood was divided into five road districts, and that in No. 1 of these the defendant was declared elected a commissioner, and is now in the execution of the functions of such office.

In BOYD v. MILLS, post, 486, the constitution provided that persons engaged in the rebellion (with certain exceptions) could not vote until enfranchised by the legislature, and this was held not contrary to the Federal Constitution. This power of each state to provide by its constitution for the qualifications of the voters in that state is fully sustained in the cases noted infra, subject only to the inability to disqualify for race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The test oath required by some of the territories that the voter is not a Mormon, or maintaining bigamous relations, etc., have been sustained as not contrary to the acts of congress or the Federal Constitution, nor ex post facto laws. Davis v. Beason, 138 U. S. 383, 55 L. ed. 637; Innis v. Bolton, 2 Idaho, 407; Wooley v. Watkins, Id. 555; Murphy v. Ramey, 114 U. S. 15, 29 L. ed. 47.

And a similar oath was sustained where the constitution of Idaho so provided. Shepherd v. Grimmer, 2 Idaho, 1123.

But where the constitution defines an elector's qualifications, the legislature cannot impose as an additional qualification the test oath that he does not belong to the Mormon church, not provided for in the constitution, although the constitution provide that the legislature may prescribe other rules or oaths as a test of electoral qualifications. State v. Findlay, 20 Nev. 198.

Where the constitution so provides, a statute requiring a test oath of loyalty will be sustained. Randolph v. Good, 8 W. Va. 551; Duke v. Brown, 36 N. C. 127; McDowell v. Massachusetts & S. Constr. Co. 96 N. C. 514; Southerland v. Goldboro, Id. 49; Hardesty v. Taft, 23 Md. 512, 37 Am. Dec. 584; Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 531; Burch v. Van Horn, 2 Cong. Elect. Cas. 205; Blair v. Ridgely, 41 Mo. 63, 37 Am. Dec. 248; State v. Neal, 43 Mo. 119.

By the amendment to the constitution of Tennessee the qualification of voters was left to be determined by the next general assembly thereafter, and the qualifications then imposed govern notwithstanding an inhabitant may have a pardon from the president of the United States. Ridley v. Sherbrook, 3 Coldw. 509.

But a legislature cannot require test oath of loyalty from a voter not provided for as to his qualifications by the constitution, which authorizes the legislature to prescribe other oaths as a test of electoral qualification. Davis v. McKeeby, 5 Nev. 369; Clayton v. Harris, 7 Nev. 64.

And a legislative act cannot make voluntary rebellion involuntary expatriation, and it is not an alder to charge that one had falsely taken an oath prescribed by an unconstitutional act. Burkett v. McCarty, 10 Bush, 758.

So where the constitution does not so authorize, a statute requiring an oath of loyalty and that he has not borne arms, etc., is unconstitutional as to the latter clause. Rison v. Farr, 24 Ark. 161, 37 Am. Dec. 52.

New York Act, March 29, 1867, providing for oath of loyalty as prerequisite of right to vote, was held to violate the Federal Constitution, but the court was divided as to whether it violated the New York constitution, which provided no member of the state shall be disfranchised or deprived of any rights or privileges unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers. Green v. Shamway, 39 N. Y. 418.

A constitutional provision forbidding, among other things, a person to vote or to preach without taking oath of loyalty and that he had never been hostile to the state or federal government, was held as to preaching to be in effect a bill of attainder and an ex post facto law and therefore void, but the question of voting did not arise in the case. Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. ed. 356.

An act of congress March 3, 1865, forfeiting the rights of citizenship of deserters, thereby disqualifying such under New York constitution, which requires that only citizens of the United States can vote at a state election, is valid and is not an ex post facto law nor bill of attainder. Goettehus v. Matthewson, 53 Barb. 152, reversed on another question. 61 N. Y. 420.

Congress may disqualify deserters from the army from being citizens and thus affect their relation with the states, where the state constitution allows only citizens to vote; but such disqualification will not be recognized without proof of conviction. Huber v. Rely, 53 Pa. 112; State v. Symonds, 57 Me. 148; McCafferty v. Guyer, 59 Pa. 108.

A constitutional provision disqualifying voters convicted of larceny includes also petty larceny. State v. Buckman, 18 Fla. 397; Anderson v. State, 72 Ala. 187.

Under Ky. Const., art. 3, § 4, providing that laws shall be made to exclude from office and from suffrage those who shall thereafter be convicted of bribery, perjury, forgery, or other crimes or high misdemeanors, a statute disfranchising any person convicted of robbery, forgery, counterfeiting, or perjury, or other like crime, one who has been guilty of larceny cannot vote, and such statute is valid. Anderson v. Winfree, 35 Ky. 597.

The legality of this election is the question to be resolved.

It will be perceived, from the outline of the act, as above given, that the elective franchise, in these particular cases, is conferred exclusively upon "the freeholders in said district." At the election now under consideration, the chairman of the assembly ruled that all persons of full age, whether men or women, who resided in the township of Englewood, and who owned lands in said district, should be permitted to vote, and all other persons should be excluded from voting. The supervenient inquiry arising from an election so conducted is, obviously, whether the legislature has the power to vest in a special class of persons the right to fill the office with which we are now concerned. The act explicitly declares that no vote can be given except by a freeholder of the district. By article 2, section 1, of the Constitution of the state, the right of suffrage is thus defined: "Every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of this state one year, and of the county in which he claims his vote five months, next before the election, shall be entitled to vote for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people." With the exceptions enumerated in the proviso we have, at present, no concern. It cannot be denied that the office now in question falls within the terms of this constitutional definition, for it is plainly an office elective by the people. Notwithstanding the universality of these expressions, it is insisted on the part of the defendant that the provision is applicable only to such offices as are created by the constitution itself, and not to those that come into being through legislation. But such a contention is, it is deemed, plainly untenable. The constitutional language is clear and unambiguous, and there is not a syllable of the instrument that throws it in doubt. In the presence of such fact, there is no room for construction. Under such circumstances, the rule of reason, as well as of law, peremptorily requires that the plain language of the primary law must be taken to express the purpose of its framers. "Possible or even probable meanings," says Prof. Cooley, "when one is plainly declared in the instrument itself, the courts are not at liberty to search for elsewhere." Cooley, Const. Lim. 55. In view of this principle, that should

Under La. Const., art. 180, disqualifying duellists from the right of suffrage, a statute requiring a voter to take the oath that he has not given a challenge, etc., is valid as he may abstain from voting if he does not wish to take the oath. Dwight v. Rice, 5 La. Ann. 592.

A party convicted of crime in 1871 may be excluded from voting by the Constitution of 1875, and such a provision is not an ex post facto law, and is not a bill of attainder, where it requires conviction by judicial proceedings before disfranchisement. Washington v. State, 75 Ala. 532, 51 Am. Rep. 479.

A conviction under the federal laws of the crime of counterfeiting does not disqualify a voter, under N. Y. Laws 1872, providing that conviction of an infamous crime under the laws of this state shall disqualify him. United States v. Barnabo, 14 Blatchf. 74.

f. Ballots and primaries.

Statutes may be made regulating political machinery in regard to nominations for public office. Re House Bill No. 166, 9 Colo. 628.

A statute prohibiting fraudulent voting at primaries was sustained as valid under Pa. Const., art. 8, § 2, providing for disqualification for holding office and deprivation of right of suffrage of any one convicted of willful violation of the election laws. Leonard v. Com. 112 Pa. 607.

So Pennsylvania Act, June 19, 1861, requiring a party nomination or petition before uniform ballots required will be furnished, was sustained, as names may be inserted on the regular ballot. Dewalt v. Bartley, 15 L. R. A. 771, 146 Pa. 520.

And limitations on the manner of voting, as by printed ballot, are not void as adding to the qualifications of the voter. State v. McElroy, 16 L. R. A. 278, 44 La. Ann. 796.

Australian ballot law is not unconstitutional, as imposing a secret ballot, or providing only special ballots for the voter. State v. Black, 16 L. R. A. 760, 54 N. J. L. 446.

Under Mich. Const., art. 7, § 1, providing who is an elector, and that the legislature may provide the way in which his vote shall be cast, and section 2, that all votes shall be by ballot, and section 6, that laws may be passed to preserve the purity of elections, the legislature may provide for registration, and time, place, and manner of voting, so long as the law does not destroy the right, and uniformity of ballots may be required, and the voter may be required to prepare his ballot in secret, and deposit it alone; but as to lame and blind persons the spirit of the statute will not be infringed if they are assisted—(but see next case). Detroit v. Rush, 10 L. R. A. 171, 82 Mich. 532.

Under a constitutional provision giving the legislature power to provide the manner of election of officers of towns and cities, it may be by ballot, although another provision of the constitution provided for elections by the people to be utro voce. So much, however, of an election law as requires a voter to secretly and unaided mark his own ballot, would deprive illiterate persons of the right of suffrage, and is invalid—but see next case, supra. Rogers v. Jacob, 88 Ky. 502.

Under Tex. Const., art. 4, § 6, amended 1891, providing for numbering ballots as voted, Rev. Stat., § 1797, providing that unnumbered ballots shall not be counted, is valid as the elector takes his right subject to limitations imposed by the constitution, and statutory limitations not inconsistent therewith. State v. Connor, 86 Tex. 183.

But Cal. Code, §§ 1197, 1205, providing for certain ballots and rejecting all others, is unconstitutional as an attempt to discriminate against classes of voters, disfranchising them, as it prevents them from supplementing a straight ticket by stamping choice for individual candidates. Eaton v. Brown, 17 L. R. A. 697, 96 Cal. 371.

g. Other statutory conditions, restrictions, and qualifications.

A statute imposing qualifications as to residence or payment of tax, different from those authorized by the constitution of the state, is invalid. Rishel v. Luther, 2 Pa. Dist. Rep. 769; Quinn v. State, 36 Ind. 436, 9 Am. Rep. 754; People v. Canaday, 73 N. C. 198, 21 Am. Rep. 466; State v. Lean, 9 Wis. 276; State v. Williams, 5 Wis. 308; State v. Tuttle, 58 Wis. 45.

But a statute may require a voter to show that he has the constitutional qualification. State v. Williams, supra.

As to other cases of residence, see also Page v.

never be overlooked, it is impracticable to transmute the general declaration of the constitution, that every citizen possessed of certain qualifications shall be entitled to vote for all officers elective by the people, into a right to vote only for a certain class of officers. To say that the phrase "all officers" means all constitutional officers is conspicuously to interpolate the clause, and not to interpret its language. And, indeed, if we scrutinize more closely the phraseology to the constitutional adjustment in question, we will find that it expressly rejects this narrow construction under criticism. The description, "all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people," will not consist with the theory that only constitutional offices are embraced in its terms, for, if an office be made elective by the constitution, it cannot, with any propriety whatever, be referred to as an office that may thereafter be elective. Such an expression is congruous with office to be called into existence legislatively, but it is repugnant to the state of an office created by the constitution itself. Both the general and particular indications, therefore, of the clause are rejective of the theory of the defense.

And again: If the constitutional language touching this subject had been deemed ambiguous or indistinct, still all reasonable inference to be deduced from the scope and purpose of the instrument would have led to the same result as that above expressed. In view of such considerations, it would appear to be improbable, in the extreme, that while, in the fabrication of the primary law, careful provision should be made in regulation of the suffrage in the election of constitutional officers no method whatever should be established with regard to the elevation into public position of the numerous and important functionaries necessary to local government. In every American system of laws there must be, as it would seem, a recognition, express or implied, of the existence of instructions effectuating in the people the right of local self-government. Such instrumentalities always have been, and probably always will be, necessary parts of the machinery of state government. They are invested with large powers, which are exercised by officials chosen by the community. In such a posture of things, it is scarcely rational to suppose that the framers of the constitution, in regulating the right of suffrage, should make provision for its exercise with respect to the smallest of constitutional officers, such as constables and justices of the peace, and should at the same time leave at large, with-

Allen, 53 Pa. 333, 36 Am. Dec. 372, and cases following.

Under Fla. Act, May 31, 1897, in regard to Jacksonville, providing that only qualified electors who were such at the general state election next preceding the city election could vote at the city election thus disqualifying all others who might have possessed the constitutional qualification for eleven months, it was held that in the absence of constitutional provisions applicable to city elections the statute was valid, as the right to vote is not an inherent right but depends on constitutional grant, or if the constitution is silent on the legislative grant. State v. Dillon, 22 L. R. A. 124, 33 Fla. 545.

But a statute is invalid which restricts the right of the elector to vote for only a part of the officers of a class, where a greater number are to be voted for, and the right to vote for all is given by the constitution. State v. Constantine, 45 Ohio St. 437, 51 Am. Rep. 833; State v. Wrightson (N. J.) 22 L. R. A. 548; State v. Dillon, supra.

The legislature cannot, under the pretense of subdividing a county or state for election purposes, disfranchise a part of the people, by failing to provide for the constitutional right of voting. People v. Maynard, 15 Mich. 471; State v. Fitzgerald, 37 Minn. 23; State v. Van Camp, 36 Neb. 2; Atty.-Gen. v. St. Clair County Supra, 11 Mich. 63.

And a registration law failing to provide for inspectors in some of the districts as registering officers is void. Atty.-Gen. v. Detroit, 7 L. R. A. 99, 73 Mich. 545.

And statutes allowing officials to revise registration lists so as to exclude qualified voters will be held inoperative as to such part. State v. Staten, 6 Coldw. 233; State v. Dillon, 22 L. R. A. 124, 33 Fla. 545.

That the law delays election in case of a vacancy three months, does not deprive the electors of any constitutional right. Com. v. Maxwell, 27 Pa. 444.

If the legislature may provide an office to be voted for, it may say that certain qualifications are necessary for the incumbent, although this may prevent a voter from voting his choice. People v. Clute, 50 N. Y. 451, 10 Am. Rep. 503, affirming 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 309, reversing 63 Barb. 354. 25 L. R. A.

A statute disqualifying the sheriff from voting except in case of a tie vote, is constitutional as the sheriff may decline the office and retain the right of suffrage. State v. Adams, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 231.

The Amendment to Mass. Const., art. 20, and Mass. Stat. 1892, chap. 351, § 23, requiring a voter to be able to read part of the state constitution and write his name, does not violate the Federal Constitution as U. S. Const., art. 14, Amendment, provides that the basis of representation shall be reduced on denial of right to vote by a state thus recognizing the right to restrict, subject only of course to article 15, of the Amendment of the United States Constitution. Stone v. Smith, 159 Mass. 412.

In State v. Deshler, 25 N. J. L. 182, where the court held that an alien could not vote under a school election law providing that inhabitants could vote, it was said that it must not be understood that it is not in the power of the legislature, by express and explicit provisions, to authorize persons not entitled to vote for trustees to vote on the question of taxing or any matter relating to the schools other than the election of officers.

Under Ill. Const., art. 2, § 27, providing that white male inhabitants of certain age and residence shall be voters, an alien may be a voter. Spragins v. Houghton, 3 Ill. 377.

But it was said in Murray v. McCarty, 2 Munf. 398, that the rights of electors cannot be imparted to any one but citizens of a state, but that was not the question involved.

Where white blood preponderates over African, the citizen is "white" as provided for in the Ohio constitution, confining voters to "white" persons, but a statute imposing unusual and unreasonable burdens on the voter to prove the preponderance is void. Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 665.

There are numerous election cases which construe and enforce statutes in regard to the voter and election but, not passing on constitutional questions directly, are not included in this note.

The cases unanimously agree that the right to vote is not an inherent or natural right but is simply a gift of the state, subject to be taken away or withheld by the supreme power of the state. I. T.

out adjustment in this respect, the act of filling the highest municipal positions, such as mayoralties and city judgeships. The external indications of intention accord with the language of the constitutional provision now being considered; so that we think that the right of suffrage, with respect both to constitutional and statutory officers, is conferred by it on that class only that is comprehended within its definition. A male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, who has been a resident of this state one year, and of the county in which he claims his vote five months, next before the given election, is entitled to vote for all officers that are elective by the people, whether such offices are created by the constitution or by legislation. Such voter, however, with respect to an election in a district that is not coextensive with the county, must, by necessary implication from the foregoing definition, be a resident of such district, for he could not reasonably be said to claim the right to vote in the county unless he were such resident. Such has been the construction that has always been put upon this clause of the constitution, and it is the corner stone in the foundation of all our municipalities. The view thus stated is in harmony with the expression of opinion in this court in the case of State v. Deahler, 25 N. J. L. 183. In that case, Mr. Justice Elmer says, referring to the constitutional provision before us, that "this applies not only to officers whose election is provided for by the constitution, but to all who are or may be elected by virtue of an act of the legislature." The class of voters at official elections being thus defined by the constitution, it is not competent for the legislature either to enlarge or to diminish such class. The authorities, it is believed, are unanimous to this effect. Cooley, Const. Lim. 64. The provision, therefore, in the present statute, authorizing the election in controversy by the resident freeholders of the district, is a palpable alteration of the constitutional scheme, and the proceedings under it are consequently invalid. Judgment of ouster must pass against the defendant.

Before closing, it is proper to say that the general purpose that this statute is designed to effect has not been considered with respect to its legal feasibility. The attempt here is to lodge in the class of freeholders the exclusive right to lay out and repair the public highways, and to raise and expend the appropriate revenues. It is founded in a claim that the legislature has an unlimited power to establish in a few persons the administration of a branch of government, to the exclusion of the many. Such a prerogative would seem to have no limits, for, if it can be conferred on citizens owning freeholds, it can, at the will of the lawmaker, be given to nonfreeholders, or to the class who are without property, real or personal. But the subject is referred to only for the purpose of saying that it is one of great importance, and that it has not been discussed by counsel, and has consequently not been considered by the court. The title of the relator has not been, and could not be, put in issue by these proceedings, which are not on the part of the attorney-general.

O. C. BOYD

v.

O. MILLS.

*1. That part of section 2 of article 5 of the Constitution of this state, as amended in 1867, which reads: "No person who has ever voluntarily borne arms against the government of the United States, or in any manner voluntarily aided or abetted in the attempted overthrow of said government, except all persons who have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States since the first day of April A. D. 1861, provided, that they have served one year or more therein, shall be qualified to vote or hold office in this state until such disability shall be removed by a law passed by a vote of two thirds of all the members of both branches of the legislature,"—does not conflict with sections 10, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, and is a valid constitutional provision.

2. Where the election officers of a township were furnished by the county clerk with official ballots printed on white paper, and also with sample ballots printed on colored paper, in a separate package, and where by mistake the sample ballots were used by all the voters of that township, and the official ballots on white paper were all returned unused by the judges of election, and the election in such township was conducted regularly in every other respect, and the ballots used by the electors of all political parties were of the same color,—Held, that such ballots were rightly counted.

MOTION by defendant to strike out portions of a petition for quo warranto to try the title of defendant to the office of sheriff of Barber County. Sustained in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Martin & McNeal and Frank Doster, for defendant, in support of motion: Treason shall consist only in levying war against the state, adhering to its enemies, or giving them aid and comfort.

Bill of Rights, § 13.

Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or adthering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

U. S. Const. art. 3, § 3, par. 18.

If a man has voluntarily borne arms against the government of the United States, or voluntarily aided or abetted in the attempted overthrow of said government, has he not been guilty of the offence of treason?

Huber v. Reilly, 58 Pa. 112.

To deprive a man of the right to vote or hold office by bill of attainder, is punishment.

Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 332, 18 L. ed. 365; Goteheus v. Matheson, 58 Barb. 153.

So, then, if we consider the bill of rights of our own state and the Constitution of the United States, and give to the words used in our constitution, in section 2 of article 5, their usual signification, we must conclude that to disfranchise for voluntarily bearing arms against the government of the United States is a punishment inflicted for the commission of a crime.

The persons disfranchised under this section are not disfranchised on account of any offense committed against the government of the state of Kansas or the people of this state.

Every criminal prosecution must charge the offense to have been committed against the sovereign whose courts sit in judgment upon the offender and whose executive may pardon him.

1 Kent, Com. 18th ed. § 403.

The man who has voluntarily borne arms against the government of the United States is answerable for his offense to the government of the United States.

Ross v. State, 55 Ga. 192, 31 Am. Rep. 278; Prisett v. Stecens, 25 Kan. 276.

Subjecting a man to disfranchisement in a quo warranto proceeding is depriving him of a right without due process of law.

State v. Whisner, 85 Kan. 277; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 36 L. ed. 282; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 98, 23 L. ed. 678, 679.

Yet this court in this proceeding, under section 2 of article 5 of the Constitution, passes judgment of disfranchisement and finds these men guilty of the high crime of treason without notice that they are to be tried, without the privilege of being present in court in person or of having the benefit of counsel in their behalf.

It is a bill of attainder. Bills of attainder are laws enacted which for a past offense, stain or taint the persons against whom they are enacted, by a forfeiture of their civil or political rights, without the right of trial by jury in due form of law.

Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 332, 18 L. ed. 365; Cooley, Const. Lim. 315.

The people have no more power to put a bill of attainder into the constitution of their state than the legislature would have to enact one into law.

Shreveport v. Cole, 129 U. S. 36, 32 L. ed. 589; Caldor v. Bull, 3 U. S. 8 Dall. 886, 1 L. ed. 648; Eison v. Farr, 84 Ark. 161, 87 Am. Dec. 52.

Messrs. E. Sample and Chester I. Long, for plaintiff, contra:

The right of suffrage is not a natural right, nor is it an absolute, unqualified personal right. It is a right derived in this country from constitutions and statutes. It is regulated by the states, and their power to fix the qualifications of voters is limited only by the provisions of the 15th Amendment to the Constitution, which forbids any distinction on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

In Burch v. Van Horn, 2 Cong. Elect. Cas. 205, it was held that the principle of the case, Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 332, 18 L. ed. 365, holding that the provisions of the Missouri constitution forbidding persons from engaging in certain avocations were void, did not apply to suffrage.

It would be quite competent for the sovereign power to declare that no one but a married person shall be entitled to vote; and in that event the election officers would be authorized to determine for that occasion, in case of question in any instance, upon the fact of marriage as a continuing status.

Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U. S. 15, 29 L. ed. 47.

The words "ex post facto," have a definite technical signification, sanctioned by long usage. An ex post facto law is defined to be a law whereby an act is declared to be a crime, and made punishable as such when it was not a crime when done, or whereby the act of a crime is aggravated in enormity or punishment.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding instituted in this court by O. C. Boyd, as plaintiff, to try the right to the office of sheriff of Barber county. The petition shows that at the election held on the 7th day of November, 1898, according to the official canvass of the votes cast, the plaintiff received 508 and the defendant 516 votes. The plaintiff alleges that many illegal votes were cast and counted for the defendant, and that the plaintiff received a majority of the legal votes. The questions now presented arise on a motion by the defendant to strike out two portions of the petition, which it is claimed are irrelevant. The first is as follows: "That the following named persons voted at the general election, held on the 7th day of November, 1898, for the defendant, O. Mills, for sheriff, in the townships set opposite their respective names, they not being qualified electors at said election, by reason of section 2, article 6, of the Constitution of the state of Kansas, each and all of them having voluntarily borne arms against the government of the United States, and voluntarily aided and abetted in the attempted overthrow of said government, and their disabilities have not been removed by a law passed by two thirds of all the members of both branches of the legislature of the state of Kansas," with a list of names and residences of persons claimed to be disqualified. Counsel for the defendant challenges the validity of that clause of the state constitution which deprives persons who have voluntarily borne arms against the government of the United States of the right to vote. The section in which this provision occurs is section 2 of article 6. The section originally read as follows: "Section 2. No person under guardianship, non compos mentis, or insane, shall be qualified to vote, nor any person convicted of treason or felony unless restored to civil rights." In 1867 the section was amended, and now reads as follows: "Section 2. No person under guardianship, non compos mentis, or insane; no person convicted of felony unless restored to civil rights; no person who has been dishonorably discharged from the service of the United States unless reinstated; no person guilty of defrauding the government of the United States, or any of the states thereof; no person guilty of giving or receiving a bribe, or offering to give or receive a bribe, and no person who has ever voluntarily borne arms against the government of the United States, or in any manner voluntarily aided or abetted in the attempted overthrow of said government, except all persons who have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States since the first day of April A. D. 1861, provided that they have served one year or more therein, shall be qualified to vote, or hold office in this state until such disabilities shall be removed by a law passed by a vote of two thirds of all the members of both branches of the legislature." It is contended that this section of the constitution, having been passed after the close of the war, is in the nature of a bill of attainder, imposing the penalty of disfranchisement without a trial, and is ex post facto in its operation. The leading cases cited as supporting this contention are Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. ed. 356; and Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 338, 18 L. ed. 366. The question presented in those cases was not identical with the one in this. The constitution of Missouri, as revised and amended in 1865, provided a test oath by which a person was required to swear that he had never been guilty of any manner of disloyalty to the government of the United States, and that, after the expiration of sixty days after the taking effect of the constitution, no person should be permitted to practice as an attorney or counselor at law, or be competent, as a bishop, priest, deacon, minister, elder, or other clergyman of any religious persuasion, to teach or preach, unless such person should have taken and subscribed the prescribed oath. Cummings was a Roman Catholic priest, and was prosecuted for teaching and preaching without having taken the required oath. The Supreme Court of the United States held the provisions of the Missouri constitution invalid. A similar question was presented under an act of congress in the Garland Case, which was decided at the same time. The question in the latter case arose under an act of congress prohibiting any person from being admitted to the bar of the courts of the United States without taking a similar oath. The court held in both these cases that the requirements were invalid, and were in the nature of bills of attainder; that they operated to deprive these men of the right to earn a livelihood by pursuing the callings for which they had been educated; that the requirement of such oaths in effect required them to condemn themselves, and that the constitution of Missouri and the act of congress, in effect, condemned all persons as guilty, and prohibited them from following their callings until they should establish their innocence by expurgatory oaths. The following cases also are cited: Green v. Shumway, 89 N. Y. 418; Huber v. Reilly, 58 Pa. 112; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 115, 83 L. ed. 623; Rison v. Farr, 24 Ark. 161, 87 Am. Dec. 52.

It is ably and earnestly argued in this case that to deprive a person of the right to vote is a punishment; that the right to vote and hold those offices which can only be filled by persons having the qualifications of electors is a valuable right, and that any law, whether in the form of legislative enactment or constitutional provision, which is retroactive in its operation, and takes away this right, is in its nature a bill of attainder, inflicting penalties, and that it must be declared void under the Federal Constitution. It is answered, however, that the right to vote and hold office is not a natural right; that suffrage is nowhere universal, but always restricted by age, sex, and other incidents; that of necessity the organic law must prescribe the qualifications of electors, and that in doing so the framers are subject to absolutely no restrictions, but may confer or withhold the right at pleasure. The question appears to the writer not free from difficulty. The privileges of citizenship are certainly esteemed as of great value. To be deprived of them is to suffer the infliction of an injury, yet to say that the people in their organic law may not determine who shall participate in the government is to deny a power universally and necessarily exercised by the framers of every constitution. For the courts to assume the function of sitting in judgment, not merely under the constitution, but upon the constitution itself, and according to their own views declare what provisions are valid and what invalid, is a most serious undertaking; yet, of course, provisions of the constitution of the state, if framed in violation of an expressed prohibition by the Federal Constitution, must be held inoperative. In determining who shall exercise the right of suffrage, may not the people exclude classes who have shown themselves unfaithful to a public trust, or who have engaged in hostilities against either the state or federal government? Counsel argues that the offense which is made the ground of disfranchisement is an offense against the sovereignty of the United States, not against that of the state of Kansas at all, and that only that sovereignty against which the offense has been committed can punish for the crime. This question, however, is immaterial until it be determined that the provision in the constitution is in the nature of a punishment for crime. If it be so, the provision would be invalid, no matter whether the offense be against the state or the United States, for it would be ex post facto in its operation. It will be observed that the original section of the constitution disqualified persons for offenses only after conviction, while the amended section disqualifies persons convicted of felony, and also those guilty of defrauding the government or any of the states thereof, of giving or receiving a bribe, as well as those who have voluntarily borne arms against the government. In view of the fact that this provision has remained in the constitution for twenty-six years, and that at nearly every session of the legislature acts have been passed removing the disqualifications of voters; that the validity of the provision has remained unchallenged, and has been accepted as the organic law of the state by the people generally, the court certainly should hesitate to overturn that which has been so long established, and so universally recognized. The weight of authority, if not of reason, also seems to sustain the validity of the constitutional provision. Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 531; Shepherd v. Grinnett, 2 Idaho, 1123; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. ed. 588; Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 651, 23 L. ed. 274; Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162, 23 L. ed. 627; Stone v. Smith, 159 Mass. 413; McCrary, Elections, § 3. The only constitutional question we now have to decide is whether the people of the state of Kansas had the right to incorporate this provision in their organic law, and this question is answered in the affirmative. A conviction for treason under the constitution as it stood before the amendment would carry with it the loss of citizenship. The amendment adds nothing to the punishment for the offense. We have here no requirement of test oaths to consider. The character of evidence required to establish the disqualification of a voter under this provision is not now presented, nor do we express any opinion upon the subject.

2. Defendant also moves to strike out the following portion of the petition: "That on the 8d day of November, 1893, F. A. Lewis, as clerk of Barber county, Kansas, issued and gave to S. Y. Carr, judge of the election of Deerhead precinct, 100 official ballots; that on the 8th day of November, 1893, 100 official ballots, unused, from Deerhead precinct, were returned by John Renfrew; that on the said 8th day of November, 1893, as shown by the records in the office of the county clerk of said Barber county, there were voted in said Deerhead township 20 colored ballots; that a true and correct copy of the record of official ballots issued for the election held on the 7th day of November, 1893, for Deerhead township, as the same appears in the office of the county clerk of Barber county, Kansas, is made a part of this petition, here referred to, hereto attached, and marked 'Exhibit A'; that on the 4th day of November, 1893, the county clerk of Barber county, Kansas, took a receipt from S. Y. Carr, judge of election of Deerhead precinct, for 100 official ballots, a true and correct copy of which is attached to this petition, made a part hereof, and here referred to, and marked 'Exhibit B'; that on the 8th day of November, 1893, the county clerk of Barber county, Kansas, took a receipt from John Renfrew, of Deerhead voting precinct, for 100 ballots, unused, and for 20 colored ballots, voted, which said receipt, as it appears in the stub-book of the county clerk of Barber county, Kansas, is in the words and figures set forth in Exhibit C, which said exhibit is hereto attached, here referred to, and made a part of this petition. The said plaintiff further says that the returns of the election on file in the office of the county clerk of Barber county, Kansas, on the 10th day of November, 1898, show that no official ballots had been voted in Deerhead precinct, and that ballots other than white had been voted in said Deerhead precinct, and that ballots having distinguishing colors and marks thereon had been voted in said Deerhead precinct; that no legal or official ballots were cast in Deerhead precinct for any candidate for the office of sheriff, or other office, at the general election held on said 7th day of November, 1898; that the five votes cast for O. C. Boyd, and the fourteen votes cast for O. Mills, shown by the returns to have been cast in Deerhead precinct, were illegal and void, and should not be counted, for the reasons above set forth." Section 14, chapter 78, of the Laws of 1898, known as the Australian Ballot Law, contains the provision that "the ballots shall be on plain white paper through which the printing or writing cannot be read." Section 15 provides that "ballots shall be printed and in the possession of the officers charged with their distribution at least five days before the election accompanied by exact copies of said ballots printed on paper of any color, other than white, for the inspection of candidates and their agents." It appears from the petition that in Deerhead township the election officers used the sample ballots, printed on colored paper, and returned all the official ballots, which were printed on white paper. It is conceded that all other ballots used in Deerhead township were of the same color, and the sole question with reference to their legality arises from the color of the paper. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the statute is mandatory, and that no ballot can be counted unless it conforms strictly to the requirements of the law; that the court is not at liberty by construction to do away with any of its requirements. In this contention we think counsel for the plaintiff is in the main correct, and that the wholesome provisions of the law are neither to be disregarded nor construed away. Section 25 contains the following provision: "If a voter marks more names than there are persons to be elected to an office, or fails to mark the ballot as required by other sections of this act, or if for any reason it is impossible to determine the voter's choice for an office to be filled, his ballot shall not be counted for such office. No ballot without the official indorsement shall be allowed to be deposited in the ballot box, and none but ballots provided in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be counted." That the ballots in fact used were printed and furnished by the county clerk, and were in all respects the same as the official ballot, excepting the color of the paper, is conceded, and it is also conceded that the ballots used in the one township were uniform in color. Does this fact operate to render the election at that voting precinct a nullity? In considering the statute, we are to keep steadily in mind the evident purpose of the legislature in its enactment. It is plain that among the most prominent ends sought to be attained was that of absolute secrecy. Any mark or distinguishing feature on the ballots, which would enable a person other than the voter himself to identify the ballot, and find out how the elector had voted, was intended to be strictly prohibited. The case of People v. Onondaga County Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 895, 14 L. R. A. 624, is relied on. The statute of New York differs materially from our own. The law requires that "on the back of each ballot shall be printed in type known as great primer, Roman condensed capitals, the indorsement, 'Official ballot for,' and after the word 'for' shall follow the designation of the polling place for which the ballot is prepared, the date of the election and a fac simile of the signature of the county clerk; the ballot shall contain no caption, or other indorsement except as in this section provided." In distributing the ballots, those printed for the Republican party were transposed, so that the votes indorsed with the number of the first district in certain towns were sent to the second, and those with the second to the first, and such transpositions occurred in four towns, and at nine election precincts. The 29th section of the New York act provided: "No inspector of election shall deposit in the ballot box on election day any ballot which is not properly indorsed and numbered, except in the cases provided for in section 31 of this Act, nor shall any inspector of election deposit in the ballot box, or permit any other person to deposit therein on election day any ballot that is torn, or that has any other distinguishing mark on the outside thereof." It seems that separate tickets are printed there for each political party, instead of printing all the names on one ballot. In deciding the case, the court lays much stress on the fact that the Republican ballots, being indorsed with the wrong number, had distinguishing marks by which they could be identified, and that the secrecy of the ballot was thereby destroyed, and also on the positive requirements of the law that no ballot should be deposited unless properly indorsed and numbered. In the case of State v. McKinnon, 8 Or. 498, a ballot was rejected, written on colored paper, the law requiring it to be on plain white paper. We should have no hesitancy in saying that a single ballot printed on colored paper, where the official ballots printed on white paper were being used by other electors, could not be counted. In that case it would be plain that the object of the law was contravened.

We have examined the numerous cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff, and from them deduce two rules, which seem to be steadily adhered to by the courts: (1) That under laws similar to our own, designed to preserve the secrecy of the ballot, any mark or distinguishing feature apparent on the ballot renders it void. (2) Where the law is explicit in prohibiting the counting of any ballot which does not conform to the requirements of the statute, that the courts will enforce the law as it reads, without interposing their own judgment as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the requirements. It will be observed that the law nowhere explicitly provides that a ballot printed on paper of a color other than white shall not be counted. The only clause which could be held to imply such a provision is that "none but ballots provided in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be counted." Among the requirements of the act, which are very minute, is one that the official ballots shall be put up in separate lots, packages of fifty ballots each, with certain marks on the outside. Will it be contended that an error in counting the ballots within any package, or in marking or addressing the package intended for any person, would vitiate the election? The departure from the law in matters which the legislature has not declared of vital importance must be substantial in order to vitiate the ballots. This appears to be the general current of all the authorities. In Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 61, 18 L. R. A. 754, it is said: "If the law itself declares a specified irregularity to be fatal, the courts will follow that command, irrespective of their views of the importance of the requirement. In the absence of such declarations, the judiciary endeavor as best they may to discern whether the deviation from the prescribed forms of law had or had not so vital an influence as to prevent a full and free expression of the popular will. If it had, the irregularity is held to vitiate the entire return; otherwise, it is considered immaterial. In State v. Russell, 34 Neb. 116, 15 L. R. A. 740, it was held: "The provisions in section 20 of the Code, approved March 4, 1891, known as the Australian ballot law, for the marking of ballots with ink, is directory only, for ballots in other respects regular will, in the absence of fraud, be counted, although marked with a pencil." Under the Indiana Election Law of 1889, the poll clerks were required to write their initials in ink in the lower left-hand corner on the back of each ballot. In one precinct, clerks, by an honest mistake, put the indorsement in the lower right-hand corner on all the ballots, and it was held in the case of Purvin v. Wimberg, 180 Ind. 561, 15 L. R. A. 775, that the ballots were properly counted. We have not overlooked the case of Tulcott v. Philbrick, 59 Conn. 472, 10 L. R. A. 150, cited by plaintiff's counsel, with the reasoning in which we are not satisfied. A distinction also was made by the supreme court of Michigan in the case of Lindstrom v. Manistee County Canvassers, 94 Mich. 467, 19 L. R. A. 171, between those errors or mistakes of officials which would have the effect to disfranchise a class of voters and a disregard of the provisions of the law by the electors themselves. Without proceeding to review at greater length the authorities cited by counsel on both sides of the question, we conclude that the mere fact that the paper on which all of the ballots used in one election district was of a color other than white, where the ballots were not only printed by the authorities designated by law, and by them furnished to the judges of election, but were furnished by the judges to the voters, and were the only ballots furnished to or used by any voter at that voting place, is not sufficient to prevent the counting of the votes. The secrecy of the ballot has been in no wise impaired; the voters themselves have manifested no disposition to disregard the law and it may be fairly inferred that the use of the colored ballots was an honest mistake on the part of the judges of the election. Had a part of the ballots been white, and a part colored, so as to afford some grounds for identification of the votes cast by the individual electors, a different question would be presented. We reach the conclusion, that the law has not been substantially infringed because we are unable to see how the purpose of the act can have been impaired in any degree by the mistake made in using the colored ballots. By this decision we do not intend to say that any of the provisions of the law may be disregarded, or that any officer may escape liability to punishment for violating any of its provisions.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT

v.

KENNEBEC STEAMBOAT CO.

(.....Me.....)

1. A person injured by the slipping of a gang plank while attempting to cross it in entering a steamer to take passage is to be regarded as a passenger.
2. A person traveling with a friend by invitation, knowing that they were going on a pass held by the latter, although not seeing the pass or knowing its contents, is bound by a condition thereon that the passengers traveling upon it assumed all risks of injury.

3. A condition in a free pass that the passenger will assume all risks of personal injury is not against public policy.

Whether defendant was guilty of negligence, was partly question of fact.

The jury found the defendant guilty. It is not denied that the plank fell and that plaintiff was injured thereby. These facts make prima facie case of negligence against defendant, and cast burden on it to show its due care.

Farish v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. 697, 63 Am. Dec. 686, and note; Zemp v. Wilmington & M. R. Co. 9 Rich. L. 84, 64 Am. Dec. 763; Galena & O. U. R. Co. v. Farwood, supra; *Bowen v. New York Cent. Corbin, defendant's officer in charge, says he directed a man to make the plank lines fast to the rings. If this obviously necessary and customary duty had been performed properly, the plaintiff would not have been injured. Corbin's direction to the other servant cannot excuse the omission.

If wind and tide would be evidently working to swing the boat off, then defendant was bound to exercise diligence "commensurate with the risk or danger."

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Breinig, 25 Md. 878, 90 Am. Dec. 49.

Corbin says the ice was known to him to exist as a cause for unusual caution before anything was done towards putting the plank in place. Knowledge of Corbin and other servants was defendant's knowledge.

Contract or notice to limit carrier's "common-law liability" is one thing; such contract or notice to exclude liability for carrier's negligence or that of its servants, is another thing.

Contracts (a fortiori notices) for the latter purposes are generally held void and ineffectual 35 L. R. A.

in America, except New York and New Jersey, where with much dissent and some inconsistency, they have been upheld.

Against their validity—

See Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Selby, 47 Ind. 471, 17 Am. Rep. 719; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 637; Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Exp. Co. 98 U. If common carrier's obligation arises from social duty and not from contract (Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502, and is "determined by the policy of the law" (Hollister v. Nowlen, 19 Wend. 234, 33 Am. Dec. 455),—the foregoing cases seem to show the inevitable conclusion; and unless the law has more regard for chattels than for human life (Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. v. Curran, 19 Ohio St. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 865), the result must be as they declare it.

A few cases hold that such contract on a pass is good against any negligence less than gross

Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Read, 87 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260; Annas v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 67 Wis. 46, 57 Am. Rep. 88, 58 Am. Rep. 848; Philadelphia & E. R. Co. v. Derby, supra.

The Indiana court repeats Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Selby, 47 Ind. 471, 17 Am. Rep. 728: "A common carrier can no more stipulate for a slight degree of negligence than for gross negligence" and also approves the language of the Federal Supreme Court where this distinction is disapproved.

Gross is not necessarily willful or malicious.

The "New World" v. King, 57 U. S. 16 How. 469, 14 L. ed. 1019.

Neither the Federal Supreme Court nor this court has decided whether a contract against carrier's negligence is valid on a free pass.

Such contract on a pass has been upheld by some courts outside of New York and New Jersey, and adjudged invalid by others.

See notes in Perkins v. New York Cent. R. Co. 82 Am. Dec. 290-292; Bissell v. New York Cent. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 442; Camden & A. R. Co. v. Bausch (Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 121.

Against Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 58 Conn. 371, 55 Am. Rep. 115, we cite Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, 65 Tex. 640, and against Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 58 L. R. A. 846, 150 Mass. 365, we cite Jacobus v. St. Paul & O. R. Co. 20 Minn. 125, 18 Am. Rep. 860.

Those cases that sustain the contract do not appreciate the principle that the carrier's obligation is not founded on contract (Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 463, 14 L. ed. 502; Hollister v. Noylen, 19 Wend. 234, 32 Am. Dec. 455), or duly consider the question "lying behind" the one which they discuss, referred to in last paragraph in—Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Stevens, supra.

The terms which will exempt the carrier must be clear and unmistakable.

Blair v. Erie R. Co. 66 N. Y. 818, 23 Am. Rep. 55.

Terms offered here do not refer to negligence. They may well be taken to mean such liabilities as were found in—

Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Pillow, 76 Pa. 510, 18 Am. Rep. 424, and McElroy v. Nashua & L. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 400, 50 Am. Dec. 794.

We deny that plaintiff was traveling on a pass. The burden is on defendant to show pass and contract; contract extensive enough to include the case. As to construction see—Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co. 27 Cal. 11, 85 Am. Dec. 211.

And as to burden—

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 65, 20 L. ed. 354; Baker v. Brinson, 9 Rich. L. 201, 67 Am. Dec. 548; Western Transp. Co. v. Newhall, 24 Ill. 466, 76 Am. Defense infers too much from plaintiff's consent to go. She did not consent to go on the pass regardless of undisclosed conditions. While having right to reject pass for conditions, she was not bound by the conditions.

Messrs. A. C. Stilphen and Symonds, Snow & Cook, for defendant:

In Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co., 5 L. R. A. 846, 150 Mass. 365, the Massachusetts court holds that a person accepting and traveling upon a free railroad pass with certain conditions upon it must be deemed to have accepted it on those conditions whether he reads and signs them or not, and if a person solicits and accepts purely as a gratuity a free pass from a railroad company to ride upon its trains and agrees to assume all risk of injury therefrom, the agreement is not invalid as against public policy and he cannot recover for injuries caused by the negligence of the company's servants.

The cases cited in Quimby v. Boston & M. R. 25 L. R. A.

Co. and in Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 58 Conn. 371, 55 Am. Rep. 115, are sufficient to show that the rule there established prevails generally in England, has been definitely adopted by the courts of New York and Connecticut, as well as of Massachusetts, and prevails generally elsewhere, except that some courts have denied the power of the common carrier to limit its liability for gross negligence, making a difference of degrees in negligence which has not generally been approved.

Plaintiff knew she was receiving a pure gratuity in accepting transportation on the pass.

The knowledge in law is imputable to her that the pass might and probably would relieve the defendant from all liability, and she was bound to take notice of all its conditions and limitations, and if she failed to examine them, she was bound by the limitations and exemptions as fully as though she had read them.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the evening of November 20, 1890, the defendant's steamer Kennebec arrived at the wharf in Bath about half past 5 o'clock, on her regular passage from Gardiner to Boston. There was a fresh breeze from the northwest, with a flood tide and freezing temperature, and the spray from the wheels caused ice to form on the guards of the steamer. The gang plank was adjusted so as to form a bridge or passageway between the steamer and the wharf. The plaintiff had come down from Brunswick by rail, and was going on board as a passenger to Boston. She was on the gang plank, and with a single step more would have been on the steamer, when suddenly, by reason of the swaying of the boat, the end of the gang plank resting on the steamer slipped from its place, and dropped down over the margin of the guard. The lip of the plank was thereby thrown upward and backward, the edge of it striking the plaintiff's leg, and inflicting the injury of which she complains.

The plaintiff claims that the defendant's servants were guilty of negligence in the management of the gang plank, and in this action to recover damages for the injury thereby sustained a verdict of $3,950 was rendered in her favor.

The case now comes to this court on exceptions and motion for a new trial. The defendant claims—First, that the evidence fails to show any negligence on the part of the defendant's servants on the occasion in question; and, secondly, that the plaintiff became a passenger by virtue of a free pass which had printed on the back of it an express condition that the person accepting it must assume all risk of personal injury while using it.

The plaintiff admits that she was invited by Miss Niles to go to Boston by boat on a pass in company with Miss Niles and her two sisters, Miss Fannie Niles and Mrs. Remick, but says she never saw any pass, and denies that at the time of the accident she was traveling on a pass. She further says that, in any event, she had no knowledge of any condition on the pass in question which exempted the defendant from liability for personal injuries, and was not chargeable with any knowledge of such condition which Miss Niles and her sisters may have had. It is further contended that the terms printed on the back of the pass ought not to be construed as a contract against the defendant's liability for negligence, and finally it is insisted that it was not competent for the defendant, as a common carrier of passengers, to make such a stipulation against liability for negligence.

1. The plaintiff had undoubtedly consented to avail herself of the benefit of a free pass on the defendant's steamer to Boston. Her own testimony is clear and unequivocal on this point. She was informed by Miss Niles that a pass had been obtained "for four ladies," and accepted her invitation to go in place of one first invited, who was obliged to decline. She admits that it was "distinctly understood" that she was to go on the pass, and that "no doubt was expressed by any one" as to her "being allowed to go on it." She "had always wished to go by boat," and accepted with pleasure this proffered courtesy from her friend. She afterwards stated that her employer would not have consented for her to leave at that busy season but for the favorable opportunity presented to her of going on a pass. She went from Brunswick to the wharf at Bath, and stepped upon the gang plank of the steamer, with the full expectation of a gratuitous passage to Boston, and with no intention of paying her fare. That such a pass was actually issued by the defendant, and was in the possession of Miss Niles, on the steamer, as well as at Brunswick, is conclusively shown by the uncontradicted testimony of Miss Niles and Mrs. Remick. It was presented by the latter at the ticket office on the steamer for the purpose of obtaining a stateroom. After obtaining the key the ladies went up stairs to the stateroom assigned them, and the plaintiff there ascertained the extent of her injury. The pass was returned to Mrs. Remick when she received the key, but, in the excitement and confusion following the accident, it appears to have been lost. Its terms are satisfactorily shown, however, by the testimony of the Niles sisters, in connection with a copy of the pass, in blank, introduced in evidence.

It is equally clear that the plaintiff had become a passenger at the time of the accident. She was at that moment within the protection of the defendant's servants, and immediately after the injury was assisted by them to the ladies' cabin. The steamer then left the wharf, and proceeded on her course down the river. It was soon discovered, however, that the plaintiff's wound required the attention of a surgeon, and the steamer put back to the wharf, and the plaintiff returned to Brunswick that night.

It cannot be questioned that a person may become a passenger before the transportation has actually commenced, and before he has entered the carrier's vehicle. In the familiar case of Brien v. Bennett, 8 Car. & P. 724, the defendant's omnibus was passing on its journey, and the plaintiff made a signal for the driver to stop and take him up. The omnibus was accordingly stopped for that purpose, and the door opened; but just as the plaintiff was putting his foot on the step the omnibus was driven along, and the plaintiff thrown upon his face and injured. It was held that the stopping of the omnibus at the plaintiff's request implied a consent to take him as a passenger, and that thereupon, in attempting to enter the carriage, he had the rights of a passenger.

In Shannon v. Boston & A. R. Co., 78 Me. 52, a person waiting in the station for a passage on a train soon to depart was invited by the ticket agent to sit in an empty car standing on the side track while the waiting room was being cleaned; and it was held that she was entitled to the same protection from the company, while in this car, as if in the regular waiting room. In either place the person is a passenger in the care of the company. See also, Smith v. St. Paul City R. Co. 82 Minn. 1, 50 Am. Rep. 550; Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700; Poucher v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 268; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Martin, 111 Ill. 219; Allender v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 37 Iowa, 264; Casswell v. Boston, & W. R. Corp. 98 Mass. 194, 93 Am. Dec. 151; Hutchinson, Carr. 2d ed. §§ 556-565.

Upon the facts disclosed in the case at bar, it must be conceded that at the time of the accident the relation of passenger and carrier between the plaintiff and the defendant had been fully established. She clearly would have been a passenger if she had gone upon the gang plank intending to procure a ticket at the office, and pay her fare, and she was not the less so because traveling on a pass. Hutchinson, Carr. § 565; Shannon v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra.

2. The plaintiff was traveling on a pass with the following conditions printed on the back of it, viz.: "The person who accepts this pass thereby assumes all risks of personal injury, and loss or damage of property, while using it." The terms of this condition are clear and unmistakable. They are in effect the same as those on the "free ticket" in Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co., 150 Mass. 366, 5 L. R. A. 846, and are sufficiently comprehensive to cover all risks of personal injury, "of every name and nature," including those arising from the negligence of the defendant's servants.

But it does not appear that the plaintiff ever saw this pass, and she claims that she had no knowledge of the condition attached to it, and never assented to it. It is in testimony, however, that Miss Niles, who procured the pass at Brunswick, and Mrs. Remick, who presented it at the ticket office on the steamer, had both examined the terms of it, and knew that it contained a stipulation exonerating the defendant from liability for injuries. Miss Fannie Niles also learned from her sisters that there was such a condition on it. Miss Niles and Mrs. Remick both testify that in a conversation with the plaintiff, in going from Brunswick to Bath, on the evening of the accident, it was remarked, "in a joking way," that they must be very careful, as they were traveling on a pass, at their own risk, and could not recover any damages if they were injured; and on two or three other occasions, before they reached the wharf, allusion was made, in the plaintiff's hearing, to the fact that they were "on a pass, and at their own risk." The plaintiff says she has no recollection of any such conversation, and never understood, as a matter of fact, that they were traveling at their own risk, by reason of express conditions on the pass, or otherwise. However that may be, the defendant contends that, in procuring the pass, Miss Niles may properly be deemed to have acted as agent for those who accepted its benefits, and that the plaintiff is legally chargeable with the knowledge possessed by her agent.

But, in the view here taken of the law, it is unnecessary to determine whether either of the ladies traveling on the pass ever read the conditions on the back of it, or had actual knowledge of the terms on which it was granted. It was evidently issued to "Miss Niles and three ladies," or contained some equivalent general description of the beneficiaries intended. The plaintiff consented to become one of them. It is immaterial that she was not the actual custodian of the pass. When she availed herself of the privileges secured by it, it became her pass, as fully and effectually as that of Miss Niles. She knew that it was a mere gratuity, and she had an opportunity to ascertain if any conditions were attached to the gift. Her omission to inform herself of its terms could give her no additional rights. The acceptance of a conditional gift necessarily involves a compliance with the conditions. A person accepting and traveling upon a free pass, with conditions clearly expressed upon it, must be deemed to have accepted it on such conditions, whether he reads them or not. This doctrine is elementary in the law of contracts, and is distinctly supported by the authorities respecting agreements for the carriage of passengers, as well as contracts for the transportation of goods and other bailments.

In Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co., supra, the plaintiff was traveling on a free ticket which he had solicited as a pure gratuity from the general manager of the company. On the back of it was printed an agreement that he should assume all risk of accidents, and on the face of it were these words: "Provided he signs the agreement on the back hereof." In fact, however, this agreement was not signed by the plaintiff, but the court said: "The fact that the plaintiff had not signed it, and was not required to sign it, we do not regard as important. Having accepted the pass, he must have done so on the conditions fully expressed therein whether he actually read them or not." In Fonseca v. Cunard S. S. Co., 153 Mass. 553, 13 L. R. A. 84, it appeared that the plaintiff's attention was not called to the provisions of his passage ticket limiting the defendant's liability, but the court held that the defendant had a right to assume that he assented to its provisions, and that they were equally binding on him as if he had read them.

With respect to this question, the rules of law are applicable alike to contracts for the carriage of passengers and for the transportation of goods. In Hill v. Boston, H. T. & W. R. Co. 144 Mass. 284, there was a clause in the shipping agreement limiting the liability of the company to certain valuations. The plaintiff offered evidence that his agent never read the shipping agreement which he signed, although he had full opportunity to do so, and did not in fact know that it contained any valuation of the animals. But it was held that the plaintiff was bound by the agreement made in his behalf by his agent. So, in Squires v. New York Cent. R. Co., 98 Mass. 289, 98 Am. Dec. 162, it was held that the plaintiff was bound by a similar shipping agreement, although his agent signed it without reading it, or informing himself of its contents. See also, Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 505, 97 Am. Dec. 117, 1 Am. Rep. 181; Boston & M. Railroad v. Chipman, 146 Mass. 107; Hill v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 351, 29 Am. Rep. 168; Parker v. South Eastern R. Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 416; Harris v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 515. The same principle is illustrated in contracts other than for transportation. Reinstein v. Watts, 84 Me. 139, and authorities cited; Rice v. Dwight Mfg. Co. 2 Cush. 80; Monitor Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Buffum, 115 Mass. 843.

Upon this branch of the case at bar, the following instructions, among others, were requested by the defendant, viz.:

"A person accepting and traveling upon a free pass, with certain conditions upon it, must be deemed to have accepted it on such conditions, whether he reads and signs them or not."

"If the pass was written to 'Miss Niles and three ladies,' or in any other similar general terms, and the plaintiff accepted it, and intended to go upon it, as one of the ladies referred to in it, then the plaintiff would be bound by the terms of the pass, and cannot recover."

These requests were evidently prepared with direct reference to the authorities above cited and the principles above stated, but the presiding judge refused to give the former request, and, with respect to the latter, said to the jury: "I give you that with this addition: that if she accepted it, and knew the conditions that the pass imposed." The judge further instructed the jury upon this point, inter alia, as follows: "It is not sufficient that the writing was on the back of the pass which was in the hands of Miss Niles."

In order to relieve the defendant company from liability under that contract, the words written upon the back, placed there by the common carrier, must have been assented to by the person receiving the benefit of the pass. . . . If you should find that she expected to travel on a pass, simply, without knowing that any conditions were attached to it, . . . or if she never assented to the conditions, then the defendant would be liable for the negligence of its servants."

This language of the charge, in connection with the refusal to give the requested instructions, necessarily gave the jury to understand that something more was required of the plaintiff than the acceptance and use of the pass, to constitute an assent to the conditions imposed. This must be deemed erroneous.

3. The plaintiff finally sets up the more radical contention that the condition on the back of the pass is not a valid and binding one, for the reason that it is not competent for a common carrier of passengers to stipulate against liability for injuries arising from his negligence. It is accordingly insisted that the instruction of the presiding judge that the plaintiff could not recover if she assented to the terms of the pass, imposing nonliability as a condition of granting it, was too favorable to the defendant, and, even if there was error in the ruling above considered, respecting the evidence of such assent, the defendant is not aggrieved, and exceptions ought not to be sustained.

It is an undisputed fact, in evidence in this case, that there was no valuable consideration whatever for the granting of the pass. It was purely a matter of courtesy and gratuity. This court is thus, for the first time, brought face to face with the inquiry whether public policy will tolerate the exemption of a carrier from liability for injuries to free passengers, resulting from the negligence of his servants. The precise question has not often been decided in other jurisdictions, but it is one with respect to which courts of great respectability and high authority have reached opposite conclusions. It cannot be said that there is any established or prevailing American doctrine upon the question, and this court is free to adopt the view which seems to be most in harmony with the principles of justice and sound reason, and such considerations of public welfare as may be involved in the inquiry.

The general doctrine of bailments has always been subject to the watchful care and scrutiny of public policy, and the law of common carriers has undoubtedly been developed and molded under its controlling influence. But the carriage of passengers is not bailment, properly speaking; and, while there are obvious analogies between this service and the transportation of goods, the distinction between them, though practically modified in the progress of society, has never been abrogated by the law. A public carrier may transport both passengers and goods by the same conveyance and at the same time, but the nature of the responsibility incurred with respect to them is legally different. As a common carrier of goods, he is an insurer against everything but the act of God and the public enemies. As a carrier of passengers, he is liable for the utmost care and vigilance consistent with the character and mode of the conveyance, but is not accountable for failure to take every possible precaution against danger and accident. Libby v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 85 Me. 84, 20 L. R. A. 812, and authorities cited. It must be kept in mind, however, that a common carrier is one who undertakes, for hire, to transport the goods of all who choose to employ him, and that no person is in law deemed a common carrier who does not carry for hire. Edwards, Bailm. 426; Schouler, Bailm. § 405; Hutchinson, Carr. § 57. So when it is declared in Willis v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 62 Me. 489, to be well-settled law that common carriers cannot stipulate for exemption from responsibility for losses occasioned by the negligence of themselves or their servants, reference is had only to contracts to carry goods for hire. But ever since the "well-ordered exposition of the English law of bailments" in the celebrated case of Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 354, those who undertake the gratuitous carriage of goods are deemed private carriers, and held liable only as mandatories; that is, only for losses resulting from gross negligence. And these may, by contract, protect themselves against liability for all losses except those occasioned by their malfeasance or fraud. Hutchinson, Carr. § 14. It is true that in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, when a carrier has admitted a person to the rights of a passenger, he owes him the same care and protection, when traveling on a free pass, as when he has paid the usual fare. Otherwise than this, there seems to be nothing suggested by the analogies between the settled law of common carriers of goods and that of passenger carriers which militates against the right claimed for the latter to protect themselves by contract against liability for negligence with respect to gratuitous passengers.

It has been the tendency of the English courts, from an early period, to recognize the power of carriers to limit their liability with respect to both goods and passengers; and, under the construction given to the several acts of parliament in later years, a common carrier in England has practically unlimited power to provide by contract against liability for negligence. In McCawley v. Furness R. Co. (1872) L. R. 8 Q. B. 57, the plaintiff was traveling on a "drover's pass," which provided that he should travel at his own risk, and it was held that the defendant was not liable even for gross negligence. Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "It was agreed that the plaintiff should be carried at his own risk, which must be taken to exclude all liability on the part of the company for any negligence for which they would otherwise have been liable." Quain, J., said: "Negligence, even gross, is the very thing which the contract stipulates that the defendant shall not be liable for." See also, Gallin v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. 212; Alexander v. Toronto & N. R. Co. 38 U. C. Q. B. 474.

The decisions of the New York and New Jersey courts also fully sustain the right of the carrier to contract with free passengers against liability for all degrees of negligence, provided the exemption is in clear and unmistakable terms. Wells v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 181; Poucher v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 263; Maguin v. Dinwiddie, 56 N. Y. 168; Dorr v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. 11 N. Y. 485, 62 Am. Dec. 125; Kinney v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 82 N. J. L. 409, 90 Am. Dec. 675. See also, Western & A. R. Co. v. Bishop, 50 Ga. 465. Some courts seek to distinguish the different degrees of negligence, and concede the right to make such exemption as to a free passenger in all cases of ordinary negligence, but decline to extend the doctrine to cases of gross negligence. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Read, 87 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260; Indiana Cent. R. Co. v. Mundy, 21 Ind. 48, 83 Am. Dec. 339. And others refuse to give effect to any stipulation absolving the carrier from liability for any degree of negligence. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Pa. 315; Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. v. Curran, 19 Ohio St. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 362; Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 20 Minn. 125 (Gil. 110), 18 Am. Rep. 360; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, 65 Tex. 640.

In the great case of New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, the federal court reached the conclusion that a condition on a "drover's pass," requiring the person using it to travel at his own risk, was not a valid and effectual one and could not exonerate the carrier from liability for negligence. It is important to notice, however, that this decision is put on the ground that a drover's pass was issued as a part of the contract for the carriage of the cattle, and could not be deemed a gratuitous one. At the close of the elaborate opinion in the case is a distinct finding "that a drover traveling on a pass such as was given in this case, for the purpose of taking care of his stock on the train, is a passenger for hire." The same doctrine was applied in the later case of Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Stevens, 95 U. S. 655, 24 L. ed. 535. There the servant of an inventor obtained a pass to see an officer of the road in regard to the use of a new coupling. As in the case of the drover, it was held that he was a passenger for hire, and not bound by the condition that he should travel at his own risk. In each of these cases, it is explicitly stated that it was not the purpose of the court to express any opinion as to the result which might have been reached if the plaintiff had been a free passenger, instead of one for hire. These decisions of the federal court, therefore, have no application to the precise question here raised. See an interesting discussion of this question by Mr. Schouler in American Law Review for March-April, 1892.

On the other hand, the highest courts of Massachusetts and Connecticut, in able and exhaustive opinions of recent date, have held, confidently and without hesitation, that such special contracts, relieving the carrier from liability to free passengers, are not forbidden by any principle of public policy. Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 53 Conn. 371, 55 Am. Rep. 115; Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 865, 5 L. R. A. 846. In the former case (decided in 1885) the plaintiff's intestate was a youth employed by the keeper of a railroad restaurant, and had a free pass, conditioned that he should travel at his own risk. He used it especially in running on the train to sell fruit and sandwiches, but at the time of the accident was traveling on his private account, as the pass authorized him to do. The court, finding that the railway had no direct interest in the restaurant, or the traffic on the cars, decided that the plaintiff was strictly a free passenger; and, although he was killed in a collision resulting from the gross negligence of the defendant's servants, it was held, after a careful examination of the authorities, that he was bound by the terms of his pass, and the defendant was not liable.

But Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co., supra, is an important authority still more directly in point. In this case the plaintiff was unquestionably a free passenger. The pass was given him "at his own solicitation, and as a pure gratuity," with a condition upon it that he should "assume all risk of accident, of every name and nature." In the opinion, by Mr. Justice Devens, the court says: "In such instances, one who is ordinarily a common carrier does not act as such, but is simply in the position of a gratuitous bailee. . . . The service which he undertakes to render is outside of his regular duties. The plaintiff was in no way constrained to accept the gratuity of the defendant. It had been yielded to him only on his own solicitation. When he did, there is no rule of public policy we think, that prevented the carrier from prescribing, as the condition of it, that it should not be compelled, in addition to carrying the passenger gratuitously, to be responsible to him in damages for the negligence of its servants."

This result seems to be clearly in harmony with the principles of justice and common right. The term "public policy," or "policy of the law," suggests but a vague and uncertain principle, and sometimes seems to be invoked as authority for a decision when a more definite reason cannot readily be assigned. In what manner the public welfare or the safety of human life is involved, or any of the cherished interests of the law are invaded, by allowing one out of a hundred passengers to travel on a pass at his own risk, does not clearly and satisfactorily appear. In most instances, it is believed, free passes are solicited by the traveler, not proffered by the carrier. The fact that a gratuitous passenger must travel at his own risk will surely operate as an incentive to greater care and caution on his part, and tend to diminish the number of passes issued. The probability that the cases of free transit will be so numerous as to induce any relaxation of the rules of prudence and vigilance on the part of the carrier is too remote to have weight as argument. He is constantly, and, it would seem, sufficiently, reminded of his obligations to the public, in the most forcible and effectual manner, by the numerous claims and large verdicts in favor of those injured who travel for hire. Nor is the number of passes likely to be so great as to involve the public interest by an increase in the rates of fare. In this state, furthermore, the rates of fare on railroads are subject to the control of the legislature or the railroad commissioners. Rev. Stat. chap. 51, §§ 9, 43.

In this case there is no suggestion of defective appliances or incompetent servants. The gang plank was used continuously after the accident as before. It is claimed that there was negligence on the part of the defendant's servants in the adjustment and management of the gang plank, under the peculiar conditions existing at that time. It is not pretended that there was willful misconduct, and it cannot reasonably be claimed that there was gross negligence on the part of the defendant. There is therefore no occasion to draw a distinction between the degrees of negligence, if such a distinction is deemed legal and practicable in any case.

The conclusion is that one who accepts and uses a free pass, as a pure gratuity, on condition that he will assume all risk of personal injury, must be deemed to have accepted it on that condition, whether he reads it or not; and such a contract is not prohibited by any rule of public policy in this state but is effectual to exonerate the carrier from liability for the negligence of his servants.

1. Ice formed on water flowing land which has been taken in condemnation proceedings by a water supply company, belongs to the water company and not to the owner of the fee.
2. The right of a water company in lands flowed by it under the exercise of eminent domain is something more than a mere easement, and includes the right of exclusive occupation with all attendant riparian rights for such time as the land is held under the charter.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Belfast Water Company was incorporated by chapter 94 of Special Acts of 1887, "for the purpose of furnishing to the people of Belfast a supply of pure water for domestic, mechanical, and manufacturing purposes, and to the city of Belfast, water for the extinguishment of fires and other public uses." To effect these purposes, the company was authorized, by its charter, to "take as for public uses any real estate or easement therein, including the water of any ponds, streams, springs, or artesian wells, necessary for obtaining a sufficient supply of water, for the construction of reservoirs, and the laying of pipes," etc. It was also authorized to "erect and maintain all necessary dams, reservoirs, stand-pipes, and hydrants." Under this charter, the company took from various owners, in the manner provided in the charter, and for the purposes therein named, a strip of land on each side of a stream called Little river, in Northport. The land taken extended from near the mouth of the stream up both sides of the stream some 2,000 feet, more or less, and included upland on each side of the stream, and the flats, and the land under the stream. The company also, in the same way, condemned "the water of the stream."

A section of this strip of land was taken from the plaintiff, out of a larger parcel of land belonging to her. The section taken from her was about 100 feet wide, including upland, the flats, and the land under the stream to the middle line of the stream. The tides of the sea flowed at high water up this stream past the plaintiff's land, but ebbed entirely out at low water, leaving only the fresh-water stream. The plaintiff sought for, 25 L. R. A.

The company afterwards built a dam across the stream, below the land taken from the plaintiff, by which dam an artificial pond of fresh water was formed, and the inflow of the salt water was prevented. From this pond, the water was pumped into the company's pipes to supply the people and the city. Ice was cut and removed, by persons in the employ of the company, from that part of the artificial pond over the strip of land taken from the plaintiff. For this removal of ice, this action of trover was begun by the plaintiff, and is brought to the law court on report.

The plaintiff, before the condemnation of her land, had no property in the water of the stream, either in its liquid or frozen state. Her rights in either kind of water were simply those of an ordinary riparian owner,—to take of the water, as it flowed past or rested upon her land, such limited quantity as would not appreciably diminish the flow or supply to the riparian owners below. In the absence of modifying deeds or contracts, this riparian right is annexed to the possession of the land, and belongs to, and may be exercised by, the tenant in possession, however small his estate, even if he be tenant at will only. It is evident, therefore, that if the company, after condemnation, became the tenant in possession of this strip, and had the right of exclusive possession, then this action cannot be maintained, as there was no injury to the reversionary interest. We think the company did become at least a tenant in possession, and has the right of exclusive possession so long as it occupies the strip for the purposes for which the land and water were taken.

The plaintiff urges that her remaining rights in the land and water are equal and similar to those of a riparian owner whose land is flowed under the mill act, and she confidently cites Stevens v. Kelley, 78 Me. 445, 57 Am. Rep. 813. There is, however, a manifest difference between the two cases and the two situations. Under the mill act, the mill owner is not authorized to take land, nor does he assume to take land. He is merely authorized to flow the land, and that is all he assumes to do. The landowner retains his possession, and with it all his riparian rights except the right to have the water flow from his land as freely as it naturally would. The flowing of his land puts no other restraint upon his use of the water.

The plaintiff again likens her right to that of a landowner over whose land a highway has been laid out. She cites many cases illustrative of that right. Here, again, the difference is plainly seen. When a road is located, the land is not "taken," in the technical sense of that term. No authority is given any person or corporation to "take" land for a highway. The highway is located or "laid out" over the land directly by public authority. Such laying out is simply imposing a public easement upon the land. The public acquire only the right of passage, with the incidental right of facilitating that passage by constructing and keeping in repair a road within the lines of the location. The exercise of this right by the public does not ordinarily require the continual and exclusive occupation of the entire width of the location, hence the landowner retains such rights of possession as the public does not need.

The Belfast Water Company is required by its charter to furnish the city and people of Belfast with an abundant supply of pure water at all seasons. It must care for the quality, as well as the quantity, of water to be supplied. It must, therefore, provide large reservoirs for the storage of water, and must guard the water in them against all danger of contamination. It has made a reservoir of large extent by taking land for a long distance under and on both sides of Little river, and by building a dam near its mouth. This reservoir it must maintain, control, and guard at all times, so as to preserve the quantity and purity of the water. To do this requires, in the company, the right of exclusive possession of all the land under and about the pond, or reservoir,—of all the land taken. It must have the right to keep every person away from the water and the reservoir. Reading v. Davis, 158 Pa. 860. The riparian rights which the plaintiff insists that she retains are the very rights the company most needs to effectuate the purposes of its charter. They are the rights which the company sought for in selecting the land taken. It is to be presumed that the value of these attendant riparian rights was considered in the appraisal of the damages, and was included in the award. Ham v. Salem, 100 Mass. 850. By its condemnation of this land, the company has paid for and obtained, not the fee, perhaps, but certainly something more than a mere easement in the land. It has acquired the right of exclusive occupation, and, with this, all the attendant riparian rights, for such time as it holds the land under its charter.

The rights of a water company in land taken for the purposes of its charter are analogous to those of a railroad company in land taken for its railroad. The rights of the latter to the exclusive possession of such land are satisfactorily expounded in Hayden v. Skillings, 78 Me. 418; Lander v. Bath, 85 Me. 141; and in Peirce v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 141 Mass. 481. These cases will shed light upon the question which has been considered here.

It follows that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action.

Plaintiff nonsuited.

v.
GOULDSBORO LAND IMPROVEMENT

(.....Me.....)

A way of access by water to land bordering on the sea is sufficient to prevent a right of way from necessity across land of the grantor which encloses it on the land side.

NOTE.—For a collection of authorities upon the question of right of way by necessity, see notes to Logan v. Stogdale (Ind.) 8 L. R. A. 58. 25 L. R. A.

dering on the sea is sufficient to prevent a right of way from necessity across land of the grantor which encloses it on the land side.

(February 26, 1894.)

R EPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Hancock County for the opinion of the law court of an action brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass by defendant upon plaintiff's property. Judgment for plaintiff.

The declaration alleged that defendant, by its agents, with force and arms broke and entered plaintiff's close, cut down and destroyed timber and underbrush, broke down and carried away fences, blasted, dug up and carried away a large quantity of rock and granite, dug up and carried away earth and converted a large portion of the close into a traveled road.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Peters, Jr., for plaintiff:

When a man inconsiderately or accidentally conveys his land in such a way as to leave a portion of it inaccessible without trespass, and therefore useless, the courts relieve the owner of the inaccessible tract by establishing the fiction of an implied grant of a right of way.

Whitehouse v. Cummings, 88 Me. 96.

The defendant's obvious, most convenient and most used means of access to its land is by water.

The right of way will not be implied if merely convenient.

Whitehouse v. Cummings, supra; Stillwell v. Foster, 80 Me. 844; Warren v. Blake, 54 Me. 276, 69 Am. Dec. 748.

The right to cross the plaintiff's land cannot be called a right of way by necessity when it is shown to be only used as a convenience.

See extended notes to Pettingill v. Porter, 85 Am. Dec. 675, and to Cooper v. Maupin, 85 Am. Dec. 464.

This special case of access by water has been decided very infrequently.

Lawton v. Rivers, 2 McCord, L. 445, 18 Am. Dec. 743; Turnbull v. Rivers, 8 McCord, L. 181, 15 Am. Dec. 623; Screen v. Gregoris, 8 Rich. L. 158, 64 Am. Dec. 748.

There is not a presumption in all cases that a right of way was intended to be reserved.

Richards v. Attleborough Branch R. Co. 153 Mass. 122.

If the defendants intend to establish an easement by necessity over the property of the plaintiff the burden is upon them to show the necessity.

Stuyvesant v. Woodruff, 31 N. J. L. 133, 47 Am. Dec. 159; Dollif v. Boston & M. R. Co. 68 Me. 178.

Mr. Bedford E. Tracy for defendant.

Foster, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Notwithstanding this is an action of trespass, the real and only question involved is whether the defendant is entitled to a way from necessity over the plaintiff's premises.

The defendant's land embraces what is properly known as "Grindstone Neck," in the town of Gouldsborough, and is surrounded on three sides by the waters of Frenchman's bay and Winter harbor. On the north, and adjoining the defendant's land, lies the land of the plaintiff, over which the way is claimed.

Admitting that both parcels were originally owned by one William Bingham, through whom, by sundry mesne conveyances, both parties derive their respective titles, we do not think the defendant entitled to the way as one originating from necessity. Such right is founded upon the doctrine of implied grant. And implied grants of this character are looked upon with jealousy, construed with strictness, and are not favored except in cases of strict necessity, and not from mere convenience. The rule is now so well settled in this state that a reference to the decided cases where this question has been fully considered is all that is necessary.

Warren v. Blake, 54 Me. 276, 89 Am. Dec. 743; Dollif v. Boston & M. R. Co. 68 Me. 173; Stevens v. Orr, 69 Me. 323; Stillwell v. Foster, 80 Me. 333; Whitehouse v. Cummings, 88 Me. 91.

It has long been the established rule that if one grants a close surrounded by his own land, or to which he has no access except over his own land, he impliedly grants a right of way over his adjoining lands as incident to the occupation and enjoyment of the grant. Nichols v. Luce, 24 Pick. 102, 85 Am. Dec. 302. And the same rule applies when there has been a severance of the property, one portion of which has been rendered inaccessible except by passing over the other, or by trespassing on the lands of a stranger.

Whether the same rule shall apply in a case like the present, where the property to which the right of way is claimed is partially surrounded by the sea, presents a question somewhat different from any decided case in this state. It has, however, been before the courts in other jurisdictions, and there it was held that the rule did not apply.

Thus, in Lawton v. Rivers, 2 McCord, L. 445, 13 Am. Dec. 741, the court in South Carolina decided that the plaintiff, owner of an island separated by a river from another island, and this island being connected at low tide by a hard marsh with a third island, owned by the defendant, did not have a right of way by necessity from the public way over the defendant's plantation connecting with the road or path leading from the second island to the river opposite to the plaintiff's island. After stating the general rule of law governing rights of way from necessity, the court says: "It is apparent, however, that no such necessity existed in this case. The plaintiff has a navigable watercourse from his door to the public road or highway, by which the distance is not greater than by land; and although there may be some inconvenience in being obliged always to go by water, when he visits this plantation, yet it is not greater than necessarily attends every insular situation, and perhaps not so great to him as it would be to his neighbor to keep up a lane through his plantation for his accommodation."

Turnbull v. Rivers, 3 McCord, L. 181, 15 Am. Dec. 622, is another case in the same state, where the plaintiff claimed a way across the defendant's land, called "Stent's Point," to his island, and was decided upon the principles laid down in the preceding case. The court there held that, if the land could be reached by water, or by a distant or difficult road, no way from necessity could be said to exist. In the course of the opinion Nott, J., makes use of this language: "In analogy with that case, suppose one person should sell to another the extreme point of a neck or tongue of land surrounded by an open sea or navigable stream, except on one side, would it be understood that the seller should allow him a right of way through the whole neck of land because sometimes it would be more convenient for him to go to his farm by land than by water? I should suppose not."

In the present case the defendant's land has navigable waters on three sides of it. Over these waters there is a public right of travel. The defendant has the free use of these waters in going to and from its land. It has erected wharves, and owns a steamboat, which during certain portions of the year runs several times each day between there and Bar Harbor, and, as occasion requires, to Winter Harbor, on the east. To the latter place it is only three quarters of a mile by the way of the road or by water. It might oftentimes be more convenient to pass over a highway, or across the plaintiff's premises, than be subjected to the inconvenience of using the waters of the sea. But this inconvenience is not such as the law requires to constitute a legal necessity for the way claimed.

Nor can the defendant prevail upon the question of license. There was no such license as would entitle the defendant to enter upon the plaintiff's premises, and commit the acts which the evidence shows were done in this case.

According to the stipulation in the report, the entry must be, judgment for the plaintiff.

v.

Job ABBOTT & al.

(.....Me.....)

An offer of reward for the detection of a criminal, although unlimited as to time and never withdrawn, is merely a proposal which, if not accepted by performance within a reasonable time is conclusively presumed by law to be revoked.

(March 21, 1894.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for the Somerset County for the opinion of the whole court of an action brought to recover a reward which had been offered by defendants, officers of the Dexter Savings Bank, for the detection of the persons who had murdered the treasurer of the bank. Judgment for defendants.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Walton & Walton for plaintiff. Messrs. Crosby & Crosby, for defendants:

NOTE.—The above decision is in accord with that of Shaub v. Lancaster, 21 L. R. A. 691, 155 Pa. 322, but direct authority upon the question seems to be limited.

Trustees of a savings bank are the agents of the bank.

They had authority by virtue of their position to make such an offer on behalf of the corporation.

Ricord v. Central Pac. R. Co. 15 Nev. 167; American Etep. Co. v. Patterson, 78 Ind. 480; Kelsey v. National Bank of Crawford County, 69 Pa. 426; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 424; Simpson v. Garland, 73 Me. 40, 89 Am. Rep. 297; Purinton v. Security L. Ins. & Annuity Co. 72 Me. 23; Nobleboro v. Clark, 68 Me. 87, 28 Am. Rep. 22; Winship v. Smith, 61 Me. 118; Mann v. Chandler, 9 Mass. 385.

The offer was not accepted or acted upon within a reasonable time.

Loring v. Boston, 7 Met. 409.

Is the question of the detection of the murderers open to the defendants? It is admitted that there is a record of the conviction of Stain and Cromwell, but defendants say that, notwithstanding that conviction, Stain and Cromwell were not the real murderers, in fact that there was no murder at all, but that Barron committed suicide.

These defendants were not parties to the case. State of Maine v. Stain and Cromwell. They did not appear and did not have any right to appear in the case more than the most insignificant men in Christendom. They are now summoned into court and simply ask for those rights to which every citizen and every human being is entitled.

Even a plea of guilty in a criminal case is only evidence of confession and is not conclusive in a civil case against the same party.

1 Greenl. Ev. 587, note, see § 556, Inquisitions.

In an action to recover a reward for the detection and conviction of an offender, the record of conviction is not conclusive evidence of his guilt.

Mead v. Boston, 8 Cush. 404.

Even admissions in a deed are only binding upon parties and privies.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 211; Buttrick v. Holden, 8 Cush. 283.

Wiswell, J., delivered the opinion of the court :

The plaintiff alleges that on the 28d day of February, 1878, the defendants published an offer of a reward; that upon the 31st day of March, 1880, the plaintiff performed the service which entitled him to the reward, in accordance with the terms of the offer.

Various objections to the maintenance of the suit are suggested and argued by the defendants' counsel. It is only necessary to consider one, which, we think, is an insuperable objection to the maintenance of the action, unless there are facts other than those set out in the plaintiffs' declaration, viz., that the offer of reward was a proposal to continue for a reasonable time only, and that it ceased to be a proposal long before the time when the plaintiff alleges he accepted it by a performance of the service for which the reward was to be paid.

The legal principles applicable to an offer of reward for the detection of an offender or the recovery of property are well understood. Such an offer is a proposal merely; if acted upon before revocation, the offer and acceptance by a performance become a valid contract for a sufficient consideration. It may be revoked at any time before it is acted upon.

The offer in this case was unlimited as to time, and, so far as we know, was never withdrawn by the act of those making it. We think that the proper construction of such a proposal is, as contended by the defendants, that it must be accepted by performance within a reasonable time, and that the law will, in the absence of other facts, conclusively presume a revocation after a reasonable time. Otherwise, it would be a perpetually continuing offer for all time. The statute of limitations would furnish no relief, nor limit the continuance of the offer, provided only that the action be commenced within the statutory period after performance. Such a construction would be most unreasonable, and one that could neither have been intended by the persons making the offer, nor contemplated by one who, twelve years later, was instrumental in bringing about the detection of the offender.

Our view is fully sustained by the Massachusetts court in the case of Loring v. Boston, 7 Met. 409. In that case a lapse of three years and eight months was held to be beyond a reasonable time.

In this case it was not necessary to decide what would be a reasonable time during which the offer would continue. A lapse of more than twelve years between the time of making the offer and the time of performance is certainly much more than a reasonable time. We are forced to presume, therefore, a withdrawal or revocation of the offer before the time of acceptance.

The defendants filed a demurrer. The case was then reported to the law court for the determination of certain questions. Counsel upon both sides expressed a desire that the question considered, although not specially raised in the report, should be decided. This question is raised by the general demurrer, and we have considered it alone because, unless the plaintiff can show other facts and circumstances than those alleged, it finally determines the rights of the plaintiff in this or any other action brought to recover this reward.

The plaintiff will have the right to amend the declaration at nisi prius, upon terms, if there are any other facts which can avail him.

STATE of Maine

v.

Herbert A. EDWARDS et al.

1. A contract to pay greater toll for

NOTE.—The interesting and important question of the right of the state to exercise a supervision and control over property which has been devoted by the owner to public use has been discussed in the cases of People v. Budd (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 558, and New York & C. Grain & Stock Exchange v. Chicago Board of Trade (Ill.) 2 L. R. A. 411.

grinding at a public mill than that fixed by statute is invalid and constitutes no defence for taking excessive tolls.

3. A statute limiting the amount of toll which may be taken by a water mill which does grinding for the public is not unconstitutional.

(December 19, 1893.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Superior Court of Aroostook County made during the trial of a proceeding against defendants for demanding and receiving excessive tolls for grinding grain, which resulted in a verdict for conviction. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Daggett, County-Atty., for the State.

Mr. Louis C. Stearns for defendants.

Haskell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were convicted under Rev. Stat., chap. 57, §§ 5, 6, as amended by the Act of 1885, chapter 332, on two several counts—First, of refusing to receive grain at their gristmill, there tendered to be ground; second, of taking excessive toll. The defendants have excepted to the ruling of the court that they were bound to receive the grists of grain offered, and grind the same for the toll specified by the statute, and that an agreement for toll in excess of that fixed by statute would be no defense.

The case does not show what kind of a mill the defendants operated, nor whether it was a public or private mill, nor whether it was a water mill, steam mill, or wind mill. It assumes, however, that it was a gristmill, used for grinding grain for the public.

Exceptions must show sufficient facts to make the ruling erroneous. Reed v. Reed, 70 Me. 504. In this case, therefore, if the ruling excepted to be correct, and the statute under which the conviction was had be constitutional when applied to any kind of a gristmill, judgment must be entered on the verdict. And it may be assumed that defendants' mill was a public gristmill, propelled by a head of water obtained under authority of the mill act. Rev. Stat. chap. 92.

Assuming the mill to be a public mill, and the statute under which the conviction was had to be valid, an agreement between the owner of the grain and the defendants, for toll in excess of the statute quantity, can be no defense. The act of the defendants in taking excessive toll was just as much in defiance and violation of the statute, when taken by agreement with the owner of the grist, as if taken without his consent. The defendants' act is prohibited by the statute. They were required to run their public mill, for statute toll, with equal dispatch for all the patrons of their mill. They were required to receive grists and grind them in their turn, without motive for unequal dispatch to those willing to pay an extra price for it. The taking of usury by agreement with the borrower of money is analogous. Freedom from blame on the part of the lender is not a bar to the borrower's right to recover back the usury. Houghton v. Howell, 28 Me. 25 L. R. A.

§15. The statute under which the conviction was had imposes on such condition.

But it is stoutly asserted that the statute is unconstitutional, as an invasion of the private right of enjoyment of property. The mill act of Maine applies to all water mills; and whether its validity results from the exercise of eminent domain as supposed by many cases (Jordan v. Woodward, 40 Me. 317; Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Pernald, 47 N. H. 444; Olmstead v. Camp, 33 Conn. 583; and others cited by Gould, Waters, § 253; and by the supreme court in Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 118 U. S. 9, 28 L. ed. 889), or from the proper regulation of the rights of riparian owners, so as to best serve the public welfare, having due regard to the interests of all, as held in Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. supra, and in Murdock v. Stickney, 8 Cush. 113, and remarked by the court in Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 466, 15 Am. Rep. 39, it is unnecessary now to consider.

It is conceded by all authorities that the public use of property by the individual is within the scope of legislative control; and it matters not whether the use be authorized by express statute or dedicated by the individual proprietor. If it be a public use, it is within the supervision and control of the legislature. The troublesome question is whether the use be public. Tyler v. Beach, 44 Vt. 648, 8 Am. Rep. 898. In most branches of business the public has an interest. That interest varies, according to the surrounding conditions of the particular business in question. If it be a monopoly, the interest of the public to be fairly and conveniently served is much greater than when the monopoly ends by force of wholesome competition. A distinction must be made between a public use and a use in which the public has an interest. In the former case, the public may control, because it is a use within the function of government to establish and maintain. In the latter case, it is a private enterprise that serves the public, and in which it is interested to the extent of its necessities and convenience. The former is clearly within the control of the legislature, while the latter may not be. Many authorities, however, go to that extent. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, and cases cited. The public is interested to be well and reasonably served at the store of the tradesman, the shop of the mechanic, and the office of the professional man, and yet all these vocations are private. The goods on sale in the store, material furnished by the mechanic, and the skill employed by the professional man are the individual property of each one, respectively. Their vocations are exercised for their own gain, and they have a right to the fruits of their own industry, without legislative control. It must not be understood that each one may not be properly subjected to suitable police regulations as to the manner of his business (3 Kent, Com. 840), but the business cannot be thereby controlled, and the profits to be gained therefrom destroyed, taken away, or limited by the establishment of prices; otherwise, we should have a paternal government that might crush out all individual liberty, and the declaration of our constitution would become as valueless as stubble.

It is conceded by all authorities that common carriers, common ferries, common roads, common wharves, common telegraphs, and common telephones, etc., and common grist-mills, and common lumber mills are of that public nature, to be put under public control, whether operated under the authority of charters from the state, or by individual enterprise. Each of those cases is within the function of government to establish and maintain, and, therefore, to control, by whomsoever exercised. Blair v. Cuming County, 111 U. S. 368, 23 L. ed. 457; Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. supra; Stone v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970.

Mills for the grinding of grain and for the sawing of lumber for all comers have been aided or established by the legislature from the earliest colonial times. Those mills were usually water mills; but it is of no moment what the propelling power may be. Burlington Twp. v. Beasley, 94 U. S. 310, 24 L. ed. 161. They have always been considered so necessary for the existence of the community that it was proper for government to foster or maintain them. And, in the absence of government aid, the individual proprietor, not pretending to serve the public, might maintain such mills as private mills, free from legislative interference, precisely as he might maintain a store, shop, or other private business; but when such proprietor makes his mill public, assumes to serve the public, then he dedicates his mill to public use, and it becomes a public mill, subject to public regulation and control. He is not compelled to continue such public use, but, so long as he does, he becomes a public servant, and may be regulated by the public.

In the present case, the mill must be considered a public mill, and rightfully within legislative control. No suggestion is made that the statute regulation is unreasonable, and therefore it is unimportant to consider whether the reasonableness of the statute regulation be a legislative or judicial function.

Exceptions overruled.

A justice is not personally liable for ordering the exclusion of spectators from his court-room and the actual removal of a person by an officer under his direction, where he acts in the mistaken belief that the case is one which he is justified in conducting with closed doors.

(December 5, 1908.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Lincoln County for the opinion of the law term of an action against defendant, a trial justice, for excluding plaintiff, a spectator at a trial before the justice, from the court-room. Judgment of nonsuit.

As special matter of defense defendant stated that deeming it wise in the interests of justice and the proper and orderly conduct of the trial that all spectators should be excluded from the trial, and the same be conducted in the presence of the parties and witnesses only, he requested plaintiff to depart, which the plaintiff wholly refused to do but continued therein in contempt of defendant as trial justice, and to the disturbance and violation of good order and decency in the administration of justice and to the great hindrance thereof, and therefore defendant requested an officer to remove plaintiff from the room.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. W. E. Hogan for plaintiff.

Messrs. Baker, Baker & Cornish for defendant.

Peters, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is an undeniable proposition to start with in this discussion that courts of justice should be open to the public. That is the rule. History brings to us too vivid pictures of the oppressions endured by our English ancestors at the hands of arbitrary court ever to satisfy the people of this country with courts whose doors are closed against them. They instinctively believe that it is their right to witness judicial trials and proceedings in the courts.

It is true that courts have discretionary powers to be exercised in such a matter, but not an unlimited discretion. The almost boundless authority exercised by the court of star chamber in England was the seed of its own destruction, and was its historical infamy. Its lessons are not lost on the courts of to-day. We never knew of any court of general jurisdiction in this state conducting a strictly private criminal trial, nor, before this, of such a trial before a common magistrate. The defendant testifies that he never before held a private court during his eighteen years' experience as a magistrate.

Mr. Cooley, in his book on Constitutional Limitations (page 312), remarks on the general subject as follows: "It is also requisite that the trial be public. By this is not meant that every person who sees fit shall in all cases be permitted to attend criminal trials, because there are many cases where, from the character of the charge and the nature of the evidence by which it is to be supported, the motives to attend the trial on the part of portions of the community would be of the worst character, and where a regard to public morals and public decency would require that at least the young be excluded from hearing and witnessing the evidences of human depravity which the trial must necessarily bring to light. The requirement of a public trial is for the benefit of the accused; that the public may see he is fairly dealt with, and not unjustly condemned; and that the presence of interested spectators may keep his triers keenly alive to a sense of their responsibility and to the importance of their functions; and the requirement is fairly met with it, without partiality or favoritism, a reasonable proportion of the public is suffered to attend, notwithstanding that those persons whose presence could be of no service to the accused, and who would be drawn thither by a prurient curiosity, are excluded altogether."

We cannot doubt that it was an unwise exercise of discretion for the defendant to expel forcibly from his court-room on the occasion in question all persons but the parties and witnesses. The accused persons had no witnesses, and they were left without the presence of friends. There was room enough for all the spectators to be seated without the discomfort of any one. There was no inclination on the part of any one to create a disturbance, nor was any such state of things apprehended. The magistrate testifies that his order was not based on any such ground, and he declined, as a witness, to specify any reason for the order, further than to say that he acted upon his judgment that the demands of justice required it. It appears that one of the prisoners who were to be tried was complained of for adultery, and that he and his wife were complained of for an affray, and the cases were tried separately and privately. The complainant in the two cases, whose daughter was to be a witness, requested private trials, but the magistrate does not admit that her request influenced him at all, although he states that there were to be five female witnesses at the trials. The prisoners were committed to jail for want of bail, where they remained many months, until the grand jury met, which found a bill that was abandoned without a trial.

It is better for the public interest that such trials be conducted in the presence of a responsible portion of the community. Public trials have a tendency to prevent waste of the public money. The persons ejected from the court-room were among the principal citizens of the county, comprising leading members of the bar, county commissioners, clerk of the courts, county treasurer, and others of the highest respectability in that community. It is idle to charge against such a body of men that they crowded the court-room for any unjustifiable purpose. Much more decorous would it be to conceive that they distrusted the propriety of the prosecutions, and were present because they were interested in the orderly and economical administration of justice. Apparently some of them were present because they were acquaintances and friends of the accused. They were gentlemen capable of being good judges of their own conduct.

There is a lack of particular authority on the questions arising in this case, for the reason that so few private trials have anywhere been held. State v. Copp, 15 N. H. 212, is cited by the defense. There a person was removed from a court-room because he offensively insisted in keeping a seat so near to the magistrate as to personally embarrass him in the performance of his duties. And the court there remarks: "But the law does not authorize any court to act arbitrarily, and unreasonably exclude persons, but the right to have the courts open is the right of the people, and not of the individual." It would seem that in the case at bar the public right was well represented by the numerous personages who sought to be present in court. Garnett v. Ferrand, 6 Barn. & C. 611,—the other case cited by the defense,—was a case where a person unreasonably and obnoxiously intruded himself before a coroner's inquest held upon the body of a deceased person of no interest personally to the intruder. That case went upon the ground that a coroner's court in England is a court of record, and of high privilege, and that no action is maintainable against any coroner for an act done by him when sitting in a judicial capacity and acting within his jurisdiction.

But the more practical question in the present case is as to the rule of the liability of judges who commit errors in the proceedings in their courts injuriously affecting other persons. It is universally admitted that a judge of a court of record is not liable at common law for any act he does as judge, while acting within his jurisdiction. No action lies against him, whatever his act, or the motive for the act, may be.

The same policy of the law, which affords such absolute protection to the judges of the higher courts for their acts, also affords a very great immunity to those who administer justice in courts that are of a lesser grade than strictly courts of record. The same policy prevails in either case, affording in the one instance a complete protection against a liability to private action, and in the other a reasonable though partial protection.

Lord Tenterden, in the case of Garnett v. Ferrand, supra, hits the subject with these observations: "This freedom from action and question at the suit of an individual is given by the law to the judges, not so much for their own sake as for the sake of the public, and for the advancement of justice that, being free from actions, they may be free in thought and independent in judgment, as all who are to administer justice ought to be. And it is not to be supposed beforehand that those who are selected for the administration of justice will make an ill use of the authority vested in them. Even inferior justices, and those not of record, cannot be called in question for an error in judgment, so long as they act within the bounds of their jurisdiction. In the Imperfection of human nature it is better, even, that an individual should occasionally suffer a wrong than that the general courts of justice should be impeded and fettered by constant and perpetual restraints and apprehensions on the part of those who are to administer it. Corruption is quite another matter. So, also, are neglect of duty and misconduct in it. For these, I trust, there is, and will always be, some due course of punishment by public prosecution."

The general rule of liability, therefore, of a judge of a court not of record, as deducible from the authorities, is that a judge of such a court is not liable personally for any injury sustained by any one which is the result of honest error of judgment, in a matter where the court has jurisdiction, and where the act done is not of a purely ministerial character. See, on this subject, a collection of cases, and the discussion of them, in 15 American Law Review, 427.

If an inferior magistrate, however, acts unreasonably and arbitrarily, or from malicious motives, and thereby inflicts an injury upon a person, he may be liable in an action therefor. But it must be a case of direct injury or indignity to the individual.

We cannot with any certainty decide, from the facts before us, that the defendant did not act from honest motive, and according to his best judgment. He seems to have been in some degree influenced by suggestions from the officer in attendance upon his court, and in all probability he actually believed, however mistakenly, that the delicacy of the situation would justify the proceedings with closed doors.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

Josephine HICKS et al., Repts.,

v.

CITIZENS' R. CO., Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. Whether a cable car was run closer to a buggy on the track than was prudent, and whether there was negligence in failing to stop it to allow the buggy to leave the track, is a question for the jury.
2. Whether a person driving on a street-car track could have left it more expeditiously than he did and by so doing have avoided an injury received from the car is a question for the jury.
3. It is not necessarily negligent for a cable car to follow after a buggy which is seen upon the track, when running slowly enough so that it can be stopped in time to avoid a collision.

(July 9, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Macfarlane, J.:

This is a suit by plaintiffs, as husband and wife, to recover damages for personal injuries received by the wife, on account of the alleged negligence of defendant's employes in running and managing a train of its cable-cars in the city of St. Louis. The petition

NOTE.—Injuries by street-car collisions with vehicles or horses.

Horses or vehicles, caught in dangerous places.

Street-car companies are liable for injuries caused to persons, horses, and vehicles caught in narrow or dangerous places, or standing near the track, where such injury was caused by the negligence of the company and such person injured was without negligence and unable to get out of the way, and the question of negligence and contributory negligence is for the jury. This has been held in cases against electric car companies. Greeley v. Federal Street & P. V. Pass. R. Co. 153 Pa. 218; Kestner v. Pittsburgh & B. Traction Co. 158 Pa. 422; Gibbons v. Wilkes-Barre & S. Street R. Co. 155 Pa. 279; Citizens Street Railway v. Steen, 42 Ark. 321; Omaha Street R. Co. v. Duvall (Neb.) April 3, 1894.

And a horse-car company is also liable in the same manner. Cook v. Metropolitan E. Co. 98 Mass. 361; Laethem v. Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. (Mich.) May 18, 1894; Koch v. St. Paul City R. Co. 45 Minn. 407; Brooks v. Lincoln Street R. Co. 22 Neb. 324; Weyant v. New York & H. R. Co. 8 Duer, 360; Berke v. Twenty-Third Street R. Co. 22 N. Y. S. R. 492; Mullen v. Central Park & E. R. R. Co. 1 Misc. 216; Lawrence v. Pendleton Street R. Co. 1 Cin. Super. Ct. Rep. 180.

And a recovery was allowed where plaintiff drove his horse to the curb, and hitched him, while he delivered a parcel, believing there was room for the car, and a collision occurred by negligence of car company. Albert v. Bleeker Street R. Co. 2 Daly, 339.

But a teamster placing his team directly across the track of an electric car on a dark night without necessity, cannot recover in absence of evidence of negligence on part of company. Winter v. Federal Street & P. V. R. Co. 19 L. R. A. 232, 158 Pa. 20.

So driving across the track and leaving the horse standing with feet in the gutter of the street, but with the wagon near enough to collide with horse-car, will bar a recovery on account of contributory negligence, unless the street-car driver knew that it would collide. Spaulding v. Jarvis, 23 Hun, 621.

So where a teamster negligently kept his team near a steam motor track and the horse backed or danced on the track, where the company was not negligent, there could be no recovery. Coughtry v. Willamette Street R. Co. 21 Or. 245; Brookline-hurst v. Manchester, B. R. & O. Steam Tramways Co. L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 118, 55 L. T. N. S. 408, 34 Week. Rep. 568, 51 J. P. 55.

In the latter case 33 & 34 Vict. chap. 78, making the company liable for injury caused by act of the company was held to mean "wrongful act."

And there can be no recovery where both the driver of the vehicle and the driver of the horse-car believed that there was sufficient room for safe passage. Patton v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 133 Pa. 78; McKelvey v. Twenty-Third Street R. Co. 5 Misc. 424.

Injuries at street crossings.

It is generally held that street railroads have no superior right of way over vehicles at street crossings, and the company will be liable for negligence of its employes in failing to have the car under control at such place, thereby causing injury to persons with vehicles; and the question of negligence and contributory negligence is for the jury. This has been held in regard to electric cars. Watson v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 53 Minn. 551; Hickman v. Union Depot R. Co. 47 Mo. App. 66.

makes the following charge of negligence: "That said injuries were occasioned by the negligence and lack of care on the part of defendant's agents and servants while operating defendant's said cars, in this: that said defendant saw, or by the exercise of reasonable care and foresight might have seen, plaintiffs' buggy on its right of way, and consequently plaintiffs' imminent danger; but notwithstanding the facts aforesaid, and regardless of its duty to operate its cars with skill and care, defendant, without having rung any alarm bell or in any wise having notified plaintiffs of its approach on said right of way, negligently and carelessly allowed the grip-car to which was attached said train of cars to run into and break plaintiffs' buggy, thereby causing the injury above complained of." The manner and cause of the injury are thus stated: "Plaintiffs were driving in a top buggy, in a westerly direction, along Easton avenue. A train of defendant's cars, propelled as aforesaid, and in charge of its servants and agents, struck and collided with the rear of the vehicle in which plaintiffs were seated, at a point on said Easton avenue just west of Thomas street, and that the shock of the collision was such that plaintiffs' vehicle was broken, and they were precipitated to the ground." The character of the injuries is charged to have been a shock to nervous system, causing her eyesight to become impaired, and affecting her mental condition, and causing her to have frequent and serious hemorrhages, so that, ever since the accident, plaintiff has suffered great and continual physical pain and mental anguish. The answer was a general denial, and a plea of contributory negligence. The judgment was for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

The evidence shows that Easton avenue is a public street, running in an easterly and westwardly direction, through the city of St. Louis. On this street defendant operates two tracks of its cable railway. A space of only 11 feet is left on the north side of the street between the track of the railway and the curbing. Thomas street runs into Easton avenue from the northwest, at an angle of about 88 degrees. On the 22d day of April, 1891, plaintiffs, in a single top buggy, drove north up Thomas street into the north side of Easton avenue. About 50 feet from the intersection, a horse, attached to a buggy, was standing on the street, thus occupying and obstructing the greater portion of the 11-foot space between the railroad track and the foot-walk. Plaintiffs, in order to pass this buggy, were required to drive upon the railway track. At the time plaintiffs undertook to pass round this standing buggy, a train of cars was approaching from the north, on Easton avenue, and on the north track of the road. The customary warnings of this approach were given by the employes in charge of the cars, but these Mrs. Hicks testified she did not hear. The cars reduced their speed to about the rate at which plaintiffs were moving, and, when the latter got upon the track, the cars were within a few feet of the buggy, and slowly following it, making sig-

And the same has been held in regard to cable-car companies. Pope v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 90 Mo. 400.

And the same was held with regard to horse-car companies. O'Neil v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 129 N. Y. 125.

The sudden stopping of a street-car contrary to city ordinance, on a street crossing in front of a funeral procession, causing the carriage pole of one of the carriages to crash into a carriage in front of it, is such negligence as will authorize a recovery for damages. Mueller v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 21 L. R. A. 721, 86 Wis. 240.

But in Smith v. Citizens R. Co., 53 Mo. App. 36, it was held that where a driver of a vehicle whipped his horse forward, when ten feet from cable-car track, and the car was only twenty feet distant coming rapidly, and the gripman used all appliances to stop the car, there could be no recovery.

And in Carson v. Federal Street & P. V. R. Co., 15 L. R. A. 257, 147 Pa. 219, it was held that the failure of a driver of a vehicle to look out for the electric car at a street crossing will bar a recovery for injury received, the court saying that if by looking the driver could have avoided the injury he cannot recover.

And in Boerth v. West Side R. Co. (Wis.) March 16, 1894, where a driver attempted to drive around in front of an electric car as he reached a corner at a street, and the car bell was rung in time, he could not recover for injuries received.

In Wheelahan v. Philadelphia Traction Co., 150 Pa. 157, it was held that the failure of a driver of a wagon with a hood cover to lean forward and look up and down the track at a street crossing will bar a recovery for injuries received by collision from 35 L. R. A.

an approaching car. Following Ehrisman v. East Harrisburg City Pass. R. Co., infra, which was not a street-crossing case and the question of street crossings was not discussed in the Wheelahan case.

Crossing the track at places other than streets.

There is some conflict of authorities on the question of liability of the street-car companies for negligence of its employes, where a party, injured in attempting to cross in front of the car, is guilty of contributory negligence. And so it has been held that attempting to drive across the track of an electric railroad, at places not at street crossings, without looking along the track for the cars, bars a recovery. Davidson v. Denver Tramway Co. (Colo. App.) Feb. 12, 1894; Ward v. Rochester Electric R. Co. 43 N. Y. S. R. 84; Ehrisman v. East Harrisburg City Pass. R. Co. 17 L. R. A. 443, 150 Pa. 180.

In the latter case the question of street crossings was not discussed.

And the same was held in regard to horse-cars. Thomas v. Citizens Pass. R. Co. 132 Pa. 504; Follett v. Toronto R. Co. 15 Ont. App. Rep. 246.

And the same was held in regard to cable cars. Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. 6 Misc. 332.

And a person driving a team on a narrow temporary driveway alongside of an electric-car track cannot recover for injuries to his team, where he was negligent in going on such driveway, and he attempted to cross back in front of a car in sight coming at high speed, although he believed the driveway too narrow for the car to pass him, where the motorman used every effort to stop the car when he saw the danger. Christensen v. Union Trunk Line, 6 Wash. 75.

And a person having time to avoid danger is guilty of gross negligence in attempting to cross a track and delay a car, and cannot recover for innals for plaintiffs to leave the track. After plaintiffs had passed round the buggy, they turned to the right, in order to leave the track. After all except the left hind wheel of the buggy had cleared the track, that wheel was struck and broken, and the hind end of the buggy fell, carrying plaintiff with it. The evidence tended to prove that plaintiff, at the time, was in delicate health, and the shock from the fall and fright caused her to lose consciousness, produced hemorrhages of the womb, and seriously affected her nervous system. The evidence will require a more detailed consideration in the opinion. Defendant demurred to the evidence, which was overruled. The case was submitted to the jury, upon instructions of the court. Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff Mrs. Hicks, and defendant appealed.

Mr. Smith P. Galt for appellant.

Mr. Seneca N. Taylor, for respondents:

The defendant's gripman was negligent in permitting the grip car to collide with the buggy on the occasion in question.

Persons using vehicles have the undoubted right to drive upon street railway tracks, for the purpose of passing other vehicles, and active diligence is due from street railway companies to exercise reasonable care to prevent their cars from colliding with vehicles of persons exercising this right.

If it was imputed negligence on the part of Mrs. Hicks in being on defendant's track, in a buggy not driven by herself, still it was the duty of the gripman after seeing the buggy in danger, or by the exercise of ordinary diligence being able to have seen it, to have avoided the collision, if it could have been done, by the exercise of ordinary care.

And the questions of negligence and contributory negligence are for the jury where a driver of a wagon approached a deep hole negligently left uncovered without a guard, in a turntable by the cable-car company, and was obliged to turn across the track and was injured. Ryberg v. Portland Cable R. Co. 22 Or. 234.

And it is not contributory negligence to attempt to cross a cable-car track on a down grade even if the lock chain on the wagon was broken, and failure to look when the car is more than one hundred feet distant will not bar a recovery. Cross v. California Street Cable R. Co. (Cal.) April 27, 1894.

Injury received in turning out.

Macfarlane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It is first argued that the judgment cannot stand, for the reason that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of defendant's employés. The evidence shows that the cars follow very slowly after the buggy, and within a few feet of it, giving constant signals of its approach. That the cars were

Or by an electric car. Rascher v. East Detroit & G. P. R. Co. 90 Mich. 413.

The questions of negligence or contributory negligence are for jury where the evidence is conflicting as to whether the injury to plaintiff was caused by collision with the car or by a quick and sharp turn off the track. The cars have not the exclusive right of way only superior, and the company is liable if the driver is without fault and is injured by the negligence of the company. Cambels v. Third Ave. R. Co. 1 Misc. 153.

Some cases hold that there can be no recovery if the driver of the horse-car exercised reasonable care to avoid injury. Moroney v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 30 N. Y. S. R. 911.

And a cartman going the same way and turning out from a horse-car in passing, and injured by reason of his load being projected against the car as he turns cannot recover for injuries received as his negligence caused the injury. Suydam v. Grand Street & N. R. Co. 41 Barb. 375.

A driver of a wagon, on an electric-car track, struck by a car from the rear, cannot recover where he could have avoided injury and neglected to look back until he heard the bell, and the car was then about 50 yards away, although the motor-man made no effort to stop the car until within five or six yards from the wagon. Winter v. Crowsfoot Street R. Co. of Buffalo, 8 Misc. 332.

And a driver of a vehicle should look behind to see if a horse-car is coming, and if through negligence or willfulness on his part, a collision occurs, he cannot recover even if the car driver is also in fault. The driver of a vehicle is bound to keep a better lookout on the track than if he was on another part of the street. Wilbrand v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 3 Bosw. 314.

a street railroad track so as to obstruct the horse-cars, and is bound to exercise more diligence than when on a common pavement if a car is approaching in the opposite direction; and it is his duty to turn out, and if a collision occurs through his negligence, he cannot recover unless the company willfully caused the injury, or was guilty of greater negligence than plaintiff. Chicago West Div. R. Co. v. Bert, 69 Ill. 383.

An instruction that vehicles must yield the right of way to the street-car was properly modified by instructing that the company is entitled to the track on meeting vehicles, as against one driven thereon with a view to delay the cars, where such company introduced the ordinance to that effect in evidence, and the plaintiff was injured by collision in trying to turn out of the way of the horse-car following. Chicago West Div. R. Co. v. Ingraham, 131 Ill. 659.

A driver of a cart having room and time to turn out and seeing a freight car drawn by horses coming towards him cannot recover for injuries, even if the driver of the car does not stop when the cart driver calls to him to do so, as the cartman should yield the right of way. Barker v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Daly, 274.

And a horse-car company has the superior right of way over vehicles on the track, and it is error to instruct the jury that no contributory negligence would bar a recovery, where a driver of a wagon was between his wagon and car and was injured either by his wagon or by the car, in passing. Pendleton Street R. Co. v. Stallmann, 22 Ohio St. 1.

There can be no recovery where the driver of a wagon pulled his horse out from the sidewalk towards an electric car causing a collision, and there was no evidence that the street-car driver saw or could have seen the danger of collision in under perfect control is attested by the undisputed fact that they were stopped immediately on striking the wheel of the buggy. So far there can be no complaint as to the conduct of the employes. The gripman in charge of the cars also saw plaintiffs driving along the track in front of the train, and knew that the cars were entitled to the right of way on the track. The signals given were not only intended to notify plaintiffs of the approach of the cars, but to admonish them to get out of the way. They should have expected that, in obedience to the signals the buggy would be driven from the track, and should have been prepared for any necessary checking of speed, or slipping of the wheel of the buggy on the rails, in making the turn. Counsel for defendant states the cause of the injury thus: "Hicks drove the buggy with the front wheels onto the track, just ahead of the car, and continued to drive it that way, ahead, close in front of the car, bell ringing all the time, and did not accelerate his speed, and, without any notice to the gripman that he was going to do so, attempted to turn to the one side, which always involves a moment's lessening of speed, and thereby caused the buggy to be struck by the car." We do not think that those in charge of the car were entitled to notice that plaintiffs were about leaving the track, after they had been notified to leave it. On the contrary, they should have been prepared for such a movement by plaintiffs, and for the moment's lessening of speed necessarily involved therein. There was no evidence that the momentary checking of the buggy was unusual or unexpected. We think the question, then, as to whether the cars were run closer to the buggy than reasonable prudence and care dictated, and whether defendant's employes should, in the exercise of proper care, have checked or stopped the cars, in order to give plaintiffs time to get out of the way, were properly for the determination of the jury. The evidence certainly tended to prove that the cars were following within two or three feet of the buggy, and moving at about the same rate of speed; so a very slight check in the speed of the buggy would necessarily have resulted in a collision.

2. It is insisted in the next place that, though defendant may have been negligent, plaintiffs were also guilty of negligence, which directly and proximately contributed to the injury, and therefore the judgment should not be sustained. It is said that plaintiffs were negligent in driving on the track in front of the train, and in thereafter driving upon and laterally along the track without heeding the warnings of the defendant. Generally, a distinction is made between the duties required of one going upon or crossing a street-car track and the track of a steam railroad. The weight and momentum of trains propelled by steam renders their control and management much more difficult than light cars, moved by cable or electricity. The measure of prudence which will constitute ordinary care is less with respect to those going upon them than is required of persons crossing tracks of steam railroads. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 290. Persons in wagons and other vehicles have the undoubted right to pass over or upon street-car tracks without hindrance; yet the right of a traveler to drive a vehicle upon or along a street-railroad track does not absolve him from the duty of looking for approaching cars. The cars can only move upon the tracks, and are used for the convenience of the public, and are consequently entitled to the right of way as to all others. It is therefore the duty of a traveler to give way to approaching cars, so as to cause no unnecessary hindrance. Adolph v. Central Park, N. & E. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 532; North Hudson County R. Co. v. Isley, 49 N. J. L. 468; Wood v. Detroit City Street R. Co. 52 Mich. 402, 50 Am. Rep. 259.

But we are not able to say that the evidence shows conclusively that plaintiffs violated any of these rules, unless it was in driving upon the track without observing the cars, which must have been very near them. But that negligence was clearly not the proximate cause of the injury, for plaintiffs not only got safely upon the track without injury, but they were seen by the servants of defendant, and, by their timely action, a collision was time to avert it. North Side Street R. Co. v. Want (Tex.) Nov. 12, 1890.

There are no cases holding that a street-car company has the exclusive right of way on its tracks, where the question arose by reason of injury to vehicles or occupants.

"Look out."

It is the duty of a driver of a vehicle to "look out" for cars at all places other than street crossings. Quinn v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 34 N. Y. S. R. 301, affirmed 134 N. Y. 611; Adolph v. Central Park, N. & E. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 530. See also Davidson v. Denver Tramway Co. (Colo. App.) Feb. 12, 1894, and the cases following; Winter v. Crosstown Street R. Co. 8 Misc. 362; Wilbrand v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 3 Bow. 314. But see Cross v. California Street Cable R. Co. (Cal.) April 27, 1894.

For "looking out" see subheads "Injuries at street crossings." "Crossing at places other than street crossings."

Right of way.

Street-car companies have not exclusive right to 35 L. R. A.

Turning to the left in meeting street-cars is not negligence. Hegan v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 350; Spurrier v. Front Street Cable R. Co. 3 Wash. 656.

The street-cars have the paramount right of way on the track at places other than street crossings, and the car employes have the right to assume that a driver of a vehicle will turn out for the cars if the situation and condition of the track permits such turning, and while the courts do not sustain the car companies if the employes willfully injure vehicles on the track, yet they are inclined to favor the companies if the driver of the vehicle is reckless, or obstinately attempts to block the way of the street-car. I. 2.

then avoided. After that, the conduct of plaintiffs could not be declared negligent, as a matter of law. Whether they could have left the track more expeditiously than they did, and whether doing so would have avoided the injury, were questions for the jury. It seems to me there was very little evidence tending to show contributory negligence in the case, but we cannot say there was none. Defendant's gripman saw plaintiffs in their dangerous and exposed situation, and the chief question is whether, after that, he acted with due care towards them. Landon v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 104 Mo. 389, and cases cited.

3. Objections were made to a number of hypothetical questions asked physicians by plaintiff's counsel, with a view to getting before the jury their opinion as to whether the condition and sufferings of Mrs. Hicks were produced by the accident. These questions were long, and need not be given in full to understand the questions involved. The objections urged to these questions were that they assumed facts not warranted by the testimony. The question asked Dr. Keir assumed that the evidence tended to prove that Mrs. Hicks had "chilly sensations all over her body following immediately after this accident;" "that she still has serious floodings and severe pains on all occasions, and still has cold sensations all over her body." In the questions asked Dr. Fry, the following facts were assumed: That Mrs. Hicks was subjected to a "serious shock;" that the buggy fell "violently to the pavement or to the ground, and that the lady was thereby jarred, shocked, and frightened to such a degree that she lost self-consciousness;" that "immediately after the accident, and for several weeks, she suffered nervous prostration to such a degree that she was often unconscious;" that she "still has frequent flooding spells." The same objections were urged to questions asked Dr. Bond. The rule in regard to the hypothetical questions that may be asked an expert witness is thus clearly given in a recent case by this court: "Counsel, in propounding a hypothetical question to an expert witness, may assume any state of facts the evidence tends to establish, and may vary the questions so as to cover and present the different theories of fact. But there must be evidence in the case tending to establish all the facts stated in the question. If the question assume any fact which the evidence does not tend to prove, it should be excluded." Russ v. Wabash Western R. Co. 112 Mo. 48, 18 L. R. A. 23. It is manifest that a very slight change of fact may lead to a very radical difference in the conclusion drawn from it. This is particularly true when the opinion of physicians is used to prove the effect produced upon the health of a person by a certain cause, or the cause of certain physical and mental conditions. If, then, the hypothetical questions to which objections are made assumed any fact which the evidence did not tend to prove, they were improper, and should have been excluded. But we have gone over the evidence very carefully, and are of opinion that it fairly tends to prove every fact assumed by the questions.

The evidence proves that the hind wheel was broken, which caused the buggy to fall to the ground, carrying plaintiff with it. She was a large, fleshy woman, and from these facts it might well be inferred that the fall of the buggy was "violent," and that plaintiff was thereby jarred, shocked, and frightened. The evidence of plaintiffs was that she lost consciousness when the buggy fell, and before she was removed from the place of the accident she suffered severe pains through her back, stomach, bowels, and womb, accompanied with severe hemorrhages; and "creeping sensations" from head to foot, and from that day to the day of trial she had hemorrhages, and these "nervous sensations, drawings, and twitchings." The evidence of Mrs. Myrick was that all of the symptoms described by plaintiff as the immediate result of the fall existed next morning, and also cold, chilly sensations. All other symptoms continuing, we may fairly infer from all the evidence, that the chilly sensations followed immediately after the accident. From all the facts proven, we may also infer that plaintiff received a "serious shock."

4. The first instruction defined the duty of defendant's gripman, in case he saw, or by the exercise of reasonable care might have seen, the buggy on the track in front of the cars, to be that of reasonable care to avoid a collision. There is nothing in this requirement of which defendant can reasonably complain. The second instruction given on behalf of plaintiffs is as follows: "The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the gripman operating defendant's grip car on the occasion of said collision saw, or by the exercise of reasonable care might have seen, said buggy after it got upon defendant's track, in danger of being struck by the car, in time to have stopped the train, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, before it struck the buggy, and so have avoided the collision, then the defense of contributory negligence cannot avail, even if the jury believe that Josephine Hicks, plaintiff, negligently drove the buggy, or allowed said buggy to be driven, upon defendant's track on the occasion in question." We think the duty this instruction required of street railways too broadly stated, under the circumstances of this case. The jury might well have inferred from the instruction that it became the duty of the gripman of the car to stop the train immediately upon seeing the buggy on the track in front of it, and that, if he could have done so, and failed, he was guilty of negligence. The same rule of care is thus imposed upon those managing a train of cable cars in the streets as is required of one running a steam locomotive. The evidence is undisputed that the cars, under perfect control, moving at a rate of speed not exceeding a slow walk, followed the buggy on the track from 30 to 50 feet, and could have been stopped at any moment. As was said in the second paragraph of this opinion, a traveler in a vehicle has the right to use the track of a street railway and travel laterally upon it, provided the running of trains were not thereby unnecessarily hindered, and that it was not negligence in itself for the train to so follow after the buggy. To require a street-car to stop for a clear track when no danger of a collision is threatened would virtually stop the running of all such trains, or so interfere with them as to greatly impair their usefulness. Beach says: "The danger of accident from a collision with street-cars is very trifling, as compared with that from collision with trains of cars running at a high rate of speed upon a railroad. Street-cars never run very fast, and are easily and almost instantly stopped. What, therefore, might be gross negligence as respects a steam railroad, might be perfectly prudent and perfectly proper to be done in dealing with street-cars. We must not therefore attempt to apply to street railways the rules of law applicable to steam railroads. The cases are essentially different, and, the reason for the rule ceasing, the rule itself must also cease." Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 290; Lynam v. Union R. Co. 114 Mass. 83. It is true the instruction predicated the duty of stopping upon the fact that the buggy was in danger of being struck, but it assumed that the danger arose when the buggy got upon the track. There was no danger of a collision in moving the train slowly and cautiously, and not negligently near to the buggy. Both were going in the same direction, and at about the same rate of speed, and danger only arose when plaintiff attempted to leave the track. But the instruction goes further, and plainly informs the jury that if the gripman saw the buggy, after it got upon the track, in time to have stopped the car and avoided the injury, the defense of contributory negligence cannot avail defendant. It was as well the duty of the plaintiffs to leave the track as it was of defendant to prevent the cars from striking the buggy. Reasonable care and caution should have been observed by each in doing what duty required of them. Plaintiffs were not relieved of this duty by reason of a failure of defendant to do that required of it. There was no question here as to the negligence of plaintiffs in going upon the track. When the buggy got upon the track, the situation was changed altogether. It was for the jury to determine the question of negligence and contributory negligence, in view of what was done by the parties in the situation in which they were placed. The question of contributory negligence should not have been withdrawn from the jury in the circumstances.

5. Counsel discuss the question as to whether the negligence of the husband can be imputed to the wife. We do not think the question appears upon this record in this case. The charge in the petition is that plaintiffs were driving the buggy. The instruction assumed the same fact. There was no attempt by the parties to separate the act of one from the other, and to consider the question of imputed negligence would be a very needless work. Whether Mrs. Hicks would be held responsible for the negligence of her husband or not, she would certainly be held responsible for her own. Hoag v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 111 N. Y. 199.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

Augustus O. GIRARD, Respt.,

v.

ST. LOUIS CAR-WHEEL CO., Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

*1. In an action for damages for personal injuries, defendant, by answer, set up an alleged agreement in the nature of a release or discharge of the cause of action. To that plea plaintiff replied that the agreement had been obtained by fraud, while he was unable, because of pain and suffering caused by the injuries, to comprehend his act in signing it, and that he never assented to the agreement. Held, that the reply to the plea of a release was sufficient in an action at law, without resorting to equity to cancel that document.

2. Where a reply of fraud is made to a plea of release, and no point is interposed in the trial court of any deficiency in the reply on account of any omission to tender back the benefits received under the agreement for a release, and the record shows that those benefits were accounted for in the judgment, there is no prejudicial error in the omission to allege or prove an offer to return those benefits, even if such offer were otherwise necessary to avoid the release.

CERTIFICATION from the St. Louis Court of Appeals for the opinion of the Supreme Court of an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which it was alleged defendant was responsible. Affirmed.

Barclay, J., delivered the following opinion:

The petition states a case for damages on account of personal injuries suffered by plaintiff while in the employ of the defendant company. It charges as the cause negligence in respect of the operation of certain hoisting machinery, under the direction of defendant's superintendent, in its shops in St. Louis; and alleges that, in consequence of that negligence (the particulars of which are not important at this stage of the proceedings), a heavy timber fell upon plaintiff, disabling him from labor, etc. The answer denies the charge of negligence, and sets up, as a bar to plaintiff's action, a written instrument, signed by plaintiff and by one of defendant's officers, in which, after reciting the fact of plaintiff's injury, the following stipulations appear: "The said Car-Wheel Co., on their part, proposes to furnish and pay for all the medical attendance necessary for his recovery from said injuries sustained by said accident, and to keep his name on its pay roll at the uniform wages per day for all working days which he has been up to this time credited, and in any other way in their power assist in his recovery until he is physically sufficiently recovered from said accident, evidenced by physician's certificate, to resume work. And on his part, beyond the above obligation of the St. Louis Car-Wheel Co., he relinquishes all other claims whatsoever as to them; and that he agrees to this deliberately, and of his own free will, and without any undue influence from any one. The said parties, in evidence of which, and in good faith, sign this, the date first herein written." Defendant alleged compliance on its part with the above agreement, so far as plaintiff had permitted such compliance, and prayed judgment. Plaintiff, by a reply, charged that the said agreement had been obtained from him by gross fraud and misrepresentations of defendant and its agents; that at the time it was made he was in the deepest distress and mental and bodily pain, and was unable, through his bodily and mental condition, to understand or comprehend the contents of said agreement, and did never assent to the terms thereof. These allegations of fraud and incapacity are repeated in several forms with considerable particularity of detail, but the above outline will be sufficient for present purposes. The cause came to trial before Judge Dillon and a jury. It is not necessary to go into the evidence as to the plaintiff's original right of recovery, since no point is made in this court on that branch of the case. The only questions of any difficulty now submitted concern the rules of law to be applied in view of the so-called "release" or "settlement."

The plaintiff's testimony tended to prove that his injury occurred September 13, 1889, and the agreement (which we will for convenience call a release) was signed the next day, about noon. The timber which struck plaintiff was about 18 feet long and 6 by 9 inches thick. It hit him in the back. He was knocked to the ground, senseless. His arm was broken. Blood oozed from his forehead, and his face was scratched. He could not stand. He had to be carried away from the shop. He was put into an ambulance, and taken to the city hospital. The next day he was removed to his boarding house. He testified that he had no recollection of signing the release. That at that time he was unable to read or comprehend anything. If he attempted to read, he could merely "see a gleam" in front of him. "That for four or five weeks he was not in his proper mind, or able to understand things. That during the first week he did not easily recognize people who called on him." He suffered intense pain, which did not begin to abate for two months. His face and jaws were badly swollen; his eyes discolored, and almost closed. He had a lump on the back of his head for some time after the mishap. Six or eight days later he found a copy of the release on the floor of his room. He gave it to his attorney soon afterwards, and then brought this action in October, 1891. Several of his fellow workmen who called to see him on the day the release was signed and on the following day gave various descriptions of his condition. For instance: "He was excited and bewildered;" "his mind was not clear;" he was more jovial than was usual with him;" "he did not seem rational;" "he didn't seem to me to act or talk at the time as I saw him do before." The defendant's testimony contradicted that above quoted, and tended to prove that plaintiff understood the release, assented to its terms, executed it freely, and that no fraud was practiced upon him. Under its terms, defendant employed a physician to treat plaintiff, at a cost of $50, up to the time plaintiff discharged him, shortly before bringing this suit. The defendant further paid $10 to another physician who had been called to plaintiff's aid at the shop in the emergency when he was first injured. Defendant also kept plaintiff's name on the pay roll, and was ready and willing to pay him wages according to the terms of the release; but he would not or did not accept such payment. The trial court submitted the issue of release upon instructions, under which the jury found that plaintiff signed that paper at the instance of defendant's agents, without knowing its contents, and never did assent to its terms. They also found that the release was signed when plaintiff was in such a mental condition that he could not comprehend its contents, and that defendant's agents took advantage of that condition to induce him to sign the paper without understanding it, intending thereby to defraud plaintiff of his cause of action set forth in the petition herein. On that issue the court gave the following instructions at the instance of defendant, viz.: "(4) The jury are instructed, even though you should believe from the evidence the release pleaded by defendant to have been unfair to the defendant, and not a sufficient recompense for plaintiff's injuries, still this will not relieve plaintiff from its force and effect as a bar to his recovery in this action. The only way in which plaintiff can effect the conclusiveness of this bar is to satisfy you by a preponderance of evidence that plaintiff, when he signed the release, had not sufficient mental power to know the nature of the instrument he was signing." "(7) The court instructs the jury that the paper read in evidence, signed by the plaintiff, and termed a 'release,' is on its face a release and discharge of the cause of action sued on in this case. It is a presumption of law that the plaintiff understood and agreed to the terms and contents of said paper when he signed it, and the burden is on the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of evidence that he was not acquainted with the contents of the paper, and that he did not voluntarily agree to release his claim for damages growing out of his injury upon the terms stated in said petition, or that defendant fraudulently procured the execution thereof by him; and, unless the plaintiff has affirmatively so proven these facts to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of proof, they should find for the defendant." "(12) The court instructs the jury that in determining the question whether the paper offered in evidence, and termed a 'release,' was freely and voluntarily signed by the plaintiff, they are not at liberty to consider whether the terms of said release were reasonable, nor whether the undertakings of the defendant therein constituted a full and adequate compensation for his injury." The bill of exceptions also shows that, "the cause being submitted to the jury, they found a verdict in favor of plaintiff, such verdict being an award of damages in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $1,662, less the sum of $62, paid by the defendant under the terms of the release given in evidence; leaving the amount of damages $1,500." The jury also found for the plaintiff on the issues of negligence, under appropriate instructions, which need not be examined, as this appeal does not call in question any rulings on that part of the case. After the usual motions and exceptions, defendant appealed to the St. Louis court of appeals, but, as the judges of that court were divided in opinion (Girard v. St. Louis Car-Wheel Co. 46 Mo. App. 81), the case was transferred to the supreme court, under the provisions of the constitution. Amend. Const. 1884, § 6.

1. Defendant's first proposition is that this action for damages is not maintainable, because the release has not been set aside by a decree in equity; in other words, it is claimed that the paper in question is a complete defense at law to the cause of action to which it relates, no matter how the paper may have been obtained. This position has been defended with much ability, but no resources of counsel are sufficient to conceal its inherent weakness. The testimony for plaintiff tends strongly to prove that he was incapable of understanding the release when he signed it, and that he did not comprehend, or intend to assent to, its terms. The jury so found in response to instructions. Those facts, when established, destroyed the substance of the agreement which the release in form expressed. They took from the apparent contract what was essential to its legal force and validity, namely, the element of assent by the plaintiff. That element is a necessary part of every contract. Without it, a mere writing, expressing some formula of words, imposes no obligation. The signature of plaintiff, obtained to such a paper without the assent of his mind to the act, deprived him of no legal right. He might, indeed, affirm such a signature, or make it his lawful act by his subsequent conduct, the effect of which would be to give to the agreement that assent which was necessary to originate an obligation on his part; but, in the absence of such acts as amounted to an approval of it, he might proceed to enforce his rights, irrespective of such a paper. 25 L. R. A.

Brewster v. Brewster (1875) 38 N. J. L. 119. In circumstances such as are here exhibited, a writing in the form of a release, which never acquired original validity as a contract for want of competent assent to its terms, may be disregarded by a court of law in the administration of justice, without the intervention of a court of equity. The paper in question is, in contemplation of law, nothing more than the form of a contract; and, on finding that the substance which should give life to an obligation is wanting, the court may cast aside the form, and proceed to judgment, notwithstanding the fraud which may have brought the verisimilitude of an obligation into existence. Hartshorn v. Day (1856) 60 U. S. 19 How. 211, 15 L. ed. 605; Vanderelden v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1894) 61 Fed. Rep. 54, opinion by Judge Shiras. A court of law, upon ascertaining such a fraud, may properly pass over it to the conclusion which it considers to be just; thus, in effect, discarding the fraud as an obstacle to the exercise of its jurisdiction. It is not thought necessary, at this day, to further argue the correctness of this proposition. It has been repeatedly asserted in earlier decisions in this state, both before and since the adoption of the reformed code of procedure in 1949. Burrows v. Alter (1842) 7 Mo. 424; Wright v. McPike (1879) 70 Mo. 175. They conform to a multitude of precedents elsewhere, many of which are cited in the briefs of counsel, to which may be added: Thompson v. Faussat (1815) Pet. C. C. 182, Fed. Cas. No. 18,954; Bliss v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. (1894) 160 Mass. 447. The case of Blair v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1896) 89 Mo. 888, which is cited as having some tendency to the contrary, goes no further in that direction than to approve the practice of proceeding to first cancel the release for fraud, upon allegations stating a cause of action in equity, before trying the other cause of action at law on the merits of the plaintiff's original claim. While that course may be adopted, it is not essential where the alleged fraud goes to the integrity of the release as a legal agreement, which is the case in the present action. The Blair decision does not declare it necessary to go into equity to get rid of a paper executed in such circumstances as here appear.

2. It is next contended that the release must stand, because plaintiff did not, before action brought, offer to refund the amount paid by defendant for medical services to plaintiff under the terms of that paper. The verdict gave defendant the benefit of that credit upon the plaintiff's claim by reducing his damages to that extent ($62); but it is urged that that mode of refunding the fruits of the agreement for a release does not satisfy the requirements of law. The substance of defendant's contention is that a tender of the benefits received under the release was essential to plaintiff's case, and that without it the action cannot be maintained. Assuming, as this court is now bound to do in view of the evidence and the findings of the jury, that the release was not the valid act or contract of the plaintiff, then it was, at best, voidable at his option; that is to say, he was at liberty to ignore it in the assertion of his legal rights. His act in bringing the present suit was a plain and unmistakable repudiation of it, and a distinct notice that he discarded and denied the obligation which it apparently imposed. Ward v. Day (1863) 33 L. J. Q. B. 3; Clough v. London & N. W. R. Co. (1871) L. R. 7 Exch. 26; Dawes v. Harness (1875) L. R. 10 C. P. 166. He had done nothing to ratify it or adopt it as his act. Was he required, in such a case, to seek the defendant's officers, and tender back the value of the medical services rendered to him before beginning his action? He has, before judgment, accounted for everything of value received by him by virtue of the supposed release, and the defendant has had credit therefor, as the verdict of the jury on its face shows. But the attitude of the defendant throughout, as well as before, the litigation, its plea of release, its setting aside in an envelope the wages of plaintiff each week, all indicate that any tender by plaintiff of repayment for the medical services would have been useless. Since the execution of that paper, defendant has asserted and relied upon its validity, and still asserts it. It has been decisively held in other cases that no preliminary tender can be insisted upon as a bar to legal action where the facts show that the tender would have been rejected. Deichmann v. Deichmann (1871) 49 Mo. 107; Westlake v. St. Louis (1882) 77 Mo. 47. In such a state of the facts a tender would be, as Mr. Bigelow remarks, "an idle ceremony." Bigelow, Fr. (1888) p. 424. No distinction should be made, and, in my opinion, none exists in principle, between actions for personal injuries and other actions at law in respect of the right now under consideration, or in respect of the testimony required to sustain a judgment. A preponderance of evidence is necessary to support an allegation of fraud in a court of law, and it is for the trial judge in the first instance to determine whether or not the testimony offered upon that allegation is reasonably sufficient to justify an inference of the fraud charged. It has been often held in other jurisdictions that a tender of money received by virtue of a release of similar tenor to that in question here need not be made before bringing suit, where the release was obtained by fraud, but that it is sufficient to offer its return, and to account for it by the judgment. Duval v. Mowry (1860) 6 R. I. 479; Smith v. Salomon (1877) 7 Daly, 216; Butler v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1891) 88 Ga. 594; Kley v. Healy (1891) 127 N. Y. 555; Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1892) 83 Wis. 507; Kirchner v. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. (1892) 185 N. Y. 182; Knoxville, O. G. & L. R. Co. v. Acuff (1892) 92 Tenn. 26. That certainly is the rule in equity in reference to rescission (Martin v. Martin [1860] 35 Ala. 560; Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Manhattan R. Co. [1884] 14 Abb. N. C. 224; Lusted v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. [1888] 71 Wis. 391); and in equity, as a general rule, a better showing is required of a plaintiff, conditional to granting relief, than is exacted by the practice in courts of law. It has been also ruled that, where a release is found to have been obtained by fraud practiced upon one incapable, because of mental weakness, to validly enter into such a contract, no necessity exists for refunding the fruits of the release before action brought. O'Brien v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa, 1894) 87 N. W. Rep. 425; Johnson v. Merry Mount Granite Co. (1892) 53 Fed. Rep. 569. Whether these rulings correctly declare the law applicable to release of the kind now in question we think it unnecessary to decide, in view of the condition of the record now before the court.

8. If it be conceded for the sake of argument that a tender was necessary to sustain plaintiff's right to recover upon his original cause of action, let us see whether the judgment actually reached in the trial court can be supported upon the pleadings, evidence, and findings of the jury, irrespective of the question of a tender. No objection to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's case for the want of such tender was at any time interposed in the trial court, unless it may be implied in the request for an instruction that, under the pleadings and evidence, plaintiff was not entitled to recover. But at that stage of the case the testimony tending to prove fraud in obtaining from the plaintiff the execution of the release had been admitted under the allegations of the reply. Upon the facts before the court at that time plaintiff would have been entitled to recover at law, upon the footing of the fraud, a measure of damages at least as great as that which the judgment shows was actually meted out to him upon the same facts which the jury found as the basis of their verdict. Plaintiff, at the outset of the proceeding, in his petition might have set up his original cause of action, and the fraud by which he was induced to execute the release for it, and, on showing these facts, have lawfully claimed a recovery of the difference between what he received by reason of the release and the damages justly due him upon his former cause of action. That theory would have involved acquiescence in the release, which he might have conceded without waiving his right to recover for the fraud in obtaining it. His right of action for fraud on such a showing could be maintained without any offer to return the fruits of the release. These positions are sustained by abundant precedents. 1 Whart. Cont. § 262; Wabash Valley Protective Union of Crawfordville v. James (Ind. 1893) 85 N. E. Rep. 919. The only difference between a recovery on that basis and the judgment reached on the trial now under review is one of form. The essential facts to sustain both appear in the plaintiff's pleadings, and were found by the jury. Part of those facts are first stated in the reply, but the only objection made at any time to the reply in the circuit court was on the ground that it admitted the existence of a release uncanceled when the action was brought. That objection we have held to be untenable for the reasons given in the first paragraph of this opinion. No objection was made to any of the plaintiff's pleadings on the ground that a tender of the fruits of the release was essential to plaintiff's right of recovery, nor was that proposition advanced in the trial court by defendant in any request for instructions. By positive law in this state the trial courts are expressly authorized, where defendant has appeared and answered, as in this record, to "grant any relief consistent with the case made by the plaintiff and embraced within the issues." Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2216. By the Code of Procedure this court is directed in every stage of the action "to disregard any error of defect in the pleadings or proceedings which shall not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party" (Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2100); and, further, not to "reverse the judgment of any court, unless it shall believe that error was committed by such court against appellant or plaintiff in error, and materially affecting the merits of the action." Id. § 2308. In addition to these very plain and practical rules of decision, the statute declares, furthermore, that it is the duty of the courts to so construe the provisions of the code of pleading and practice as "to distinguish between form and substance." Id. § 2117. In this state of the record and of the law, would it not be the sheerest technicality, a complete surrender of substance to barren form, to hold that the judgment should be reversed for want of a tender, when the facts alleged, proved, and found show a solid foundation for the result reached, irrespective of the question of a tender? Viewing the case at bar broadly on its merits, the judgment of the trial court seems abundantly supported by the facts and by the law applicable thereto. The court would depart from the precepts contained in the statutes referred to should it reverse the judgment for any of the objections which have been urged to it here. It should not be done. In my opinion, the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Black, Ch. J., and Brace and Macfarlane, JJ., concur in that result, and express their own views in an opinion filed along with this. Gantt, Sherwood, and Burgess, JJ., dissent, and file a separate opinion.

Macfarlane, J., concurring:

I agree to the conclusion reached by the court that the judgment should be affirmed, but desire briefly to give my reasons therefor. The questions insisted upon in this court by defendant are: First, that an action could not be maintained for damages until the release had been canceled by a decree in equity; and, second, that the release could not be attacked for fraud, either in law or equity, until plaintiff had restored to defendant whatever of considerations he had received thereunder.

An examination of this abstract of record fails to show that any objection was at any time, by pleading or otherwise, made to the failure of plaintiff to return or tender to defendant the consideration paid under the release. On the other hand, the record does show that the defendant insisted upon the validity of the release throughout the trial, and gave it prominence as a defense. It may, therefore, be reasonably inferred that a tender would have been refused, and was waived. In addition, it affirmatively appears upon the record that the amount paid out by defendant on account of the release was restored to it by a reduction of the judgment which was obtained by defendant. Manifestly defendant was not prejudiced by a failure to make the tender.

We have often said that this court will only consider questions to which exceptions have been saved in the circuit court, or which affirmatively appear upon the record proper. We must therefore decline to consider the second proposition.

This leaves simply the question whether the reply properly put in issue the validity of the release; or, in other words, whether a release of the character of this one can be avoided, in an action at law, on the ground of fraud charged in the reply to the answer of defendant setting it up in bar of plaintiff's action. Defendant insists that it is a complete bar until canceled by the decree of a court of equity. It is undoubtedly true that fraud was one of the original heads of equity jurisdiction, "but," says Blackstone, "every kind of fraud is equally cognizable in a court of law, and some frauds are cognizable only there; as fraud in obtaining a devise of lands." 2 Bl. Com. 481. "Courts of equity and courts of law have a concurrent jurisdiction to suppress and relieve against fraud." Lord Mansfield, in Bright v. Egnon, 1 Burr. 396. This principle has received recognition and approval by this court from the decision of Montgomery v. Tipton, 1 Mo. 446, to that of Clough v. Holden, 115 Mo. 386.

This doctrine is not disputed when the fraud is pleaded by way of answers to a cause of action stated in the petition; but it is insisted, and argued with much learning and ability, that a different rule applies in case the charge of fraud is made to a release when pleaded as a bar to the action. In such case it is argued that the release must be canceled by the decree of a court of equity before the original action can be prosecuted. The principal ground of objection urged to the right to raise the question of fraud by reply is that such a course of proceeding permits questions of fraud to be tried by a jury, instead of a chancellor, and the rescission of a release to be obtained upon evidence which would have been insufficient in a court of equity. But this objection can be urged with equal plausibility to pleading fraud by answer, which, it is conceded, may be done. When we keep in view the fact that courts of law have jurisdiction to relieve against fraud, it would seem to follow logically that its jurisdiction may be exercised to relieve against a fraudulent contract pleaded as a defense, as well as against a fraudulent contract which is made the subject-matter of the suit. It would seem wholly unnecessary and oppressive to drive a plaintiff to another jurisdiction for relief against a defense of which he may have had no information until the answer was made, when the forum, having all the parties before it, has concurrent jurisdiction of the same subject-matter. This is particularly true in jurisdictions wherein legal and equitable rights are ad-administered by one court and in one proceeding, as in this state. Chitty says: "To a plea of release he [plaintiff] may reply non est factum, or that it was obtained by duress or fraud." 1 Chitty, Pl. 16th Am. ed. 608. It is contended by counsel that Mr. Chitty had reference alone to a release obtained pending the suit. It is true the references made are to cases in which pleas pais darrein continuance were interposed, but the author's general accuracy in the statement of his proposition forbids my acceptance of any qualification to the broad and general declarations. Bliss, in his work on Code Pleading, lays down the same rule, sec. 210. The rule given by Mr. Chitty has been generally, if not uniformly, followed by the courts of this country. "The pleading of a release first occurs generally in the answer or plea of the defendant, unless in actions brought to set aside a release; and the controverting of the release is usually made under the plaintiff's reply." 20 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 766. The following cases will be found to follow the rule given by Chitty, supra, as applied to a release of claims for damages on account of personal injuries caused by negligence; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 109 Ill. 120; Bussian v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 56 Wis. 825; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Brazil, 78 Tex. 314; Sobieski v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 41 Minn. 169; O'Brien v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) 57 N. W. Rep. 425; Mullen v. Old Colony R. Co. 127 Mass. 87, 84 Am. Rep. 849; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. Copple (Ky.) 22 S. W. Rep. 323; Dixon v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 100 N. Y. 170; Bean v. Western N. C. R. Co. 107 N. C. 781; O'Neil v. Lake Superior Iron Co. 68 Mich. 690; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hayes, 88 Ga. 568; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Higgins, 44 Ark. 296. The pleading necessary to assert and attack such release has not been directly considered or decided by this court. In Vautrain v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 8 Mo. App. 538, a release was pleaded in bar, and the reply charged that it was obtained by fraud. No question of the propriety of thus attacking the release was raised or considered, but the sufficiency of the pleading to put in issue the validity of the release was, inferentially at least, conceded. This decision was approved by this court without comment. 78 Mo. 44. In the case of Blair v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 89 Mo. 383, the petition contained two counts,—one in equity to set aside the release, and the other for the damages received. This method of proceeding was approved by this court. There can be no doubt that a plaintiff can elect to have the release set aside by suit in equity before proceeding at law on the original cause of action. The Blair Case, then, only settled the question that the two actions may be joined in separate counts in the same petition. This court has recognized the right of a plaintiff to plead fraud in reply to a transaction set up by answer as a bar to the original cause of action. Wright v. McPike, 70 Mo. 177; Williams v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. 112 Mo. 463; Jarrett v. Morton, 44 Mo. 277. Our conclusion is that the validity of the release was properly put in issue by the reply.

Black, C. J., and Brace, J., concur in this opinion.

Burgess, J., dissenting:

Finding myself unable to agree to some of the propositions asserted in the majority opinion of the court, I feel justified in giving my reasons, and those of my associates who agree with me, why I do not do so. Mr. Chitty, in his work on Pleadings, says that "to a plea of release he [the plaintiff] may reply non est factum, or that it was obtained by fraud." 1 Chitty, Pl. 16th Am. ed. p. 608. He also gives the form of reply of fraud where the defendant has pleaded a release. 2 Chitty, Pl. 455. But from the general way in which the author thus states the law it is impossible to tell what kind of release he has reference to,—whether all kinds or mere receipts or acquittances. If the latter, there is no question as to the correctness of the rule, as a receipt may be contradicted at any time by verbal testimony. In the case of Wild v. Williams, 6 Mees. & W. 490, the court refused to strike out a plea pais darrein continuance setting up a release on affidavit showing release was obtained by fraud, holding that the plaintiff could contest the plea on that ground under a replication setting up the fraud. It is scarcely necessary to say that in that case, as the release had not been executed at the time of the commencement of this suit, it could not have then been set aside, because not in existence. In the cases of Webb v. Steele, 18 N. H. 280, and Holt v. Holcomb, 23 N. H. 535, the rule as laid down by Mr. Chitty is adhered to. So it is also in the case of Bussian v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 56 Wis. 825, and in Dixon v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 100 N. Y. 170. In the case of O'Donnell v. Clinton, 145 Mass. 461, the plaintiff returned, or offered to return, the money received by him on the settlement before instituting his suit. So did the plaintiff in the case of Peterson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 38 Minn. 511. The case of Lusted v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 71 Wis. 391, was a case in which the plaintiff sustained personal injury, and whose stock was injured at the same time in a collision, and he was induced by fraud and fraudulent representation to settle and compromise the case for $50, when he executed a receipt in full of all damages to stock and personal injuries; and it was held that it was unnecessary for him to offer to refund the money received by him before bringing his suit for the injuries sustained to his person, because no such thing was embraced in the settlement. The same rule was announced in the case of Ryan v. Gross, 68 Md. 377. In the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 109 Ill. 120, the same rule is announced. It was also held in that case that, as the contract of settlement was obtained by fraud, it was absolutely void, and need not be rescinded in order to remove it out of the way to the assertion of a right; and, further, that under such circumstances the party might bring his action without first paying or tendering back the money that he had received on the settlement. The case of Mullen v. Old Colony R. Co., 127 Mass. 86, 84 Am. Rep. 849, is cited as an authority as supporting the rule announced in that case. The facts in the case last cited were that the signature of the plaintiff was obtained to a paper purporting to be a settlement and discharge of the cause of action by fraudulent representations that it was merely a receipt for a gratuity, and the court, in speaking with reference thereto, says: "It is well established that, if a party enters into a contract, and in consideration of so doing receives money or merchandise, and afterwards seeks to avoid the effect of such contract as having been fraudulently obtained he must first give back to the other party the consideration received. Coolidge v. Brigham, 1 Met. 547; Estabrook v. Sweet, 116 Mass. 303. And if, after accepting a certain sum in settlement of an unliquidated claim for damages under a contract, one seeks to pursue his remedy for the damages on the ground that the settlement was procured by fraud, or is not binding upon him, he must first repay the amount received. Brown v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 117 Mass. 479. The principle on which these decisions rest is just, but it applies to those cases only where that which was received, and which must be returned, was the consideration of the contract or settlement which the receiver intended to make, and understood that he was making, and which he seeks to avoid by reason of fraudulent practices of the other party, which led him to agree to its terms. It does not apply to cases where a party holds out that he gives the consideration for one thing, and by fraud obtains an agreement that it was given for another thing." In the case at bar the plaintiff knew what the settlement and release embraced, but avers that it was obtained from him by fraud and fraudulent misrepresentations, and in this respect comes clearly within the rule announced in the case of Mullen v. Old Colony R. Co. supra, which requires that the parties to the settlement be placed in statu quo before the claimant can recover. In the case of Vautrain v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 8 Mo. App. 538, 78 Mo. 44, the defense was that the settlement and receipts were obtained by fraud and, although plaintiff had received $200, which was expressed in the receipt to be in full satisfaction of his demand against the road company, the court held that, as it was not shown that it was paid under an agreement of settlement of the damages, he was not bound to return it; clearly intimating that, if it was so received, as a condition precedent to his recovery, he must return it, though the opinion is not very distinct on the point. These authorities are all predicated on the theory announced in the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lewis, supra, that when a settlement and release are obtained by fraud it is absolutely void as to all the parties thereto, and the party suing is not bound to refund the money received by him under such circumstances before bringing his suit; or that the party from whom he received the money was indebted to him in a still larger sum, and that for that reason he had the right to retain the money thus received. The first proposition does not seem to be sustained by either reason or authority, as contracts of settlement, although fraudulently obtained, are not absolutely void, but only voidable. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hayes, 88 Ga. 558; Horne Ins. Co. of New York v. Howard, 111 Ind. 544; Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, 86 N. Y. 75.

As to the second proposition, the rule can have no application in this case, where all liability is denied. The court of appeals (46 Mo. App. 79), in its approval of the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lewis, supra, and cases which announce a similar doctrine, makes no distinction between cases where a liability is admitted and where all liability is denied, although such distinction really exists. Dissenting opinion of Biggs, J., in this case, in the court of appeals; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hayes, and Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, supra; Alexander v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 66.

Some of the authorities which announce a contrary rule with respect to the failure of plaintiff to return to defendant company whatever he had received of value from it by way of compromise, and for the release of his right of action, and to rescind the contract, will now be adverted to. The case of Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, supra, was an action brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of an agreement made by the defendants to return to the plaintiffs thereon certain United States bonds loaned by him to the bank. The defense was a return of the bonds, and a compromise agreement, whereby the bank agreed to pay plaintiff, in satisfaction of his claim against it, a certain sum of money, which plaintiff accepted. To this answer plaintiff made reply that he was induced to enter into the compromise agreement by fraud of defendants. No offer to return the money was made. Earl, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The compromise agreement, unless annulled, is an absolute bar to this action. It is a general rule, laid down in the textbooks and reported cases, that a party who seeks to rescind a contract into which he has been induced to enter by fraud must restore to the other party whatever he has obtained by virtue of the contract. Cobb v. Hatfield, 46 N. Y. 538. He cannot retain anything he received under the contract and yet proceed in disaffirmance thereof." It was further held in that case that, as it was an action at law upon the original claim, plaintiff must show that he rescinded the fraudulent compromise prior to the commencement of the action; and that, as no rescission was shown, a final determination by the court that plaintiff was entitled to more than the sum paid was no answer to the objection. It was also held that the rule is different where the compromise was of an undisputed claim, and that the offer to rescind might be made for the first time in the complaint. That is a leading case, and one of the best-considered cases anywhere reported. "It is idle to say that the distinctions between legal and equitable actions have been wiped out by modern practice. It is true that all actions must be commenced the same way; that in every form of action the facts constituting the cause of action or defense must be strictly stated; that fictions in pleadings have been abolished, and that both kinds of actions are triable in the same courts. But the distinction between legal and equitable actions is as fundamental as that between actions ex contractu and ex delicto, and no legislative fiat can wipe it out. Reubens v. Joel, 13 N. Y. 488; Goulet v. Asseler, 23 N. Y. 225. At any rate, the difference between an action to rescind a contract and one brought, not to rescind it, but based upon the theory that it had already been rescinded, is as broad as a gulf. They depend upon different principles, and require different judgments." Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, supra. The rule is laid down in Evans v. Gale, 17 N. H. 578, 43 Am. Dec. 614, as follows: "If one has been induced to make a contract to pay money or to deliver anything by such means that he is entitled to rescind the transaction, he must, in order to do so, first restore the other party whatever may have been received in exchange for the money or other things he seeks to recover back, and to which he would become entitled as his own property immediately upon the rescission of the act, whose proper effect would have been to vest in the other party." The reason of the rule, as stated by Chief Justice Shaw in Thayer v. Turner, 8 Met. 550, is that "the plaintiff, as far as it is in his power, shall put the defendant in statu quo, by restoring and revesting his former property in him, without putting him to an action to recover it back, before he can exercise his own right to take back the property sold, or bring an action for it." Kimball v. Cunningham, 4 Mass. 602, 8 Am. Dec. 230. In the case of Doane v. Lockwood, 115 Ill. 490, it was held that, when the vendor had received any valuable consideration or note of the purchaser upon a sale of goods, he cannot rescind the contract for fraud without first returning, or offering to return, the consideration received, whatever it may be. So when a party is induced to sell property upon false and fraudulent representations as to amount of property, and to take a note to secure the payment of the purchase price, he may rescind the contract by offering to return the note; but he cannot maintain replevin for the property sold until he does so. Moriarty v. Stofferan, 89 Ill. 528. If anything has been paid by the purchaser, although he obtained the property through fraud, before the vendor can recover it he must restore whatever value he received to the purchaser. The parties should be put in statu quo as far as possible. Stevens v. Hyde, 32 Barb. 171; McMichael v. Kilmer, 76 N. Y. 36; Graham v. Meyer, 99 N. Y. 611; Baird v. New York, 96 N. Y. 567; Tisdale v. Buckmore, 33 Me. 461; Cumplin v. Burton, 2 J. J. Marsh. 216; Gifford v. Carroll, 29 Cal. 589; Estes v. Reynolds, 75 Mo. 563; Biades v. Ham, 47 Me. 543; Bigelow, Fr. pp. 73, 74; Kreuzer v. Forty Second Street, M. & St. N. Ave. R. Co. 38 N. Y. S. R. 461.

When one has received anything of value on a settlement of a right of action, and executed a release thereof, it follows inevitably that, the contract of settlement not being void, it constitutes an insuperable barrier against a recovery so long as it is not rescinded or avoided by an offer to return the consideration paid for it. It was, in principle, so held in Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Howard, 111 Ind. 544. It was there decided "that it did not alter the case that the compromise may have been brought about by fraud and misrepresentation of the defendant, or that in the end it was found that a sum largely in excess of the amount paid to settle the disputed liability was due the plaintiff." See also Brown v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 117 Mass. 479. In Lee v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co., L. R. 6 Ch. App. 527, the plaintiff was injured by a railway accident, and sent in a claim for £891. The defendant paid him £400, and took a receipt acknowledging that sum to be in full discharge of his claim. He afterwards sued the company to recover further compensation, and it pleaded that the plaintiff had accepted the £400 in full satisfaction and discharge of the right of action. Plaintiff then filed his bill to restrain the company from relying on the plea, and, while he was defeated upon another ground, Lord Justice James expressed the opinion that he could get no relief in that court on the ground of mistake in giving the discharge, "except on the terms of giving back the £400, and being put exactly in the same position as he was in when the transaction was accepted." In the case of East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hayes, 83 Ga. 558, the plaintiff was injured by a railway accident. The defendant pleaded a settlement of the claim, and the payment of $100 to plaintiff in satisfaction thereof. Issue was taken on this plea, and it was held by the court that plaintiff could not successfully reply by showing that the agreement of release was obtained by defendant's fraud, without also showing that before commencing his suit he had tendered to the defendant the sum received, with demand of return of what defendant had received from him; thus rescinding the settlement. Bigelow, Fr. 73, 74; Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 552; dissenting opinion of Biggs, J., St. Louis court of appeals, in this case; Alexander v. G. and Ave. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 70. The same rule has been announced by the St. Louis court of appeals in the case of Cahn v. Reid, 18 Mo. App. 115; and by this court in the cases of Jarrett v. Morton, 44 Mo. 276; Hart v. Handlin, 43 Mo. 171; and in Estes v. Reynolds, 75 Mo. 563. The rule is, in actions of trover or replevin to recover property parted with, and all actions based solely upon the original relations between the parties, the plaintiff must show that he rescinded the fraudulent contract before the commencement of the action, by returning or offering to return to the party from whom it was received whatever of value was received for the release; in other words, that he had a cause of action when he commenced his action. Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, supra, and authorities cited. It is also held that, in case where a vendor upon a sale induced by fraud has taken the vendee's note, he may repudiate the contract, and bring his suit to recover the property sold without first surrendering the note. Thurston v. Blanchard, 23 Pick. 18, 83 Am. Dec. 700; Nichols v. Michael, 23 N. Y. 264, 80 Am. Dec. 259. The reason is: "As between the parties the note is not property, but a mere promise to pay, which is avoided by the rescission of the contract. It is of no value to the vendee, and needs to be surrendered to him at the trial merely because it might otherwise be used to his detriment." Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, supra.

It will thus be seen that the authorities are almost unanimous in holding that, where money or other valuable thing is paid on a settlement to obtain a release of any right of action, before the person to whom it is paid, and who has the right of action, can recover it, he must return or offer to return whatever he has received, if of any value; and this he must do although the settlement or release was obtained by fraud. And it is also manifest from the decided weight of authority that the offer to return whatever of value has been received as a consideration for the settlement or release must be made before or at the time the suit is brought, and the contract or agreement, in so far as it lies in the power of the party desiring to do so, rescinded. This question has never been directly passed upon by the appellate courts of this state in a case where the action was for personal injuries, except in two cases,—the case at bar, in which the St. Louis court of appeals, by a majority opinion, held that, as the plaintiff had been induced by fraud or undue influence to release his right of action, he might sue upon such right of action without first obtaining the annulment of the release by suit in equity; and, as such release was pleaded as a defense to the action, he might, in his reply, set up the fraud or undue influence in avoidance of it. Biggs, J., dissented from this decision. In the case of Alexander v. Grand Ave. R. Co. the ruling was directly to the contrary, and in that case it was held that, where fraud is alleged to have been practiced upon a party in the compromise settlement of a claim for damages at which a money consideration passed, a return or offer to return the latter is a prerequisite to the right to annul the contract of settlement, and to sue upon the original cause. While it is true that in the case of Mateer v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 105 Mo. 351, the answer pleaded a settlement of plaintiff's right of action, and the payment of a money consideration for the release, the question now under consideration was not passed upon or adverted to, so that case cannot be considered as an authority on this question. In this state, the question as to whether the plaintiff, before suing or at the time thereof, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, must have placed the defendant in statu quo by returning or offering to return to it everything of value received by him in consideration for the release, is an open one, the nearest approach to an adjudication upon that question by this court being the case of Blair v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 89 Mo. 384, wherein it was held that the plaintiff, who, as she alleged in her petition, had by fraud been induced to compromise a right of action that she had against the defendant therein for damages, might include in the same petition two counts,—one to set aside the settlement for fraud, offering to return the money received by her on the settlement; and the other an action on the case for damages. That this is the proper practice seems clear. A proceeding to set aside a settlement or release obtained by fraud should be by a proceeding in equity, and should be tried by the court. Moreover, in a case like this, the evidence should be clear and satisfactory, "such as will preponderate over presumption or evidence on the other side." It must be clearly and distinctly proven. Bump, Fr. p. 567. By proceeding in this way, the burden of proof rests on the plaintiff to establish the fraud; while in an action at law, when fraud is set up as a defense in obtaining the release, the case is triable before a jury, and a preponderance of evidence is only required in order to set aside the settlement. Not only this, but when the proceeding is, in the first place, to set aside the settlement and release, an opportunity is offered for a fair trial of the questions relating to the bona fides of the settlement and release, disconnected from the hearing of any facts relating to the main facts at issue in the case. This is but fair and equitable. The plaintiff should have embraced in his petition, in connection with the count for damages, a separate count to set aside the settlement and release, and with an offer to refund to defendant everything of value received from it in consideration of such settlement and release, as was done in the case of Blair v. Chicago & A. R. Co. supra.

The question of tender was argued both orally and in elaborate briefs, both in division and in banc, and no suggestion was made that the question was not properly for decision, and it was only discovered since the first submission that it was not saved in the circuit court. For this reason we considered it in division No. 2, and, as this opinion expresses our views, we will not rewrite the opinion filed in division No. 2, but we hold that the release can only be set aside in a court of equity, and therefore dissent from the view taken by a majority of the court on that question.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

A. N. AKIN, Trustee of the Bank of Columbia,

v.

W. J. JONES et al.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. Sending a draft to a bank for collection with instructions to remit in New York exchange is equivalent to an agreement that the money collected may be used by the collecting bank, and precludes the claim that such proceeds are held in trust, where the bank fails before it has paid the collection.
2. Payment to an assignee of an insolvent bank of over-drafts allowed by the bank on which it had canceled drafts held by it for collection, cannot be regarded as payments to the assignee of such canceled drafts so as to give the sender of them a right to such proceeds as a trust fund.
3. A check by one bank upon another, sent in payment of the collection of a draft, is not an equitable assignment of any portion of a general deposit on which it is drawn.

(January 17, 1894.)

CROSS-APPEALS from the Chancery Court for Maury County in a proceeding by the Trustee of the Bank of Columbia to settle the affairs of the trust, the Trustee appealing from so much of the decree as recognized a priority of J. W. Manier & Co. upon the assets in his hands, and Manier & Co. appealing from so much of the decree as refused to recognize a priority as to other portions of their claim. Affirmed on defendants' appeal, and reversed on complainant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sam Holding, E. H. Hatcher, and George T. Hughes for complainant.

Mr. J. C. McReynolds, for defendant:

Where paper is sent to a bank indorsed, "for collection," with instructions to remit the proceeds, the bank holds said paper as the agent or trustee for sender, and such funds as it collects on same are trust funds held by it for the sender.

Commercial Nat. Bank of Pennsylvania v. Armstrong, 148 U. S. 50, 87 L. ed. 863; National Butchers & Drovers Bank v. Hubbell, 7 L. R. A. 852, 117 N. Y. 884; Blaine v. Bourne, 11 R. Paine*, 66 Miss. 673; Kinney v. Paine, 68 Miss. 258.

As the bank in this case held the collections as agent or trustee charged with the duty to collect them by receiving money therefor, which, if received, would have been a trust fund, and as it received therefor not money but improperly an overdraft or debt against the drawers and maker, the owners of the collection can claim these overdrafts or debts in the hands of the assignee.

Weems*, 69 Tex. 459; Borches v. Morgan, 5 Cent. L. J. p. 53; Perry, Tr. § 447.

If these overdrafts made to pay the collections owned by Manier & Co. were paid to the assignee, it amounted in a court of equity to a payment of the collections themselves to him.

McAllister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented in this record, stated in general terms, is whether the holder of two certain checks, drawn by the Bank of Columbia prior to making a general assignment, is entitled to payment in full out of certain funds in the hands of the assignee of said bank, or whether said check holder is merely a general creditor of said bank, and, as such, only entitled to a ratable share in the distribution of its assets. It appears from the record that on the 17th October, 1891, the Bank of Columbia made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors. The trustee named in the deed having declined to serve, A. N. Akin was duly appointed, and has been administering the trust. The present bill was filed by the trustee against the creditors of said bank for the settlement of all matters growing out of said trust, and for the adjudication of all questions of priorities.

The defendants J. W. Mainer & Co. are merchants, doing business in Nashville, and on about September 29, 1891, inclosed to the Bank of Columbia a draft on Massey & Son, of Lipscomb, Tenn., for the sum of $137.20, drawn by Manier & Co. to their own order, and indorsed by said firm to the Bank of Columbia for collection. Massey & Son, the drawees of said draft, on the 15th of October, 1891, gave their check on the Bank of Columbia in payment of said draft, which overdraw their account in said bank in the sum of $102.12. It appears that Massey & Son had to their credit in said bank, at the time of drawing the check, the sum of $35. The draft was canceled by the bank, and delivered up to Massey & Son. Manier & Co., in their letter inclosing the draft for collection, had directed the bank to remit the proceeds in New York exchange. On the 16th October, 1891, the Bank of Columbia sent to Manier & Co. its check on the Merchants' National Bank of Louisville, covering proceeds of draft on Massey & Son. Manier & Co. received said check October 17th, and immediately telegraphed to the Merchants' National Bank of Louisville to know if this check would be paid, and were informed that it would not be paid. It appears that on the same day the Bank of Columbia made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors. Manier & Co. on same day returned this check to Bank of Columbia, informing its cashier they would claim payment in full out of the assets of said trust. It further appears that at the time Manier & Co. received the draft on the Merchants' National Bank of Louisville, Ky., there was to the credit of the Bank of Columbia in said Louisville bank something over $2,250. All drafts drawn on the Louisville bank by the Bank of Columbia subsequent to October 14, 1891, were refused payment when presented. Some time after the assignment, the Merchants' National Bank of Louisville, with the assent of the trustee of the Bank of Columbia but without the knowledge of Manier & Co., paid out of the funds to the credit of the Bank of Columbia such drafts as had been presented to it, in the order of presentation, until the whole fund was exhausted. The telegram sent by Manier & Co. to the Merchants' National Bank was received, and payment of their check refused, before the presentation of money of the drafts which were afterwards paid. No offer has been made to pay the draft held by Manier & Co., and there are now no funds with which to pay it to the credit of the Bank of Columbia in the Louisville bank. It further appears that, after the affairs of the Bank of Columbia went into the hands of the assignee, Massey & Co. paid their overdraft, amounting to $102.12, in full to said assignee. This is a full statement of facts appearing in the record with respect to the check on the Merchants' National Bank of Louisville given by the Bank of Columbia to Manier & Co. for the proceeds of their draft on Massey & Son.

NOTE.—As to the effect of the insolvency of a bank to which commercial paper has been sent for collection, see note to National Butchers & Drovers Bank v. Hubbell (N. Y.) 7 L. R. A. 852, 25 L. R. A.

The other claim of Manier & Co. is based upon the following statement of agreed facts: It appears that on or about September 8, 1891, Manier, & Co. inclosed to the Bank of Columbia, for collection, the note of W. K. Stephens, dated July 3, 1891, payable to the order of Manier & Co., and due October 1st thereafter, for the sum of $195.95. The bank was directed to remit the proceeds of the note to Manier & Co. in New York exchange. On the 18th of October, 1891, W. K. Stephens, the maker of this note, paid it by an overdraft on the Bank of Columbia. At the time his check was given, the account of Stephens was overdrawn in the sum of $1,100, and had remained overdrawn since May 31, 1891. On the 18th October, 1891, the Bank of Columbia sent to Manier & Co. their check on the Importers' & Traders' National Bank of New York for the sum of $195.45, with the advice that it was given for the amount collected on the Stephens note. This check was received in due course of mail by Manier & Co., and at once forwarded by them to New York, and presented for payment. Payment was refused, and thereupon the check was protested and all proper notices given. Manier & Co. immediately notified the trustee for the Bank of Columbia, and made claim on him for the full amount of the check. As already stated in connection with the Massey & Son draft, the Bank of Columbia, on the 17th of October, 1891, made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors. It further appears that, when the check was presented to the Importers' & Traders' National Bank of New York, there was to the credit of the Bank of Columbia in the New York bank sufficient funds to meet it. Subsequent to the presentation of defendants' check, the Importers' & Traders' National Bank paid to the trustee of the Bank of Columbia the balance to the credit of said bank, and this amount the trustee now holds, as a separate fund, subject to the orders of the court in this case. It should be stated that, after the affairs of the bank went into the hands of the assignee, it was ascertained that Stephens' account was overdrawn on October 16th (the last day the bank transacted business) in the sum of $1,400, and that it had been overdrawn more than $300 since July 31, 1891. The assignee, acting upon the advice of counsel, afterwards compromised and settled Stephens' overdraft, realizing something more than 50 per cent of same which went into the trust fund.

Upon the foregoing facts, the chancellor decreed, viz.: First. That Manier & Co. had the right to repudiate the check on Louisville given by the Bank of Columbia in payment of the Massey & Son draft, in violation of instructions to send New York exchange. Second. That in respect to the amount of Massey & Son's overdraft on the Bank of Columbia, to wit, the sum of $102.12, which was made by paying to the said bank the draft of Manier & Co. on Massey & Son, and which was collected by the trustee of said bank after its failure, as to this amount, Manier & Co. were entitled to be paid in full, and in preference to the general creditors of said bank. Third. But as to the sum of $35, which Massey & Son had on deposit when they gave their check to the bank for the draft of Manier & Co., and which, therefore, the bank actually received before its failure, as to this amount Manier & Co. were not entitled to be paid in full in preference to the general creditors of said bank, but were only entitled to receive their pro rata. Fourth. That, as to the Stephens collection, Manier & Co. accepted the check on the Importers' & Traders' National Bank in payment of said collection, but that said check was not an equitable assignment pro tanto of the funds of the Bank of Columbia in the hands of the New York bank, and which afterwards came into the hands of the trustee of the Bank of Columbia; and that, therefore, Manier & Co. were only general creditors of said Bank of Columbia, and, as such, were only entitled to receive their pro rata upon said note. From so much of said decree as adjudges that Manier & Co. are entitled to be paid in full the sum of $102.12, in preference to the general creditors of the Bank of Columbia, the complainant, A. N. Akin, appealed, and has assigned errors. The defendants Manier & Co. have appealed from so much of said decree as adjudges that they are only entitled to receive their pro rata upon the check of the Bank of Columbia on the Importers' & Traders' Bank of New York, given in payment of the Stephens note.

It is assigned as error by counsel for A. N. Akin, trustee, that the chancellor adjudged that Manier & Co. were entitled to be paid in full, in preference to the general creditors, the amount of Massey & Son's overdraft, which was collected by the trustee. It is insisted on behalf of the trustee that although indorsements for collection vest no title to the draft in the bank, and, if the draft is collected by the trustee of the bank after its failure, the law imposes a trust upon the proceeds in favor of the owner, yet, if the draft is collected by the bank before its failure, and while it is a going concern, and the transaction of payment is complete between the bank and the drawee, then the relation of the bank to the owner of the draft is that of debtor and creditor, and there is no trust in favor of the owner, and he has no preferred lien upon the assets of the bank in the hands of the assignee, but can only take his pro rata share in the distribution of the assets. On the other hand, it is insisted on behalf of Manier & Co. that when paper is sent to a bank indorsed for collection, with instructions to remit the proceeds, the bank holds said paper as the agent or trustee for sender, and funds collected on same are trust funds, held by it for sender; that the bank in this case held the collections as agent or trustee, charged with the duty to collect them in money, which, if received, would have been a trust fund; but, as the bank improperly received an overdraft or debt against the maker, the owners of the collection can claim these overdrafts or debts in the hands of the assignee. Defendants Manier & Co. further insist that if these overdrafts, made to pay their drafts, were afterwards paid to the assignee, it amounted in a court of equity to a payment of the collections themselves. The general rule on this subject is that an indorsement for collection vests no title to the paper in the bank, and, if the paper passes into the hands of the assignee after insolvency, the owner may recover it specifically, or, if the assignee collects the paper, the owner may recover the proceeds; but, if the bank makes the collection before the assignment, it simply becomes an ordinary contract debtor of the owner, and he cannot impress any trust upon the proceeds. 1 Morse, Banks & Banking,

§ 248. Of course, there may be special facts in a case which will take it out of the ordinary rule, and create a trust on the funds collected. Such special facts were found in the case of Continental Nat. Bank of New York v. Weems, 69 Tex. 489, cited by counsel for defendant. In this case the agreement between the two banks in reference to the proceeds was that "they should be preserved by said bank as the property of the complainant, and returned to it as such." The court thought these special facts settled the question of trust in favor of the complainant; but the rule undoubtedly is that unless there is some agreement or course of dealing whereby the funds are to be held separate, and the identical proceeds remitted, the owner of the drafts stands upon no higher ground than the other creditors of the bank in a case where the bank collects the draft prior to making a general assignment. It will be noticed that in this case Manier & Co. directed the bank to send New York exchange; that is to say, Manier & Co. directed the Bank of Columbia to send them its check on New York in payment of the proceeds of collection. As stated by counsel: "This is the determining fact in the record. It was virtually an express direction not to send the identical moneys collected, nor to hold them separate for Manier & Co., but was equivalent to an agreement that the bank might use the money collected, and pay Manier & Co. by its check on New York. Any agreement or understanding or course of dealing whereby the bank is to use the identical moneys collected, and substitute its own obligation in its stead, destroys all idea of a trust."

It is argued, however, that the overdrafts made by the drawees on the Bank of Columbia to pay their drafts due to Manier & Co. were afterwards paid to the assignee, and such payment amounted in a court of equity to a payment of the drafts themselves to the assignee. This view of the case cannot be maintained. The transaction between the bank and Massey & Son and W. K. Stephens, the drawees of the drafts, was a completed transaction. Massey & Son and Stephens gave their checks on the Bank of Columbia for the amount of the drafts drawn against them, respectively, and the drafts were canceled and delivered up to the drawees. The fact that the bank allowed the drawees to overdraw their accounts does not affect the question of payment. In his work on Commercial Paper, Mr. Randolph says: "If the holder of a bill directs that it be paid to a certain banker, procuring credit with such banker will amount to a payment of the bill. So, if the amount of a note is credited to a bank holding it for collection (according to the custom of dealings between the banks), it will be a payment, although the bank making the note and giving the credit failed on the day it was so credited." 8 Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 1395-1456. The doctrine has been extended, and collecting banks have been recognized as authorized to receive their own certificates of deposit in payment, and the debtor is discharged, even though the bank fails before remitting. See Howard v. Walker, 92 Tenn. 456.

The next question presented is in respect to the check given by the bank of Columbia on the Importers' & Traders' National Bank of New York in payment of the Stephens note. It is insisted by counsel for Manier & Co. that they are entitled to be paid in full, for the reason that this check was an equitable assignment pro tanto of the funds of the Bank of Columbia in the hands of the New York bank, and that, the New York Bank having refused to pay the check, and having returned the funds in its hands to the trustee of the bank of Columbia, defendants are entitled to the payment of their check in full. It is insisted that the assignee for the benefit of creditors takes the property and chooses in action of his assignor, not as a purchaser for value, but as a volunteer, and therefore subject to all the defenses and equities against them in the hands of the assignor, and not only so, but that he holds as the representative of the assignor and his estate. This principle is well settled, and will not be further noticed. Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank of Nashville, 91 Tenn. 386, 15 L. R. A. 710. The other question, however, in respect to equitable assignments, is involved in much conflict of authority. Mr. Morse, in his work on Banks and Banking (vol. 2, § 493), formulates the question thus: "Is a check an equitable assignment between the drawee and a bona fide holder for value, so that the latter will be preferred over general creditors of the drawer in case of his insolvency before the check is cashed?" The author answers the question by stating that the most numerous body of decisions sustains the view that a check is neither a legal nor an equitable assignment as between drawer and payee, nor a sufficient foundation for any action by the holder against the bank. The author qualifies the statement with the remark that there may exist special facts giving an equation of easy solution, as if the check is drawn on a designated fund, or is accepted by the bank, or if the bank charges the amount to the drawer, or settles with him on the basis of allowing for the check. In these and other instances, the author states, there is no doubt the bank can be held in an action by the holder. Counsel for Manier & Co. cite several dicta to be found in our own cases to the effect that a check is an appropriation by the debtor of so much of his deposit in bank to his creditor. See Springfield v. Green, 7 Baxt. 302; Schoolfield v. Moon, 9 Heisk. 178; Planters Bank of Tennessee v. Merritt, 7 Heisk. 193. It will be found upon an examination of these cases that the only question presented for adjudication was in respect to the liability of the drawer,—whether he was discharged by the failure of the holder to present his check in a reasonable time, the bank in the meantime having become insolvent. The case of Imboden v. Perrie, 13 Lea, 504, involved more of the features presented in this case than any other reported in this state. In that case the question arose between creditors. One creditor held a check of the debtor against a general deposit of the debtor in bank, while the other was an attachment creditor of that fund. The question was fairly raised in that case whether the check worked an equitable assignment of the fund in bank to the check holder before the presentation of the check or notice to the bank. If so, the check-holding creditor was entitled to priority. If not, then the attachment had priority. Judge Turney, in delivering the opinion of the court against the defendant's theory of equitable assignment, cited approvingly the opinion of Chief Justice Church in Atty-Gen. v. Continental L. Ins. Co., 71 N. Y. 825, 37 Am. Rep. 55, to the effect that checks drawn in the ordinary form, not describing any particular fund or using any words of transfer of the whole, or any part of any amount standing to the credit of the drawer, but containing only the usual request, are of the same effect as inland bills of exchange, and do not amount to an assignment of the funds of the drawer in bank. "This doctrine," he continues, "accords with the relation between the parties. Banks are debtors to their customers for the amount of their deposits. A check is a request of the customer to pay the whole or a portion of such indebtedness to the bearer, or to the order of the payee. Until presented and accepted, it is inchoate. It vests no title, legal or equitable, in the payee to the fund. Before acceptance the drawer may withdraw his deposits. The bank owes no duty to the holder until the check is presented for payment. Knowledge that checks have been drawn does not make it obligatory upon the bank to retain the deposits to meet them. These rules are indispensable to the safe transaction of commercial business." It is contended by counsel for Manier & Co. that the case of Imboden v. Perrie did not raise the identical question here presented. It is insisted that the question in that case arose between creditors, but that the question presented here is between the drawer and the payee of the check, the assignee standing in the shoes of the drawer. The case of Atty-Gen. v. Continental L. Ins. Co., supra, cited with approval by Judge Turney in the 13 Lea case, presented the exact state of facts found in this record. In that case the insurance company gave its check upon a trust company in payment of a loss, the company having at the time on deposit a sum exceeding the amount of the check, but prior to its presentation a receiver of the insurance company was appointed, who withdrew all the funds deposited with the trust company. In an action by the check holder against the receiver to recover the whole amount of the check out of the funds in his hands, it was held by the court of appeals of New York that the check, not having been drawn on a particular fund, was not an equitable assignment pro tanto of a general deposit, and that the check holder was not entitled to payment in full in preference to the claims of other creditors. See also Risley v. Phenix Bank of New York, 33 N. Y. 318, 38 Am. Rep. 421; Aetna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 87, 7 Am. Rep. 814.

We are of opinion that the great weight of authority is opposed to the contention of defendants, and establishes the doctrine that the delivery of a check against a general deposit is not a legal or equitable assignment of any portion of the fund.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, DISTRICT OF INDIANA.

CAIRO, VINCENNES & CHICAGO R. CO.

v.

BREVOORT.

(62 Fed. Rep. 123.)

1. The right of an adjoining landowner to make a new bank for a navigable river, which forms the boundary between two states, or by artificial structures to turn the water upon the lands upon the opposite side of the river, is not a local question on which a federal court is bound by state decisions, but depends upon general principles of law.

2. A railroad company in bridging a stream must provide a sufficient waterway for the passage of the water, including the superabundant water which flows into and down the stream in times of ordinary floods.

3. A riparian proprietor has no right to erect a levee or artificial bank along the margin of a stream which will cause superabundant water in times of ordinary floods to flow upon the lands of the opposite riparian proprietor.

4. The flow of a river when swollen beyond the low-water mark of the dry seasons by the ordinary rains which fall in wet

NOTE.—What is surface water?

The question, what is surface water, has caused the courts almost as much trouble as the one as to the rights respecting surface water, the cases upon which may be found in the note to Gray v. McWilliams (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 538.

It seems to be easier to determine that a particular quantity of water is or is not surface water than to formulate a comprehensive definition. Therefore the courts have decided most cases upon the facts before them and in so doing have given prominence to some one fact which in the particular case was of commanding importance, and the result has been that while the cases are numerous in which the question has been decided, each deals with only a part of the subject and an examination of several is necessary for a comprehensive view can be obtained.

Distinguished from watercourse.

In a great majority of the cases particular water has been adjudged to be surface water because it was not a watercourse. It will be necessary therefore to state here the definitions of watercourse made for the purpose of differentiating surface water, while rejecting all others.

a. What is a watercourse?

A watercourse is a stream of water usually flowing in a definite channel, having a bed and sides or banks and usually discharging itself into some other stream or body of water; it must be something more than a mere surface drainage over the entire face of a tract of land occasioned by unusual freshets or other extraordinary causes. Luther v. Winnimmet Co. 9 Cush. 174; Hoyt v. Hudson, 27 Wis. 555, 9 Am. Rep. 473; Jones v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 18 Mo. App. 251.

To constitute a watercourse the flow of water must possess that unity of character by which the flow on one person's land could be identified with that on his neighbor's land. Briscoe v. Drought, 11 Ir. C. L. Rep. 350.

To maintain the right to a watercourse it must be made to appear that the water usually flows in a certain direction and by a regular channel with banks or sides. Wagner v. Long Island R. Co. 3 Hun. 533, 5 Thomp. & C. 163.

There is a broad distinction between a regular flowing stream and occasional and temporary outbursts of water which in times of freshets fill up low places and run over and inundate adjoining lands. To maintain the right to a watercourse or brook it must be made to appear that the water usually flows in a certain direction and by a regular channel with banks and sides. It must have a well-defined and substantial existence. Ashley v. Wolcott, 11 Cush. 192.

To be a watercourse the stream must have a well-defined and substantial existence. Schlichter v. Phillipy, 67 Ind. 204.

There must be evidence of a permanent stream of running water. Weiss v. Madison, 75 Ind. 253, 30 Am. Rep. 135.

b. How far channel necessary or sufficient.

It will be observed that in the above definitions a channel with banks is made a conspicuous element of a watercourse as distinguished from surface water. But there are many flowing currents of water which have no channel with banks which could not be classed as surface water.

The overflow of a lake does not become mere surface water by the fact that it spreads through marshes and swamps to a considerable width on its way to a natural outlet. Case v. Hoffman, 20 L. R. A. 40, 84 Wis. 438.

Marsh lands through which overflow water from a lake reaches a natural stream are not governed by the rules applicable to mere surface water. West v. Taylor, 16 Or. 165.

A stream from a spring does not become surface water by the fact that some distance from its source it becomes so sluggish and widely diffused that the flow is not sufficient to break the turf, if there is a continuous current along the surface in a natural depression. Gillett v. Johnson, 30 Conn. 180.

The mere fact that because of the level character of the land the water of a brook spreads over a wide space without apparent banks does not deprive it of its character as a watercourse, if it usually flows in a continuous current. Macomber v. Godfrey, 106 Mass. 219, 11 Am. Rep. 343.

Water from a spring does not become surface water which may be diverted by the upper proprietor by the fact that for a part of its course it spreads several rods in width and the current is not sufficient to cut through the sod, if there is a current and lower down it again narrows up and is sufficient in volume and velocity to cut a channel for itself. Hinkle v. Avery (Iowa) May 13, 1893.

But water from springs which after running in a definite channel for a certain distance spreads itself over the surface, and never again attains a seasons, or by the melting of snows, does not constitute surface water which may be turned by embankments.

5. The easement of a railroad company under a deed conveying the same estate which could have been acquired under condemnation proceedings, prevents the construction by the owner of the fee of levees on a river bank, which would change the natural condition of a river over which the road runs, in time of ordinary floods, thereby causing injury to the railroad approach and track, or rendering the company liable for injuries to other persons by water impeded by the bridge.

ON DEMURRER to a bill filed to enjoin the construction of an embankment along the edge of the Wabash river, which it was alleged would materially injure the complainant. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

regular course and channel, becomes mere surface water. Hawley v. Sheldon, 64 Vt. 491.

And water which issues from springs at the base of a range of hills and flows sluggishly and without any determinate channel over adjoining lands towards a natural creek is mere surface water. White v. Sheldon, 35 Hun. 198.

And in Iowa it has been held that it is not sufficient that the waters customarily or naturally flow in a known direction and course if they have no banks or channels in the soil. Livingston v. McDonald, 31 Iowa, 180, 89 Am. Dec. 563.

And in New Jersey it was held that water flowing over the edges of a basin in which collects surface water in the form of a pond continues to be surface water although it flows in an appreciable channel, if there is no flow except in times of heavy rains. Bowlsby v. Speer, 31 N. J. L. 354, 86 Am. Dec. 216.

In England it has been said that there is a distinction between water which comes no one knows exactly whence, and flows no one knows exactly how, either under ground or on the surface, unconfined in any channel either as rainfall or from springs of the earth which may vary from day to day—and water once confined in a regular channel. Grand Junction Canal Co. v. Shugar, L. R. 6 Ch. 486, 24 L. T. N. S. 402, 19 Week. Rep. 569.

Conversely there are many channels which have been cut by water which could not be classed as watercourses.

Thus a channel made by mere surface water resulting from rain and snow is not a watercourse unless there is ordinarily and most frequently a moving body of water flowing through it. Hill v. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. 109 Ind. 511.

The existence or nonexistence of a channel with banks is not therefore of itself sufficient to determine the question.

In fact in Illinois it has been held that, if the conformation of the land is such as to give the surface water flowing from one tract to the other a fixed and determinate course so as to uniformly discharge it upon the surrounding tracts at a fixed and definite point, the course thus uniformly followed is a watercourse within the meaning of the rule applicable to that subject. Lambert v. Alcorn, 21 L. R. A. 611, 144 Ill. 813.

But that ruling is not in accord with the weight of authority upon that question. See note to Wharton v. Stevens (Iowa) 15 L. R. A. 630.

a. The source of supply.

Some cases have given some prominence to the question of the source of the supply.

Mears, Rely & Emison for defendant in support of demurrer.

Mears, C. S. Conger and Elliott & Elliott for complainant, contra.

Baker, District Judge, delivered the following opinion:

The questions for decision arise upon a demurrer to the bill of complaint. The grounds of demurrer are that the bill of complaint does not state facts entitling the complainant to any equitable relief. The facts stated are that the complainant has constructed, owns, and operates a line of railway along the bank of the Wabash river, in the state of Illinois, opposite to a tract of land owned and occupied by the defendant, which is situated in Knox county, in the state of Indiana; that the complainant is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Illinois, and is a citizen of that state; that it owns and operates a branch or short line of railroad which crosses the Wabash

The overflow from artificial basins or marishes which follows no definite course and only exists in times of floods is surface water. Broadbent v. Ramsbotham, 11 Exch. 602, 23 L. J. Exch. 118.

To be a watercourse the source of supply must be more permanent than mere surface water. Jeffers v. Jeffers, 107 N. Y. 650.

But the source is not alone sufficient to determine the question, for streams may be composed wholly of water falling in the shape of rain or snow. McKinley v. Union County Chosen Freeholders, 39 N. J. Eq. 171; Kelley v. Dunning, 39 N. J. Eq. 483.

d. Source and channel.

A combination of source and channel may furnish a more accurate test.

Water which has a definite source, as a spring, and takes a definite channel, is not surface water. Pyle v. Richards, 17 Neb. 182.

Spring water which has acquired a well-defined channel is no longer surface water. Dudden v. Guardians of Clutton Union, 1 Hurlst. & N. 627, 38 L. J. Exch. 145.

So it has been held that water rising to the surface in springs or boggy ground and flowing in no definite channel, or the supply of which is not constant, is to be regarded as mere surface water. Bawstron v. Taylor, 11 Exch. 390, 26 L. J. Exch. 33.

e. Permanence of flow.

The question of the permanence of the flow cannot be made the determining feature.

For the flow need not be permanent to form a watercourse. Rose v. St. Charles, 49 Mo. 509.

Although a usual flow of water is an essential element of a watercourse. Fryer v. Warne, 29 Wis. 511.

And depressions which are dry except when it rains are not watercourses. Benson v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 78 Mo. 514.

If surface water has flowed in a certain direction for such a length of time as to have naturally formed a bed and banks and a well-defined stream of flowing water, even though it may sometimes be dry at the place where it had formed such bed and banks, it may still be a watercourse. Rulrich v. Richter, 41 Wis. 315.

f. Water which has joined a watercourse.

After water enters a stream and commences to flow within its banks it is no longer to be considered surface water. Jones v. Hannover, 55 Mo. 462.

When once surface water has found its way to the beds of well-defined streams and has joined their currents it ceases to possess any of the river from the Illinois side, and extends thence over lands in Knox county, Ind., to the city of Vincennes, in said county; that the branch line of railway is constructed upon and across the lands of defendant, where the railway crosses the Wabash river into Knox county, Ind.; that on the Indiana side, where said railway is constructed from the Indiana bank of the river for a short distance, the branch railway is built upon trestlework, in such manner that the water overflowing the Indiana side of the river, in times of floods, passes through the trestlework; that the defendant has built a levee on his lands upon and along the banks of the river, on the Indiana side, near to said trestlework, and intends and threatens to continue said levee upon and across the complainant's right of way, and to join the same to the embankment and end of said trestle, where the same unites with an embankment or filling of solid earthwork, upon which the railway is constructed. It is further averred that the complainant has constructed its railway across the river upon a bridge with a sufficient opening on both sides of the river to suffer and permit the water accumulating in times of floods to pass, without material obstruction, through and under said bridge and trestlework; that a part of the plan, in constructing the bridge, was to leave open trestlework on the Indiana side of the river for the passage of flood water; and that, if the defendant shall complete his proposed levee, it will hold the flood water, when the river is high, within so narrow a channel that it will thereby become higher than it otherwise would, and would endanger the bridge, trestlework, and embankments of the railway, as well as the tracks and superstructure erected thereon, and would cause the right of way and other large bodies of land on the Illinois side of the river to be overflowed, subjecting the complainant to many suits by the owners of such lands for damages. The bill further avers that the qualities of surface water. Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Archibald, 67 Miss. 38.

Water flowing in a channel and fed by springs along its banks and bed, and melting snow in the mountains, is a watercourse, although at certain times it may be dry and at a certain point it spreads out over sandy soil so that a portion of it is absorbed. Barnes v. Sabron, 10 Nev. 236.

The channel universally taken by a stream which ordinarily loses itself in a sink hole whenever the water rises high enough to overflow the sink cannot be blocked up although overflows do not average to occur as often as once a year. Carriger v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 7 Lea, 338.

Distinguished from basins or marshes.

In Curtis v. Ayrault, 47 N. Y. 73, it appeared that except in times of high water the water stood three or four feet deep over a marsh without overflowing into a natural watercourse adjacent, and the court said that the waters which stood upon the marsh or were held in partial suspension in the earth were in legal effect surface water.

If a swamp or marsh is made by water oozing from the surrounding hills which is generally wholly absorbed by the marsh, and water only flows from it in times of excessive rains and melting snows, the water may be treated as surface water. Boyn-ton v. Gilman, 53 Vt. 17.

Water which collects in a quarry does not cease to be surface water so that it cannot be pumped into a natural watercourse, into which before the interruption it was accustomed to drain. McCormick v. Horan, 81 N. Y. 88, 37 Am. Rep. 479.

When surface waters reach and become part of a permanent body of water retained in a natural basin forming a lake they lose their character as surface water, and the rules applicable to such waters do not longer apply. Schaefer v. Martbaler, 84 Minn. 487, 37 Am. Rep. 73; Alcorn v. Sadler, 66 Miss. 221.

A lake formed by living streams and emptying itself by filtering through a bed of gravel at one end towards which it flows with such rapidity as to create a continual current, is not surface water. Hebron Gravel Road Co. v. Harvey, 90 Ind. 122, 46 Am. Rep. 199.

Definition of surface water.

Besides the above cases which have attempted to define by exclusion several direct attempts have been made to define affirmatively.

Surface water is that which is diffused over the surface of the ground derived from falling rains and melting snows, and continues to be such until it reaches some well-defined channel in which it is accustomed to and does flow with other waters, whether derived from the surface or springs, and then it becomes the running water of a stream and ceases to be surface water. Crawford v. Rambo, 44 Ohio St. 287.

The wild water that lies upon the surface of the earth or temporarily flows over it as the nature of artificial elevations or depressions may guide or invite it, but without a channel, and which may be caused by the falling of rain, or the melting of snow and ice, or the rising of contiguous streams or rivers, is within the rule governing surface water. Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 167, 81 Am. Rep. 114.

Water is surface water while it is oozing through the soil, or diffusing and squandering itself over the surface following no defined course. Schaefer v. Martbaler, and Alcorn v. Sadler, supra.

The term "surface water" includes such as is carried off by surface drainage, i. e., drainage independently of a watercourse. Morrissey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (Neb.) Nov. 21, 1893.

Water which squanders itself over an indefinite surface is not a proper subject-matter for the acquisition of a right by usage. Briscoe v. Drought, 11 Ir. C. L. Rep. 250.

Water flowing down the side of a valley, with no marked stream or bank and no water but at exceptional seasons of the year, is mere surface water. Morrison v. Bucksport & B. R. Co., 67 Me. 353.

Surface water is such as falls from the clouds in the form of rain or snow, or rises to the surface in springs. Gray v. McWilliams, 21 L. R. A. 533, 96 Cal. 157.

From all the cases and definitions it would seem that surface water is water on the surface of the ground the source of which is so temporary or limited as not to be able to maintain for any considerable time, a stream or body of water having a well-defined and substantial existence.

A question for the jury.

In New York it has been said that the question whether or not a watercourse exists is for the jury. Vernum v. Wheeler, 35 Hun, 55.

Water overflowing river banks.

The attempt to class flood water from a stream as surface water has led to almost endless confusion. It is obvious that in some cases the overflow might be so slight and the water so widely diffused as to complainant has been in the undisturbed possession and use of its right of way, as it now exists, and did exist at and before the time when the defendant began to construct his levee, for over twenty years; that it obtained the same by deed from the owner of the land, from whom the defendant long afterwards acquired his title. It is further averred that the complainant owns a right of way, 200 feet in width, over and across the defendant's land, held by a deed conveying all the right and privileges incident thereto, it being the purpose of the grantors in said deed to grant to said company such exclusive interest and estate in said strip of land (and no other interest or estate) as said company would acquire therein, were the same condemned to the use of said railroad by regular proceedings under the statutes of the state in that behalf made and provided.

In support of the demurrer, counsel for the defendant contend that the riparian proprietor may lawfully protect his property from floods by erecting a dike or levee on the bank of a stream, though its necessary effect may be to turn its superabundant waters on the land of his neighbor; that the waters of a stream, when swollen beyond its banks by ordinary and habitually recurring floods, are in the nature of surface water; and that such waters are a common enemy, which such proprietor may fight off as he will. And it is further contended that the complainant, by its deed of conveyance, has acquired only an easement of way, and that the defendant retains the paramount title, and may law-come within the above definition of surface water, and that in other cases the torrent is such as to preclude any resemblance to ordinary surface water.

As said by the supreme court of Georgia, whether or not flood water is surface water "depends upon the configuration of the country, and the relative position of the water after it has gone beyond the usual channel." If the flood water becomes severed from the main current or leaves the stream, never to return, and spreads out over the lower ground, it has become surface water; but if it forms a continuous body with the water flowing in the ordinary channel, or if it departs from such channel animo revertendi, presently to return, as by the recession of the waters, it is to be regarded as still a part of the river. The identity of a river does not depend upon the volume of water which may happen to flow down its course at any particular season.

The authorities hold that a stream may be wholly dry at times without losing the character of a watercourse. So, on the other hand, it may have a "flood channel," to retain the surplus waters until they can be discharged by the natural flow. The low places on a river act as natural safety-valves in times of freshet." O'Connell v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 18 L. R. A. 397, 87 Ga. 246.

Therefore, to attempt to make the rights with reference to flood water of a river depend upon whether or not it is surface water is useless. The only safe course is to treat flood water as a class by itself and then determine the respective rights according to the character of the flood.

Moreover, all time spent in determining whether or not it is surface water is wasted, for if it is decided to be such the further question immediately arises, What are the rights in regard to it which will depend upon what is sought to be done with it? (See note to Gray v. McWilliams, 21 L. R. A. 593, 98 Cal. 157.) Bringing in the surface water question merely complicates the matter and leads to conflict.

There are some cases in which the question of liability for raising the banks of a stream so as to cause the water to flow upon an adjoining owner has been discussed without any consideration of whether or not the flood water thereby diverted was surface water. Wallace v. Drew, 59 Barb. 418; Moyer v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 251; Ordway v. Canisteo, 66 Hun. 569; Mundy v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 75 Hun. 479; Ashberry v. West Seneca, 88 N. Y. S. R. 431.

In England the courts have gone to the full extent of treating the flood water as a part of the stream and have ascertained the rights and duties of riparian owners accordingly.

There is no solid ground for distinction between the ordinary water of a stream and its flood water. Menzies v. Broadalbane, 5 Bligh, N. S. 414.

So there is no difference between the rules governing the flood water and those governing the ordinary water of the stream. Hax v. Trafford, 1 Barn. & Ad. 874.

While this decision was reversed on appeal it was because the facts stated in the special verdict were not sufficient to sustain the judgment. The appellate court in the course of its opinion states that there appears to be no doubt that at common law the land holders would have the right to raise the banks of the river or brook from time to time as it became necessary upon their own lands so as to confine the flood water within the banks, with the single restriction that they did not thereby occasion any injury to the lands or property of other persons. 8 Bing. 204, 1 Moore & S. 401, 2 Crompt. & J. 265, Tyrw. 201.

Flood water cannot be dammed back. Lawrence v. Great Northern R. Co. 16 Q. B. 643.

a. The right to build levees.

There are places in which the overflow of the river is so disastrous that the safety of life and property demand the right to protect against the overflow the same as in the case of the sea which Lord Tenterden said was a common enemy. And in such cases the right is held to exist.

In Dubose v. Levee Comrs., 11 La. Ann. 165, the court treated the right of the public to erect the levee as controlling and that of the landowner along the bank as subordinate.

In Mailhot v. Pugh, 30 La. Ann. 1899, the court holds that embankments against overflowing rivers may lawfully be erected, stating that such is the civil law, and further stating that one cannot claim damages for injuries to which he has contributed by his culpable indolence in refusing to aid the common object of fighting off flood water.

The state has an absolute power to construct levees. Bass v. State, 34 La. Ann. 494.

The flood water of a river may be fought off as a common enemy. Lamb v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 78 Cal. 125; McDaniel v. Cummings, 5 L. R. A. 575, 58 Cal. 515.

In California where the lower owner is compelled to permit surface water to pass off over his land, it is held that overflow water from a river is not within the rule, but that water which seeps or percolates through a levee along the bank of the river may be considered within the rule. Gray v. McWilliams, 21 L. R. A. 593, 98 Cal. 157.

It is worthy of note that the courts in which such right is maintained are those which have adopted the rule which recognizes a servitude in the flow of surface water.

The same result is reached in Indiana by holding that flood water is surface water, therefore it may be kept back by levees.

Levees may be constructed to protect against fully erect his levee thereon, doing no unnecessary injury to the complainant. Cases are cited from the supreme court of this state, which, it is claimed, support these contentions. These cases, if of the character claimed, would be authoritative expositions of the law for the control and guidance of the courts of the state in regard to what constitutes surface water; but they would not be binding on the federal courts, unless the question is one of local law. The right of an adjoining landowner to make a new bank for a navigable river which forms the boundary between two states, or, by artificial structures, to turn the waters onto lands on the opposite side of the river, is not a local question, but one depending for its determination upon the general principles of the law. The Wabash river, as the court judicially knows, and as the bill avers, is a navigable stream and public highway, upon which interstate commerce is carried; and, this being so, it must follow that questions relating to the channel and banks of the river are in no just sense local in their nature. It is firmly settled that the decisions of the state courts are not controlling, and ought not to be followed, upon questions of general law, where such decisions are found to be at variance with the general principles of the law. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 87 L. ed. 772, and cases there cited. The Indiana cases cited and relied on, in my judgment, have settled the law for this state that the superabundant water of a stream which, at times of ordinary floods, spreads flood water if the channel of the stream is not obstructed. Shelbyville & B. Turnp. Co. v. Green, 99 Ind. 205.

Flood water of a river may be treated as surface water within the rule which permits a landowner to protect himself against such water. Jean v. Pennsylvania Co. (Ind.), Jan. 12, 1894.

Although in Evanville & C. R. Co. v. Diok, 9 Ind. 438, an earlier case, a railroad company was held liable for obstructing flood water.

In Hoard v. Des Moines, 62 Iowa, 235, the court says, "that the owner of lowland along a river has no right to have the overflow water pass over his land on to that of other persons, requires no argument nor authority to demonstrate."

On the other hand, in Avery v. Empire Woolen Co., 28 N. Y. 532, it is said that there is no right to embank against the flood water of a creek so as to interfere with its natural flow.

Flood water cannot be turned upon the land, lying upon the opposite side of the stream. Burwell v. Hobson, 12 Gratt. 323, 65 Am. Dec. 247.

Flood water of a river cannot be prevented from crossing the land of one person to the damage of others. Nininger v. Norwood, 73 Ala. 277, 47 Am. Rep. 412.

There is no right to fill up trestle work away from the main channel of the river, if thereby the amount of water flowing over adjoining land will be increased. Noe v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 78 Iowa, 360.

b. Cases holding flood water to be surface water.

Overflow water from a river is surface water. Cairo v. R. Co. v. Stevens, 73 Ind. 233, 38 Am. Rep. 129; Cairo v. R. Co. v. Houry, 77 Ind. 304; Shelbyville & B. Turnp. Co. v. Green, 99 Ind. 205.

Overflow water is subject to the rules governing surface water to the extent that it cannot be concentrated in a single channel and cast on to the land of a lower proprietor. McCormick v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 70 Mo. 359, 35 Am. Rep. 481.

Overflow water is surface water which cannot be dammed against in such manner as to injure an adjoining owner. McCormick v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 67 Mo. 433.

Overflow water of a river is practically surface water. Morris v. Connell Bluffs, 67 Iowa, 343, 56 Am. Rep. 243.

In Abbott v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 38 Mo. 271, 38 Am. Rep. 581, and Jones v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 64 Mo. 151, it was assumed that flood water of a river which had overflowed; its banks was surface water.

Flood water which has spread over the surrounding country is surface water. Scheider v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 39 Mo. App. 63.

c. Cases holding that it is not surface water.

It is difficult to see upon what principle the flood waters of a river can be likened to surface water. Crawford v. Rambo, 44 Ohio St. 237.

The overflow of a river is not surface water. Barden v. Portage, 79 Wis. 123.

Flood waters are not surface water which may be fought off. O'Connell v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 13 L. R. A. 397, 87 Ga. 243.

Overflow water cannot be obstructed. Sinal v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. (Miss.), Dec. 4, 1893; Shane v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 71 Mo. 233, 36 Am. Rep. 430.

In connection with the latter case attention is called to the fact that in Missouri the rule is that there is no liability for obstructing the flow of surface water. The court in attempting to treat flood water as surface water overruled its former decisions, but subsequently became dissatisfied with such result and in turn overruled Shane v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. supra, by Abbott v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 83 Mo. 271, 53 Am. Rep. 581. Whereas if the two classes of cases had been treated as distinct it might have avoided the uncertainty.

There are some cases which are so plain that they might safely be treated as cases of surface water.

Thus if the water of a stream ceases to remain in the channel and spreads out over the surface of lowlands and runs in different directions in swags and flats without any definite channel, it ceases to be a stream or watercourse. Munkres v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 73 Mo. 514.

And an embankment may be placed across an opening in the bank of a river into which the water runs in the form of a bayou, and in time of flood through which it runs and spreads itself over the adjacent country away from the river. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Schneider, 30 Mo. App. 620.

Conversely water which has left the bed of a stream and is wandering over the adjacent land ceases to be surface water when it is turned back into the stream. Sullens v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 659; Moore v. Chicago, R. & Q. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 263.

So water which in time of flood is accustomed to pass from one river to another over lowlands lying between them is not surface water which can be dammed back. Spelman v. Portage, 41 Wis. 144.

So where in times of ordinary high water the stream extending beyond its banks is accustomed to flow down over the adjacent lowlands in a broader but still definite stream it has still the character of a watercourse, and the law relative to watercourses is applicable rather than that relating to mere surface water. Byrne v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 33 Minn. 212.

out, and overflows its banks and channel, is to be deemed surface water, and, as such, that each proprietor may fight it off as he will, without liability to any one for damages occasioned thereby. Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 167, 81 Am. Rep. 114, was an action by an upper riparian proprietor against a lower one to recover damages for obstructing and throwing back the waters of the Ohio river, which, having been swollen by rains, had overflowed its banks. It was alleged that: "During times of high water and overflow, the water from the said river runs over the said tracts of land with a strong and rapid current,—the general current of the same running from east to west, first over the land of the plaintiff, and then over that of the defendant; the water in said current over said land varying in depth from two to ten feet,—and that the water (which is in fact a portion of the said river) has run in that manner, during seasons of high water, and during times of overflow, from time immemorial."

It was held that these waters were in the nature of surface water, and that the lower proprietor might lawfully fight them off as he saw fit, without regard to the damages caused thereby to the upper proprietor. The court says: "In the complaint before us, there is no averment of any watercourse, except, indeed, by way of parenthesis, that the place, during floods, is a part of the Ohio river. But the facts averred clearly show that it is not upon the bed of the river, nor within its channel, nor between its banks; in short, that it is no part of a watercourse, but that the flow is over the entire surface of the land, is occasioned by temporary causes, and is not usually there. The rights of the appellee, therefore, are such as a proprietor may have in surface water, which, as we have seen, is a part of his land; and the injuries or inconveniences which the appellant is alleged to have suffered are such as arise from the changes, accidents, and vicissitudes of natural causes."

In the case of Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Stevens, 78 Ind. 278, 88 Am. Rep. 139, the question arose upon a complaint charging that the defendant "negligently and unskillfully built and constructed an embankment, and failed, negligently and carelessly, in the construction of the embankment, to make any culvert," and that "by reason thereof the water coming upon the land of the plaintiff, and flowing thereon from the river and from the surrounding lands, has been stopped and hindered by said embankment from flowing under said embankment." In deciding the case, the court, upon the authority of Taylor v. Fickas, supra, assumed that the water which injured the plaintiff was surface water, but did not enter into a consideration of the question whether the water of a swollen stream would be regarded surface water. The court says:

"With reasonably near approximation to accuracy, it may be laid down as a general rule that, upon the boundaries of his own land,—not interfering with any natural or prescriptive watercourse,—the owner may erect such barriers as he may deem necessary to keep off surface water or overflowing water, from or across adjacent lands; and for any consequent repulsion, turning aside, or heaping up of these waters, to the injury of other lands, he will not be responsible."

In the case of Shelbyville & B. Turnp. Co. v. Green, 99 Ind. 205, it is held that a riparian proprietor may, by levees on his own land, protect it from overflow by floods,—not, however, obstructing the channel of the stream; and for this purpose he may build a levee over the graveled way of a turnpike company having an easement upon his land,—not materially injuring the use of the way,—even though his levee causes a greater overflow of water upon the land of others, and upon the turnpike.

In the case of Jean v. Pennsylvania Co. (Ind.) 36 N. E. Rep. 159, it is held that the overflow caused by a river spreading beyond its banks in time of high water must be regarded, and may be treated, as surface water. The same principle has been recognized in the following cases: Weis v. Madison, 75 Ind. 241, 39 Am. Rep. 135; Benthall v. Seifert, 77 Ind. 302; Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Houry, Id. 864; Hill v. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. 109 Ind. 511; Weddell v. Hapner, 124 Ind. 315; Barnard v. Shirley, 135 Ind. 563, 24 L. R. A. 568.

It is insisted—and, I think, with justice—that the opinion in Taylor v. Fickas, supra, upon which all subsequent Indiana cases rest, is based on an unfounded assumption. The court assumed—what is not true, in law or physics—that the water of the Ohio river, in times of ordinary floods, is surface water. The cases cited lend no just support to the assumption on which the opinion rests. It is settled law here, as well as elsewhere,—settled beyond serious debate,—that a railroad company, in bridging a stream, must provide a waterway for the passage of the water which flows into and down the stream in times of ordinary floods, but it is not bound to provide outlets for surface water. If the water of the Wabash river, in times of ordinary floods, is surface water, a railway company would be under no obligation to provide an outlet for its superabundant water at such times; and the ultimate result would be that all the company need do is to provide outlets sufficient to pass the water which flows in the channel, and within its banks. Such, however, is not the measure of its duty. Either the cases which hold that a railroad company, in bridging a stream, must provide a sufficient waterway for the passage of the superabundant water which flows into and down the stream in times of ordinary floods, are unsound, or else the doctrine of Taylor v. Fickas, supra, and of the cases which follow it, cannot be upheld.

In the decision of the case before me, it is not necessary to repudiate the doctrine of Taylor v. Fickas, supra, and of the other cases which follow it, because there is an essential difference between the facts in the present case and the facts in the cases hereinbefore cited and criticised. In those cases the embankments or obstructions complained of did not run upon and along the bank of the stream, but they were placed at right angles thereto, while here the levee runs upon the bank, and parallel with the river. In this case the riparian owner proposes to change the bank by erecting an artificial upon the natural bank. There is also a plain difference between the backing up of flood waters on one side of the stream, and a change of the bank so made as necessarily to cast the water which flows in the stream at times of ordinary floods upon the proprietors of lands on the opposite side of the river. No Indiana case has been cited, and none is believed to exist, holding that a riparian proprietor has the right to erect a new bank along the margin of a stream, the necessary effect of which is to cast its superabundant waters, in times of ordinary floods, upon the lands of the opposite riparian proprietor, without responsibility for the proximate damages occasioned by such new bank. The flow of a river, when swollen beyond the low-water mark of the dry seasons by the ordinary rains which fall in wet seasons, or by the melting of snow, does not constitute surface water. The waters of a natural stream are not surface water, in any just sense, and the waters of a stream are those which are cast into it by rainfalls and melting snows. Ordinary rainfalls are such as are not unprecedented and extraordinary; and hence floods and freshets which habitually recur, though at irregular and infrequent intervals, are not extraordinary or unprecedented. It has been well said that "freshets are regarded as ordinary which are well known to occur in the stream occasionally through a period of years, though at no regular intervals." Gould, Waters, § 211c. The waters cast into a stream by ordinary floods must have a channel in which they are accustomed to flow, and, if they have, that channel is a natural watercourse, with which no riparian proprietor can lawfully interfere to the injury of another. If there is a natural waterway or course, and its existence is necessary to carry off the water cast into the stream by ordinary floods, that way is the flood channel of the stream; and, if it is the flood channel of the stream, the water which flows there cannot be regarded as surface water. Surface water is that which is diffused over the ground from falling rains or melting snows, and continues to be such until it reaches some bed or channel in which water is accustomed to flow. Surface water ceases to be such when it enters a watercourse in which it is accustomed to flow; for, having entered the stream, it becomes a part of it, and loses its original character. "A stream," says Gould, "does not cease to be a watercourse, and become mere surface water, because, at a certain point, it spreads over a level meadow, and flows for a distance without defined banks, before flowing again in a definite channel." Gould, Waters, § 264. It must necessarily follow from this general principle that where water naturally flows, though the volume may change with the varying seasons, there is a natural watercourse, even though at times the place where the water flows in ordinary floods may become entirely dry. It can make no difference that the boundaries within which the water flows change with varying seasons, for the way which nature has provided for its flow is the stream, and water flowing in that waterway is not surface water. As is well said in Crawford v. Rambo, 44 Ohio St. 279: "It is difficult to see upon what principle the flood waters of a river can be likened to surface water. When it is said that a river is out of its banks, no more is implied than that its volume then exceeds what it ordinarily is. Whether high or low, the entire volume at any one time constitutes the water of the river at such time, and the land over which it flows must be regarded as its channel. So that, when, swollen by rains and melting snows, it extends and flows over the bottoms along its course, that is its flood channel; and when, by drought, it is reduced to its minimum, that is its low-water channel."

Lord Tenterden, with whom originated the expression that "surface water is a common enemy," held, in Rex v. Trafford, 1 Barn. & Ad. 874, that the water of a stream was not surface water, and declared that the doctrine announced in King v. Commissioners of Sewers, 8 Barn. & C. 355 (the case in which he used the above expression), had no application to the waters of a natural stream. In the course of his opinion, he observes: "It has long been established that the ordinary course of water cannot be lawfully changed or obstructed for the benefit of one class of persons to the injury of another. Unless, therefore, a sound distinction can be made in the ordinary course of water flowing in a bounded channel at all seasons of the year, and the extraordinary cause which its superabundant quantity has been accustomed to take at particular seasons, the creation and continuance of these feeders cannot be justified. No case has been cited or has been found that will support such a distinction."

In the case of O'Connell v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 87 Ga. 246, 13 L. R. A. 397, the supreme court of Georgia states the question before it thus: "The precise question in this case is whether the owner of land on the bank of a river can, without liability, erect on his own land an embankment which increases the overflow, in times of flood, upon the lands of the opposite proprietor, to the injury thereof."

After a full and careful consideration of the question it was held that there was no such right. In the course of the opinion the court observed: "The surplus waters do not cease to be a part of the river when they spread over the adjacent low grounds, without well-defined banks or channels, so long as they form with it one body of water, eventually to be discharged through the proper channel."

In Mensies v. Breadalbans, 8 Bligh, N. S. 414, the court says: "It is clear, beyond the possibility of doubt, that, by the law of England, such an operation cannot be carried on. The old course of the flood stream being along certain lands, it is not competent for the proprietors of those lands to obstruct that course by a sort of new waterway, to the prejudice of the proprietor on the other side."

In Burwell v. Hobson, 12 Gratt. 822, 65 Am. Dec. 247, it is holden that the water of a stream, when swollen by ordinary floods, is not surface water. Speaking of the concession of counsel that the general rule is that the flow of a stream cannot be lawfully obstructed, and the denial of its application to the case before it, the court said:

"But he contended that it is confined in its application to the ordinary course of the stream, and that a riparian proprietor may lawfully protect his property from floods by erecting a dike or other obstruction, though its necessary effect may be to turn the superabundant water on the land of his neighbor. Such a distinction between the ordinary and extraordinary flow of a stream is not laid down or recognized by any elementary writer, or in any adjudged case, so far as I have seen. The utmost extent to which the authorities go in that direction is that a riparian proprietor may erect any work in order to prevent his land being overflowed by any change in the natural flow of the stream, and to prevent its old course from being altered. Angell, Watercourses, § 833. But he has no right to build anything which, in times of ordinary flood, will throw the waters on the grounds of another proprietor, so as to overflow and injure them. If, in the case of such an obstruction, it appear that the injury arose from causes which might have been foreseen, such as ordinary freshets, he is liable for the damage. Id. § 849. That the supposed distinction does not exist was expressly decided in Rea v. Trafford, 1 Barn. & Ad. 874."

The same principle is recognized or expressly decided in the following cases: Jones v. Hannover, 55 Mo. 462; Wharton v. Stevens, 84 Iowa, 107, 15 L. R. A. 630; Gerriah v. Clough, 48 N. H. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 561, 2 Am. Rep. 165; Hartshorn v. Chaddock, 135 N. Y. 116, 17 L. R. A. 426; Byrne v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 38 Minn. 212; Wallas v. Drew, 59 Barb. 413; Ordway v. Canisteo, 66 Hun, 509, 835; Carriger v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 7 Lea, 888; West v. Taylor, 16 Or. 165.

With reasonably near approximation to accuracy, it may be laid down as a general rule that all the waters of a river, which form one body, when flowing within the boundaries within which they have been immemorially accustomed to flow, in times of ordinary floods, constitute waters of the river, and are not surface waters.

The complainant owns a right of way over and across the lands of the defendant, 200 feet in width. Its title thereto was acquired by a deed of conveyance from the same party from whom the defendant subsequently acquired his title. The deed conveyed to the complainant all the right, title, and estate which could have been acquired under condemnation proceedings under the statute of the state in that case made and provided. The complainant acquired an easement in the land, whose nature and extent are such as is necessary for the purpose of maintaining and operating its railway. The estate of the complainant is the dominant, and that of the defendant the servient. Davidson v. Nicholson, 59 Ind. 411; Robinson v. Thrailkill, 110 Ind. 117. The grant of an easement conveys all such incidental rights as are necessary to the enjoyment of the thing granted. The use to which an easement is devoted, or for which it is created, determines its character; and, to the extent that the use is necessary to carry out the purpose of the grant, the rights of the owner of the easement are paramount. An easement granted to a railway is essentially different from any other. The nature of railway service requires exclusive occupancy. A railroad company is held to the highest degree of care, and the exercise of this care necessarily requires that it should have complete dominion over its right of way. It is bound to prevent obstructions from being placed on its tracks, and is required to keep them fenced in, and free from rubbish or other combustible materials. The duties of a railway company are due to the public as well as to individuals, and these duties it must preform at its peril. The rules which apply to the use of streets or highways fail, when applied to railroads, because the necessities of their use are different. The railroad must have the exclusive possession and control of the land within the lines of its location, and the right to remove everything placed or growing thereon, which it may deem necessary to remove to insure the safe management of its road. Hayden v. Skillings, 78 Me. 493; Brainard v. Clapp, 10 Cush. 10, 57 Am. Dec. 74; Hazen v. Boston & M. Railroad, 2 Gray, 577; Proprietors of Locks & Canals v. Nashua & L. R. Co. 104 Mass. 11, 6 Am. Rep. 181; Jackson v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 25 Vt. 150; Connecticut & P. R. Co. v. Holton, 53 Vt. 43; Atlantic & Pacific Teleg. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 6 Biss. 168, Fed. Cas. No. 632.

The construction of the levee as proposed would be a plain invasion of the complainant's exclusive rights.

It follows from the foregoing considerations that the demurrer must be overruled, and it is so ordered.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Sarah J. BARROWS, App't,

City of SYCAMORE.

(150 Ill. 568.)

1. A standpipe or water tower placed in a street is an unlawful use thereof, although the fee belongs to the city which erects the tower.
2. Special injury is necessary to give a private right of action for the unlawful placing of a standpipe or water tower in a street.
3. The mere conclusion of the pleader that a standpipe or water tower is liable to blow over or burst is not a sufficient averment of special damages.
4. An allegation that a standpipe obstructs the light to a building is a sufficient allegation of special injury to the owner.

(June 12, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Second District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit for De Kalb County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the erection by defendant in a public street in front of plaintiff's property of a standpipe or water tower. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jones & Rogers, for appellant:

The pleadings show that plaintiff cannot successfully carry on her hotel business and can neither sell nor rent her said property.

Can a city, in the construction of waterworks, thus damage private property without making compensation for such damage?

Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation.

Const. 1870, art. 2, § 18; Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 74.

If the market value of plaintiff's property is greatly depreciated on account of the construction and erection of this structure in a public street so near to said property as these pleadings aver, then there is a damage.

Stockton v. Chicago, 186 Ill. 484; Springer v. Chicago, 12 L. R. A. 609, 185 Ill. 560; Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. v. Bowman, 122 Ill. 595; Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. v. Leah, 41 Ill. App. 589.

In considering the depreciation of market value, all facts that contribute to produce damage as shown by the evidence may be considered.

And this damage includes all actual inconveniences and damages the property may sustain in its use for the present and in the future.

NOTE.—Compare with the above case the Oregon case of Savage v. Salem, 24 L. R. A. 787, in which the court refused to treat tanks placed in a street for use in performing a contract for sprinkling the streets as nuisances per se.

As to the right to receive light and air from a street, see note to Case v. Minot (Mass.) 28 L. R. A. 548.

As to land not taken, the landowner can recover only for the depreciation in its market value.

Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. v. Greiney, and Springer v. Chicago, supra.

The erection of such a structure or water tower in a public street, 135 feet high and 45 feet in circumference, is not the natural nor legitimate use of the street but is a diversion of the street from the use for which it was originally taken, and the owner of a lot adjoining a street does not take it subject to any such easement.

Lahr v. Metropolitan Elec. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268; Morrison v. Hinkson, 87 Ill. 539, 29 Am. Rep. 77; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Scott, 8 L. R. A. 830, 132 Ill. 429; Keithsburg & E. R. Co. v. Henry, 79 Ill. 292; Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. v. Aldrich, 184 Ill. 15.

This property was used for resident and hotel purposes and if its value for such purposes was and is depreciated on account of the erection and maintenance of the structure in question on the part of the city, then we have a right to recover for damages thus occasioned.

Johnson v. Freeport & M. R. R. Co. 111 Ill. 419.

The plaintiff has a property right in the street adjacent to her lot different from that of the general public and in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament in the street adjacent to her premises.

Addison, Torts, § 208; Back v. Stacey, 2 Car. & P. 466.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case by appellant against appellee, in the circuit court of DeKalb county, to recover damages for an alleged injury to real property. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the declaration, and rendered judgment against the plaintiff for costs, from which she appealed to the appellate court of the second district, and from a judgment of affirmance in that court prosecuted this appeal.

The cause of action set up in the declaration is that plaintiff is the owner of a certain lot in the city of Sycamore, with a two-story building on the southwest corner thereof, fronting south and west on State and Main streets, which she used and occupied as a residence and hotel; that the city "injuriously, unjustly, and wrongfully constructed, or caused to be constructed and erected, at or near the center of the intersection of said streets, and at a distance of about 564 feet from said hotel building, a standpipe, or water tower," 15 feet in diameter, and about 185 feet high, having a capacity of 179,000 gallons, made of steel or iron plates, 5 feet wide, riveted together, the lower course being nine sixteenths of an inch thick, and those above diminishing to the upper course, which was three sixteenths of an inch. This structure is alleged to have caused an injury to plaintiff's building, which is set forth in each of the four counts of the declaration as follows: First count: "Which standpipe, by reason of the fact that there is a constant apprehension that it may fall over upon said hotel building, and, by its great weight, injure, crush, or destroy the same, or that it might blow over upon said property, or burst and flood the same, greatly depreciates in value the premises for residence, hotel, and business purposes, and especially greatly depreciates in price the market value of said premises." Second count: "Which standpipe is liable to fall or blow over upon said premises, and, by its great weight, injure, crush, or destroy said building, and is liable to burst, and flood said premises, and thus injure the same, or destroy the said hotel building, and thereby greatly depreciates in value said premises," etc. Third count: "Which standpipe is of a dangerous character, and is liable to fall or blow over upon said hotel building, and, by its great weight, injure, crush, or destroy the same, and is liable to burst and flood said premises, and thus injure the same, or destroy the said hotel building; and the standpipe is a constant menace to plaintiff's property, and the liability of said structure and structures of like character to fall or blow over or burst has thereby greatly depreciated in value said premises for residence, hotel, or other business purposes, and especially greatly depreciates in price the market value of said premises." Fourth count: "And, by reason of defendant's constructing or causing to be constructed, said standpipe, as above stated, in the public streets of said city, and so near to plaintiff's hotel building, said standpipe obstructs the light to said plaintiff's hotel building, and particularly to the parlor and sitting room in the southwest corner of said hotel building, and obstructs the view from said hotel building; and said standpipe, being of so great height, and in front of and near said plaintiff's said premises, casts a shadow upon said hotel building, and makes the appearance of said premises unsightly, and otherwise injuriously affects said premises, and thus plaintiff's said premises are less convenient and comfortable for residence and hotel purposes; and by reason of the wrongful acts and doings of the defendant as aforesaid, and the injuries done to plaintiff's property as aforesaid, the market value of plaintiff's said premises is thereby greatly decreased." Each of these counts concludes with the averment "that, by means of the premises, the said defendant has greatly injured and damaged the said property of plaintiff, within the meaning of the constitution and laws of the state of Illinois; yet the said defendant has never paid, nor offered to pay, to the said plaintiff, any of the damage so injuriously and unjustly caused to the plaintiff's said property, nor has any proceeding been instituted by the defendant for the purpose of having just compensation therefor ascertained; and the plaintiff avers that, by reason of the premises above set forth, the plaintiff's said property has been greatly damaged and depreciated in value, to the damage of said plaintiff of the sum of three thousand ($3,000), and therefore she brings her suit," etc. It thus appears that the declaration proceeds both upon the ground that placing the standpipe in the street was wrongful, and, even if authorized by law, plaintiff's property could not, under the constitution, be damaged thereby without just compensation, which had not been ascertained. The demurrer was, in effect, general to each count, viz., it made no objection to the declaration on account of duplicity or the mere form of pleading, and therefore the only question presented for our decision is, does either of the counts state, in substance, a good cause of action?

It is insisted on behalf of the city that, being the owner of the fee in the streets, and having the absolute control over them, it had a right to build the standpipe in them, and that, if injury resulted thereby to plaintiff's property, it is damnum absque injuria. The soundness of this position depends upon whether the placing of a structure like that described in the declaration in the streets of a city is consistent with the objects for which streets are established, and held by municipal authorities in trust for the public use. The general rule, long recognized by this court, is that, having the free and exclusive control over streets, municipal authorities may appropriate them to any use not incompatible with the object for which they were established. Quincy v. Bull, 106 Ill. 337, and cases there cited. In the application of the rule, it has been held in the case cited and others that a city council may lawfully authorize the laying of railroad tracks upon, and water, sewer, and gas pipes under, public streets, and that property owners could neither enjoin such use, nor recover damages to property occasioned thereby. Laying pipes under the streets for the purpose of distributing water and gas, and carrying off sewage, is lawful, both because it is necessary for the health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants, and because it in no way interferes with, and is not incompatible with, the use of such streets for public travel. Railroad tracks may be lawfully laid in streets for the same reason, as stated in the Moses Case, 21 Ill. 522, cited in Quincy v. Bull, supra: "A street is made for the passage of persons and property, and the law cannot define what exclusive means of transportation and passage shall be used." It was, however, held in Stack v. East St. Louis, 85 Ill. 377, 28 Am. Rep. 619, and cases cited to the same effect in Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46, that, in permitting the use of streets for other purposes than public thoroughfares, "the city has no right to so obstruct them as to deprive the public and adjacent property holders of their use as streets. The primary object is for ordinary passage and travel, and the public and individuals cannot be rightfully deprived of such use." It does not follow, therefore, that, because railroad tracks may be put on or pipes under streets, structures like the one described in this declaration can be built in them. Water and gas pipes, with hydrants, lamp-posts, and other appliances, are necessary for the distribution of water and light over the city, and the streets may be legitimately used for that purpose; but it would scarcely be contended that the water or gas works themselves could be lawfully built in a public street, as not being inconsistent with the public use. In fact directly the contrary was held in Morrison v. Hinkson, 87 Ill. 587, 20 Am. Rep. 77, as to waterworks. It was there said: "But it is not conceded that the erection of a water tank in the center of the street, occupying one half of the width thereof, and the erection and operating of a steam engine in connection therewith, even for the purposes of supplying the city and the residents thereof with water, are some of the uses of a street as such, for which the ground may be appropriately used under a dedication thereof as a street. The owner of a lot adjoining a street does not take the same subject to any such easement." It is true it was stated in that case that the proof did not show in whom the fee of the street was vested, but, if the same could not be said here (there being no allegation in the declaration as to that fact), still, as shown by Stack v. East St. Louis, supra, and cases there referred to, the fact that the title is in the city gives it no right to prevent its use as a street. The fee-simple title, though in the city, is held in trust for the public use as a street. Nor do we regard the fact that the tank in Morrison v. Hinkson, occupied more of the street, and was filled by machinery immediately attached, also in the street, distinguishes that case in principle from this. A standpipe is but a part of the machinery and appliances with which water is forced into the pipes throughout the city. There is no necessity for placing it in a public street, and, so far as appears in this case, neither the health, comfort, nor convenience of the public or individual citizens is promoted by so doing. Therefore, placing it there was an unlawful use of the street, and the dimensions of the structure, and the manner of operating it, in the decision of this case, affect only the question of damages, to be hereafter considered. Our opinion, then, is, that the allegations of the declaration, admitted by the demurrer, show that the city wrongfully placed the structure in its streets.

It does not, however, follow that a good cause of action in the plaintiff is shown by her declaration. It is well settled that for obstructions to streets, resulting in no special injury to an individual, the public alone can complain. McDonald v. English, 85 Ill. 282; Morrison v. Hinkson, supra. The individual right, under our present constitution, is thus stated in Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 80: "While it is clear that the present constitution intended to afford redress in a certain class of cases for which there was no remedy under the old constitution, yet we think it equally clear that it was not intended to reach every possible injury that might be occasioned by a public improvement. There are certain injuries which are necessarily incident to the ownership of property in towns or cities which directly impair the value of private property, for which the law does not and never has afforded any relief. For instance, the building of a jail, police station, or the like will generally cause a direct depreciation in the value of neighboring property; yet that is clearly a case of a damnum absque injuria. So as to an obstruction in a public street,—if it does not practically affect the use or enjoyment of neighboring property, and thereby impair its value, no action will lie. In all cases, to warrant a recovery, it must appear there has been some direct physical disturbance of a right, either public or private, which the plaintiff enjoys in connection with his property, and which gives to it an additional value, and that, by reason of such disturbance, he has sustained a special damage with respect to his property in excess of that sustained by the public generally. In the absence of any statutory or constitutional provisions on the subject, the common law afforded redress in all such cases, and we have no doubt it was the intention of the framers of the present constitution to require compensation to be made in all cases where, but for some legislative enactment, an action would lie by the common law. When the action is by an individual, the special injury is the gist of the action, and, unless it is alleged and proved, there can be no recovery." McDonald v. English, supra.

Under this rule, it is too clear for argument that neither of the first three counts of the declaration shows a right of action in the plaintiff. The special injury attempted to be set up in each of these counts is that her property has been depreciated in value, because of the danger of the building being destroyed or damaged by the standpipe falling or being blown upon it, or by bursting and flooding it with water, but not a single fact is alleged upon which the apprehension of such danger can be based. In the first count, nothing but the apprehension itself is alleged; and in the second and third, merely that it (the standpipe) is "liable" to fall, blow over, or burst. Why the apprehension exists, or why it is liable to fall, etc., is left wholly to conjecture. It certainly will not be contended that the manner in which it is constructed, as shown by the declaration, necessarily renders it dangerous. No one will deny that such a structure could be rendered reasonably secure by proper stays and braces, though it might not be so without. True, as in the instances referred to by counsel for appellee, water towers and standpipes have fallen or been destroyed, but the same is true of every kind of buildings,—perhaps of all superstructures. If this one is liable to fall, blow down, or burst, that liability must arise from certain facts, and those facts must be pleaded. Here we have nothing but the mere conclusion of the pleader. The fourth count avers that "said standpipe obstructs the light to said plaintiff's hotel building, and particularly to the parlor and sitting room in the southwest corner," etc. We are unable to see why this is not a sufficient allegation of special injury to plaintiff's property to entitle her to recover. Rigney v. Chicago, supra. The extent of the injury is a question of fact, to be determined upon plea and trial. We think the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the fourth count.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Newcastle County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted upon plaintiff by persons coasting upon a public street in defendant city. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles M. Curtis, for plaintiff in error:

Where the ground of the action is neglect of the corporation to remedy causes of danger occasioned by the wrongful acts of others, notice of the condition of the street, or what is equivalent to notice, is necessary to give a right of action against the corporation.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1020.

The use of the public roads and streets by persons coasting in such manner as to make the highway unsafe for travelers, as alleged in the plaintiff's declaration, constitutes a nuisance.

Wood, Nuisances, § 251; Faulkner v. Aurora, 85 Ind. 150, 44 Am. Rep. 1; Schultz v. Milwaukee, 49 Wis. 254, 85 Am. Rep. 779.

The duty of prevention of the nuisance alleged is a public governmental and police duty, just as is the duty to prevent breaches of the peace and to enforce other general laws.

Therefore, the neglected duty of the defendant city in this case was a general duty imposed by a general law of the state, and is imposed upon it as a public instrumentality of the state, as the agent of the sovereignty of the state.

Galveston v. Poeninsky, 63 Tex. 118, 50 Am. Rep. 517.

A municipal corporation is not liable for injuries to persons while on the highways which do not result from a defect in the construction of the street or failure to maintain the street in a safe condition as a street, and is not liable for injuries to travelers done by an unlawful use of the highway by persons not the officers or agents of the corporation, and which use was not authorized or licensed by the corporation or the source of profit to it.

Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 28 Am. Rep. 332; Barber v. Roxbury, 11 Allen, 318; Lafayette v. Timberlake, 88 Ind. 230; Vinal v. Dorchester, 7 Gray, 421.

The manner in which a highway is used by the public is a different thing from its quality and condition as a street.

Barber v. Roxbury, supra; Lafayette v. Timberlake, 88 Ind. 332; Vinal v. Dorchester, supra.

A clear example of the application of the rule appears from the following cases where persons were injured while lawfully in the highway by persons firing cannons in the highway.

Norristown v. Fitzpatrick, 94 Pa. 121, 39 Am. Rep. 771; Robinson v. Greenville, 42 Ohio St. 625, 51 Am. Rep. 857; Campbell v. Montgomery, 53 Ala. 527, 25 Am. Rep. 656.

Another illustration of the rule is the case of persons injured while in the public streets by fireworks discharged by persons in the public streets or squares, and the following cases establish that the municipal corporations are not liable for such injuries:

Municipal corporations are under no common-law liability to pay for property of individuals destroyed by mobs or riotous or disorderly assemblages.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 950; Western College of Homeopathic Medicine v. Cleveland, 12 Ohio St. 375.

A municipal corporation is not liable in an action for damages for injuries to a traveler on the streets of the city caused by his having been struck by a person coasting, sledding, or sliding on said street, even though such use rendered the street unsafe and dangerous, and 25 L. R. A.

though the municipal authorities had notice of such use, and neglected to stop it.

Aurora*, 85 Ind. 150, 44 Am. Rep. 1; Hutchinson v. Concord, 41 Vt. 271, 98 Am. Dec. 584; Ray v. Manchester, 46 N.H. 59, 88 Am. Dec. 193; Burford v. Grand Rapids, 53 Mich. 98, 51 Am. Rep. 105; Shepherd v. Chelsea, 4 Allen, 18; Pierce v. New Bedford, 129 Mass. 534, 87 Am. Rep. 887; Ball v. Woodbine, supra.

Cities are not liable for the failure of their officers to perform police duties or for the manner of the performance of such duties.

Fitzpatrick*, 94 Pa. 121, 39 Am. Rep. 777; Lincoln v. Boston, 3 L. R. A. 257, 148 Mass. 578; Faulkner v. Aurora, 85 Ind. 150, 44 Am. Rep. 1; Lafayette v. Timberlake, supra; Odell Trustees v. Schroeder, 58 Ill. 353; Mitchell v. Rockland, 53 Me. 118; Grant v. Erie, 69 Pa. 420, 8 Am. Rep. 272.

The defendant is not liable for failure to pass an ordinance prohibiting coasting on the public streets.

Whether an ordinance relating to any subject-matter shall be passed or not by the legislative body of a city is always discretionary, and for failure to discharge discretionary duties a municipal corporation is not liable.

Mr. John Biggs for defendant in error.

Wolcott, Ch., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action on the case, instituted in the court below against the mayor and council of Wilmington (a corporation existing under the laws of the state of Delaware) by Joseph W. Vandegrift, to recover damages for injuries received while walking along French street, in the city of Wilmington, at or near its intersection with Seventh street. It is alleged in the declaration that the plaintiff in error willfully and negligently suffered boys and other persons to frequently use said Seventh street for the purpose of sledding and coasting thereon in an unlawful and improper manner, and that by reason of such allowance of such unlawful use of said Seventh street the defendant in error, on the night of the 3d day of December, A. D. 1890, while lawfully walking along French street, at or near its intersection with Seventh street, was run into and knocked down by a sled propelled by the weight of one Joseph McHugh, and thereby seriously injured. Wherefore, he claimed large damages. To the declaration the plaintiff in error demurred generally, and, in accordance with the act of assembly in that behalf, specified divers causes of demurrer to the said declaration and the several counts thereof. The court overruled the demurrer, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant in error. Thereupon, the plaintiff in error brought the case to this court to be reviewed on writ of error. The judgment was assigned as error.

For the purposes of this case, it is unnecessary to notice separately the several counts in which the cause of action is variously described. It is sufficient to state that the declaration contains a circumstantial statement of the injuries complained of, and a distinct averment that they were the result of the willful negligence of the plaintiff in error. The demurrer admits all the facts set forth in the declaration, that are properly pleaded, to be true. The only question, therefore, with which this court can deal, is whether those facts, in law, constitute a sufficient ground of action. To determine this question, it is necessary to ascertain what the duties and powers of the plaintiff in error were in respect to the prevention and suppression of the practice of coasting on the streets of Wilmington, or such other unlawful use thereof as would interfere with, or render unsafe, public travel. This will necessarily involve the duty of making a critical examination of those provisions of the city charter relating to that subject, and the regulations established by the city authorities in that behalf. While this court, sitting as a court of errors, cannot go outside of the record for any facts upon which to rest its judgment, yet we think, notwithstanding the allegation of actionable negligence, and the admission made by the demurrer, that the act of assembly from which the plaintiff in error derives its existence, and the ordinances enacted in pursuance thereof, are as much the subjects of legitimate inquiry as if they were literally incorporated in the pleadings before us. The averment that the accident complained of was the result of a willful disregard of a corporate duty was more in the nature of a conclusion of law than a bare statement of fact; and consequently the demurrant cannot be concluded by the admission that it makes, only so far as such averment is sustained or supported by the law of its being, and the principles that underlie the duties and liabilities of municipal corporations. To decide the question presented by the record in this case independently of the charter of the municipality of Wilmington and the ordinances, would limit the scope of our inquiry to the consideration merely of the regularity of the pleadings, and thus leave untouched the real essence of the controversy, and subject the parties to the necessity of pursuing their rights in the court below according to the course of law in that jurisdiction prescribed. While general principles are always of great assistance in determining the liabilities of a municipal corporation in civil actions for private injuries, yet the terms employed by the legislature to convey or impart its powers are of first importance in ascertaining its duties and corresponding liabilities.

The counsel for the defendant in error assumed in his argument that the practice of coasting on Seventh street, as alleged in the declaration, was a public nuisance, and contended with much force that the plaintiff in error was liable for the damages thereby sustained by his client, because no steps were taken by it, through the agency of the street and sewer department, pursuant to the authority given to define and remove nuisances in section 31 of its charter, to declare such practice to be a nuisance, and prohibit the continuance thereof, after its dangerous character had been brought to its knowledge. Now, let us see whether this contention is met or satisfied by any of the provisions of said charter. By section 14 of the charter a municipal court is created, and by section 15 its jurisdiction is limited and defined. By the latter section it is given "sole and exclusive jurisdiction to inquire of, hear, try and finally determine all those criminal matters and offences enumerated in the 15th section of the 6th article of the amended Constitution, and committed within said city and to punish all persons convicted of said offences or any of them agreeably to the laws of this state." The 15th section of the 6th article of the Constitution, referred to, confers upon the general assembly of this state power to establish inferior courts, and clothe them with jurisdiction of certain criminal matters, and among them are enumerated nuisances. It is therefore clear that the municipal court of the city of Wilmington had jurisdiction of public nuisances, as it is an inferior court established by the general assembly of this state pursuant to the section and article of the constitution before referred to. Was the practice of coasting, as set forth in the declaration, such a nuisance as was contemplated by the framers of the constitution? We have no doubt that it was, for it answers to and contains all the elements necessary to constitute a nuisance indictable at common law, and punishable under the laws of this state. A learned writer on the subject defines a common or public nuisance "to be an unlawful act or omission to discharge a legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health, or comfort of the public, or by which the public are obstructed in the exercise or enjoyment of a right common to all." Seventh street is a well-known public highway in the city of Wilmington, and for purposes of travel the people had a right to the free and uninterrupted use thereof. The occupation of said street by persons indulging in the sport of coasting, as described in the declaration, was unlawful, independently of any ordinance; and certainly endangered the lives and safety of the people, and constituted a serious obstruction of the public in the exercise or enjoyment of a common right. It was therefore a common nuisance, and clearly within the definition quoted. The municipal court, it will be observed, is clothed with full power to punish persons convicted of such an offense, agreeably to the laws of this state. What is that punishment? The 18th section of chapter 127 of the Revised Code provides that "assaults, batteries, nuisances, and all other offences, indictable at common law and not specially provided for by statute, shall be deemed misdemeanors and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or either, according to the discretion of the court." Now, since the municipal court of Wilmington has complete jurisdiction of all nuisances indictable at common law, committed within its limits, with full power to inflict severe punishments upon offenders, what more effectual mode could have been devised than has been done for the prevention and suppression of the practice of coasting as alleged in the declaration? Clearly none. The passing of an ordinance by the street and sewer department imposing a fine upon any person who might be engaged in such sport would have been an idle exercise of its legislative functions, and would have fallen far short of the end intended to have been accomplished thereby.

It is claimed, however, that the jurisdiction of the municipal court over nuisances could not be legally invoked, because no ordinance was ever passed, expressly defining this particular sport or practice to be a nuisance. But does its jurisdiction in respect to nuisances remain dormant or inactive until the acts and conditions that constitute nuisances are defined by ordinances to be such? Surely not, for the bare statement of such a proposition, in view of the express language or terms in which such jurisdiction is conferred, demonstrates its utter fallacy. Such jurisdiction was given without reservation or condition, and its utility or efficiency was not made to depend upon the contingency of the passing or not passing of ordinances defining such offenses to be nuisances. With the same propriety it might be contended that the court of general sessions, sitting in either county of this state, could not exercise jurisdiction of nuisances committed without the city of Wilmington until the legislature had first declared by statute what the essentials of a common nuisance are. While it is true that the legislature may declare what a nuisance is, in the absence of such a declaration the court would be compelled to take cognizance of such matters, and conduct the same to a final hearing and determination. So the municipal court of Wilmington, notwithstanding the authority vested in the legislative body of the city to define nuisances, cannot, because of the omission to exercise such authority, legally refuse to assert its jurisdiction of the same, when formally and properly invoked. Of what practical use could the passage of such an ordinance be? For no definition of a nuisance, that included coasting on the streets of Wilmington, could be formulated by the wit of man that could make it any more or less a nuisance than it was. It was intrinsically a common nuisance, the definition whereof is too well known, and its ingredients and characteristics too well understood, to require even the sanction of the legislature of the state, much less the legislative body of any municipality therein, to make it more definite, or to impart more certainty to its signification than it already possesses. Another prevailing reason why the definition of a public nuisance by ordinance is not made a condition precedent to the exercise of jurisdiction of the same by the municipal court is that it would tend rather to confusion than to simplicity in the trial and conviction of persons charged with the commission of such an offense. It is not probable that the legislative body of Wilmington could by ordinance improve on the common-law definition of a nuisance, embracing notorious obstructions of a public highway, which has for so long a time stood the test of the most severe judicial scrutiny and examination. There being then no necessity for such an ordinance (conceding for the moment that none was ever passed), no duty in respect thereto ever arose; and, there being no duty, there was no liability. It borders on the absurd to suppose that the legislature intended by the incorporation of the city of Wilmington to impose any such unnecessary and superfluous duty on the legislative branch of its government.

In this connection, it may be asked, why was the authority given to "the council," now the "street and sewer department," to define nuisances, as provided in section 31 of the city charter? At first blush, it may appear to be inconsistent with the construction given to section 15 as to the powers and jurisdiction of the municipal court; but, upon a close examination of both sections together, this apparent inconsistency wholly disappears, for this authority may be construed to have effect without interfering or clashing with the jurisdiction of the municipal court, as provided in the first branch of the jurisdiction clause of said section 15. It may well have been given to declare such acts, conditions, and objects to be nuisances that are not clearly within the legal notion of a public nuisance at common law. How far such authority extends is a question we shall not stop to consider, as it is unnecessary for the purposes of this decision. It is certain, however, that a nuisance such as that described in the declaration was not intended to be brought within the general authority to define nuisances, for it is an offense against the state, the measure of whose punishment is fixed by a general law of the state; and any definition thereof, if contrary to the legal and well-settled definition of a common nuisance, would be void, and any definition merely declaratory of the same would simply be useless.

Having arrived at the conclusion that no municipal liability attached to a failure of the legislative body of the city to pass an ordinance defining coasting on its streets, as alleged in the declaration, it only remains now for the court to consider whether the neglect of the city constables to suppress such sport, upon the principle of respondent superior, made the city liable to the defendant in error for the injuries received at the time designated in the declaration. The decision of this question depends upon the solution of a preliminary question, which is whether such officers were, in respect to such a police duty, the agents or servants of the state, or of the city in its corporate capacity.

If the agents or servants of the former, clearly the city is not liable. It is sometimes quite difficult to draw the line of distinction between strictly corporate duties and public duties, as to the police officers of a municipality, but in this case the distinction is so well marked that we are not embarrassed with any perplexing question of that sort. By section 15 of the city charter the legislature conferred upon the municipal court sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the entire group of offenses (including nuisances) enumerated in the 15th section of the 6th article of the Constitution, with power to hear, try, and finally determine the same under the laws of the state of Delaware. It frequently occurs that the state, in the distribution of its powers, for the sake of convenience and expediency, confides to certain local governments, within well-defined territorial limits, the power to administer criminal justice therein. But, because such authority is limited to a certain locality or district, it does not make the duties which the possession of such power imposes, nor the agents charged with the performance thereof, any more or less public in their character. The preservation of the peace is one of the most important functions of state governments, and it makes no difference to what tribunal that duty or power is intrusted. It is still essentially a matter of public concern, and does not lose its public character. To commit any of the offenses within the city of Wilmington, of which the municipal court thereof is given sole and exclusive jurisdiction, would be an infraction of the laws of the state, and therefore against its peace and dignity, and punishable by said court, as it would be in the state court having general jurisdiction of the same according to the general provisions of law in that behalf. Assaults and batteries are included in the same category as nuisances. Now, could it be claimed with any show of reason that the duty of the police officers to break up street fights and brawls is not a public duty, and that for the nonperformance or neglect thereof the municipality would be liable to any one for a private injury occasioned thereby? Clearly not, because it is such a duty as relates to the execution of a state law, and the officers charged therewith, though servants of the municipality, are, to the extent of such duty, public officers, and for the neglect to perform the same no municipal liability attaches. The same is equally true as to the duties of police officers in regard to nuisances. The municipal court of Wilmington is therefore a public instrumentality constituted by the legislature for the trial and punishment of such criminal disorders as are enumerated in the section and article of the constitution before referred to, and the duties of the municipal officers selected to execute its process in respect to such offenses are also stamped with the same character.

Thus far, we have treated the contention of the learned counsel for the defendant in error that no ordinance was ever passed against the practice of coasting, as set forth in the declaration, as being true. Is it true in fact? By section 81 of the city charter the authority is given to the legislative body of the city generally to prescribe and regulate the use of the highways, streets, squares, lanes, and alleys of the city, and to have and exercise control over the same, subject to the charter limitations, and to the general supervision and control of the general assembly. This power is sufficiently broad to cover nuisances occurring within the limits of any of the streets of the city that involved the idea of obstruction. Doubtless, the nuisance complained of had the effect to obstruct said Seventh street, and thereby obstructed the public in the exercise or enjoyment of a public right, and therefore clearly came within the power to prescribe and regulate the use of streets. That being so, if there was an ordinance prohibiting such an obstruction at the time of the accident set forth in the declaration, it clearly absolved the city from any liability on the score of not having declared such an obstruction to be a nuisance, and punishing the same by the imposition of a penalty. Upon examination, we find that in pursuance of such authority an ordinance was passed many years ago, section 8 of which is as follows: "If any person shall place, or leave in any street or public lane or alley of this city a wagon, cart, gig, sleigh or other carriage without a horse or beast used for drawing the same attached thereto; or shall without lawful permission obstruct any open and public street, lane or alley of this city, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay a fine of two dollars." City Code, p. 472. It cannot be pretended that those persons engaged in the sport of coasting at the time mentioned in the declaration, or any time previously thereto, could not have been arrested, tried, convicted, and punished for a violation of said ordinance; so that the contention of the counsel of the defendant in error in this regard is not true in fact. Therefore, in any view of the case, the only neglect of duty was the failure of the city constables to abate or suppress the nuisance complained of in the declaration, which, as we have already shown, involves no municipal liability.

The court is therefore of the opinion that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

J. J. SULLIVAN, Appt.,
v.
SULLIVAN TIMBER CO.

1. A foreign corporation which is not doing business in the county at the time of the commencement of the suit cannot be sued there, even on a contract made or cause of action arising in the county while the corporation was doing business there, under Const., art. 14, providing that a foreign corporation having a known place of business and authorized agents in the state may be sued in any county "where it does business."
2. A foreign corporation is not doing business in a county so as to subject it to suit there by the fact that it has an agent there who pays taxes on and has possession of an unemployed railroad and machinery, which were mere adjuncts or appurtenances to a mill which the corporation had for a very long time operated but the operation of which had been suspended.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Conecuh County sustaining a plea in abatement to an action brought to recover money alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stallworth & Burnett and Troy & Watts, for appellant:

In Home Protection of North Alabama v. Richards, 74 Ala. 406, it was held that a corporation could not have "within this state a permanent residence," within the meaning of the first paragraph of section 2460 of the Code, and thus be subject to be sued only in the county of such residence, and therefore that section 2642 subjecting the corporation to suit in any county in which it does business was not in conflict with section 12, article 14, of the Constitution.

It follows that personal actions against corporations necessarily fall within the second paragraph of section 2640 of the Code, and may be brought "in the county in which the act or omission complained of may have been done or may have occurred," without regard to the residence of the defendant.

Section 2642 must be construed in connection with this provision of section 2640; otherwise, we have the absurd and unconstitutional result that a natural person is subject to be sued for a tort, in the county where it was committed, while for a like tort, a corporation can only be sued in the county where it does business.

The constitution declares that corporations shall be "subject to be sued in all courts, in like cases as natural persons."

Natural persons under the second paragraph of section 2460 may be sued for torts in the county where the tort was committed.

NOTE.—The general subject of who may be served with process in a suit against a foreign corporation is fully covered in the note to Foster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. (S. Dak.) 23 L. R. A. 496.

It is travesty of justice to hold that a corporation against which a complete right of action exists, either in the contract, or in tort, in the courts of a county, can defeat and destroy the plaintiff's right of action by simply ceasing to do business in the county before suit is commenced.

Owning and operating a railroad through a county is certainly "doing business" in the county.

Messrs. Gregory L. Smith and H. T. Smith for appellee.

Brickell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, by summons and complaint, commenced an action against the appellee, averred to be a corporation under the laws of the state of Florida, doing business in the county of Conecuh. Service of summons was made in that county upon J. W. Black, the president of the company. The complaint contains two counts,—the one, for an account stated; the other, for work and labor done. The defendant appeared and pleaded in abatement, alleging that it had a known place of business, and an authorized agent therein, in the city of Mobile, and that, at the time of the commencement of the suit, it was not doing business in the county of Conecuh. To this plea, the plaintiff demurred, assigning three causes. The first and second were that the plea did not negative the fact that the defendant was doing business in the county of Conecuh when the contracts were made on which the suit is founded; the third, that it did not appear from the plea that the court had not local jurisdiction of the action. The demurrer was overruled, and issue was taken on the plea. The defendant introduced evidence showing that its principal place of business was in Mobile, where it had authorized agents. It owned a sawmill in the county of Escambia, and a railroad running therefrom, three or four miles into the county of Conecuh, and a derrick in that county, which had been used for the purpose of supplying the mill with logs. In consequence of litigation, the operation of the mill had been stopped prior to the commencement of the suit, and after its stoppage the company had not done any business in Conecuh county. The plaintiff introduced evidence showing that, at or about the time of the commencement of the suit, the defendant had a person in possession and taking care of the railroad and derrick; and that, subsequent to the commencement of the suit, an agent of the company paid the taxes on its property in Conecuh county. This was all the evidence, and, at the request of the defendant, the court instructed the jury to find the issue for the defendant. The rulings on the demurrer and the instruction given to the jury form the matter of the assignments of error. It is apparent the case draws in question the construction of the last clause of the 4th section of the 14th article of the Constitution, and of the Statute (Code, § 2642). The section of the constitution, in its entirety, reads: "No foreign corporation shall do any business in this state without having at least one known place of business, and an authorized agent or agents therein; and such corporation may be sued in any county where it does business by service of process on an agent anywhere in the state." The statute reads: "A foreign or domestic corporation may be sued in any county in which it does business by agent." The section of the constitution and the statute (which, in so far as it relates to foreign corporations, is merely affirmatory of the constitution) are remedial, intended to supply defects or correct mischiefs in the pre-existing state of the law; and in their construction we are to consider what was the law before the constitution was adopted and prior to the enactment of the statute, what were the defects it was intended to supply or the mischiefs it was intended to correct.

By the common law, to maintain a personal action against a corporation, there must have been service of process upon its head or principal officer within the jurisdiction of the sovereignty from which corporate existence was derived. The officer upon whom, in the sovereignty of its creation, service could be legally effected, binding the corporation, it may be, could be found in another jurisdiction, but he was not deemed to bear with him his official functions, and service upon him there effected would not bind or affect the corporation. Whatever of legal proceedings could be pursued against the corporation elsewhere than within the sovereignty of its creation must have been authorized by legislation of the forum in which such proceedings were instituted. St. Clair v. Coz, 106 U. S. 354, 27 L. ed. 224; Aldrich v. Anchor Coal & Development Co. (Or.) 82 Pac. Rep. 756; McQueen v. Middletown Mfg. Co. 18 Johns. 5; Peckham v. North Parish in Haverhill, 16 Pick. 274, 286; Moulin v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. 24 N. J. L. 244; Camden Rolling Mill Co. v. Swede Iron Co. 82 N. J. L. 15.

Upon principles of comity, there was acquiescence in the maintenance of suits in this state by foreign corporations, and the making by them of such contracts as they had by the law of their creation capacity to make, if thereby our own laws or public policy were not offended. Lucas v. Bank of Georgia, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 147; Hitchcock v. United States Bank, 7 Ala. 386; Columbus v. Rogers, 10 Ala. 37; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pleasants, 46 Ala. 641; Eslava v. Ames Plow Co. 47 Ala. 384; Importing and Exporting Co. of Georgia v. Locke, 0 Ala. 332; Thorington v. Gould, 59 Ala. 461. But there was no statute providing for or regulating suits against them, except the statute authorizing the issue of an attachment for the seizure of property belonging to them, found in the state. Code 1852, § 2513; Rev. Code 1867, § 2938; Code 1876, § 3263; Code 1886, § 2940.

Private corporations created and organized for the transaction of business and the derivation of pecuniary profits are in this country, it is said, mainly the growth of the last seventy-five years. In McKim v. Odom (1828) 3 Bland, Ch. 407-418, it was said by Bland, Ch., that no instance of such a corporation in colonial times could be found. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 1. The increasing number of such corporations, and the variety and extent of the business they were created and organized to transact, their presence by agents, either by acquiescence or by legislative permission, in other states, in the exercise of their general powers, making contracts, acquiring and disposing of property rendered the rules of the common law to which we have referred the source of frequent inconvenience and injustice, compelling a modification or relaxation of them. The principle came to be accepted that if a foreign corporation sent its agents into another state, and there, by acquiescence or legislative permission of the state, engaged in the transaction of business, upon all causes of action there arising it became subject to suit in such mode as the law of the state provided, or, if there was no special provision for such suits, in the mode prescribed for suits against domestic corporations of like character. Moulin v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. and St. Clair v. Coz, supra; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 79 U. S. 13 Wall. 65, 20 L. ed. 354; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Whitton, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270, 20 L. ed. 571; Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369, 24 L. ed. 858; Aldrich v. Anchor Coal & Development Co. supra. But if the corporation was not engaged in the transaction of business, or had not property within the state which could be reached by attachment, though its head or principal officer may there have had his personal residence, or may have been found there casually, there could not be a valid service, of process compelling it to appear; and, without a voluntary appearance, there could be no judgment rendered which would bind or affect it. The period of time at which it must have been engaged in the transaction of business within the state, to authorize a personal action against it, by the service of process on its principal officer or other agent, was the commencement of the suit. The fact that, at some time anterior, the corporation may have been engaged in business or may have had agents within the state, and though, at such time, the contract was made, or the cause of action arose, on which the suit was founded, was not controlling or material. The modification or relaxation of the common-law principle was rested upon the theory that the corporation, by entering the state by its agents, engaging in the transaction of its corporate business, gave to itself "a species of locality in the nature of a domicile," and was presumed to have assented to be sued in the courts of the state, as if it were a domestic corporation. Camden Rolling Mill Co. v. Swede Iron Co., Aldrich v. Anchor Coal & Development Co. and Ex parte Schollenberger, supra. As is well observed in Latiemer v. Union Pac. R. Co., East Div. 43 Mo. 109, 97 Am. Dec. 878: "The well established and settled principle is that, to give a court jurisdiction, a real defendant, against whom the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, must be found and served with process within the limits of the jurisdiction, or some property or chose in action of his must be found there upon which the court can proceed in rem. Every attempt on the part of one nation or state, by its legislature, to grant jurisdiction to its courts over persons or property not within its territory, is regarded elsewhere as mere usurpation, and all judicial proceedings in virtue thereof are held utterly void. This proceeds upon the known maxim, 'Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur.'" The presence of the corporation by its agents, engaged in the transaction of corporate business, was the essential fact which drew it within the jurisdiction of the courts of a state other than the state of its creation, to entertain a personal action against it. The fact must have existed at the commencement of the suit, or the jurisdiction could not exist. If the fact did not then exist, there could be no legal service of process, and there could be no valid operative judgment rendered. It was only by comity that foreign corporations not engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or not the agencies of the national government, were permitted to make contracts and carry on business within this state. The state had the power to exclude them absolutely, or to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which, within its jurisdiction, it was permissible for them to make contracts or exercise their general powers. The first clause of the section of the constitution which is under consideration prescribes inflexibly, as the condition upon which a foreign corporation may do business within this state, that it shall have "at least one known place of business and an authorized agent or agents therein." The succeeding clause declares that "such corporations" (by which we understand not any and every foreign corporation, but the corporation which has designated for itself "a known place of business and an authorized agent or agents therein") may be sued in any county where it does business.

When the constitution is read in the light of the pre-existing law, we understand what were the defects and mischiefs it is intended to supply and correct, the changes it is intended to make, and the scope and extent of its provisions. By comity or mere acquiescence, a foreign corporation may not now make contracts from which it can derive rights or benefits, or transact any part of the business for which it was organized. The condition upon which it may do business, fixed and prescribed by the constitution, is inflexible and is unalterable, by legislation. Furrier v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 88 Ala. 275; New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Ingram, 91 Ala. 887; Nelms v. Edinburg American Land Mortg. Co. 92 Ala. 157. The corporation, having fixed for itself a known place of business, and placed therein authorized agents, thereby gives to itself a locality or domicile, and, so long as it continues there to do business, may be sued as a domestic corporation may be sued at its domicile or principal place of business. The liability to suit does not now rest upon the theory that the corporation, by sending its agents into the state for the transaction of business, is presumed to consent to be sued here. The assent is expressed in the condition upon which it can legally transact corporate business within the state. It is not the purpose of the constitution to confine the corporation in the transaction of business to the locality or domicile it may designate as its "known place of business." The constitution speaks in recognition of the known fact that the business foreign corporations are created and organized to transact is varied, entering into nearly all the industries, commerce, and interests of the county; that, in the course of the transaction of its business, the corporation would probably send its agents into other counties, beyond "the known place of business" it had designated, for the transaction of such corporate business as was intrusted to them. In such counties, while doing business there, the constitution subjects the corporation to suit, as well as within its domicile or "known place of business." But it must be observed that the essential fact upon which the liability to suit in other counties depends is that it "does business" in such counties; as the essential fact rendering it liable to a personal action in the courts of the state prior to the constitution was that it was doing business within the state. The material changes which the constitution works are that the corporation becomes liable to suit in any county in which it does business, and the process may be served, compelling it to appear, upon an agent anywhere in the state. The words of the statute are plain and unambiguous. There is no room for construction or interpretation, or for an inquiry into the policy of the provision or the motives which it may be supposed induced its adoption. It speaks of the present, not of the past or of the future. The words "does business" are equivalent in meaning to, and expressive of the same thought as, the words "doing business." Unless we deflect these words from their plain and usual signification, or import into the constitution words not found there, we are constrained to the conclusion that a foreign corporation, having a known place of business in the state, is not subject to a personal action in a county beyond such place of business, unless, at the time of the commencement of suit, it was doing business in such county, and that it is immaterial that the contract was made or the cause of action arose on which the suit is founded at some past time, when the corporation was doing business in such county. There was no purpose to compel a corporation to a continuance of business at a place because at some time it had transacted business there. There is not a word found in the constitution which would justify the imputation of such a purpose to its framers. Such a purpose would as illy comport with the principles of natural justice as a purpose to constrain a natural person to a continuance of a particular occupation because he once pursued it, or to its continuance in a particular locality because he had there pursued it. With full knowledge that corporations, of necessity or from mere convenience, are frequently changing their places of business, the provision of the constitution was framed. The hardships or inconveniences which it is supposed may result if they are not permanently subject to suit in a particular locality, upon causes of action there arising, because they had there transacted business, are the hardships or inconveniences, and no other, which may result if a natural person change the county or state of his residence. The plea in abatement negatives the fact that the corporation, at the commencement of suit, was doing business in the county of Conecuh, and affirms that it then had in the city of Mobile a known place of business, and an authorized agent therein. It was not necessary that the plea should negative the fact that the corporation was doing business within the county when the cause of action arose. That fact is not, within our view, controlling or material; and the court below did not err in overruling the demurrers to the plea.

When a foreign corporation "does business" within the state, of necessity the business is done by and through agents; and the necessity is recognized by the constitution and by the statute. It is not within the purview of either that the corporate organization, or its head or principal officer, will migrate into the state. The corporation dwells in the sovereignty of its creation, and its organization there remains as defined and declared by the law from which corporate existence is derived. It is contemplated that in this state, and in more than one of its counties, the corporation may have a visible existence by the presence of agents authorized to act for it, exercising such of its powers as may be intrusted to them, making such contracts and transacting such business as may fall within the scope of the authority conferred. The mere presence of an agent within the state, or within a particular county, authorized to transact particular business, not involving an exercise of the corporate powers or franchises, not a part of the business the corporation was created and organized to transact, is not within the proper meaning of the phrases "do business" or "does business," as employed in the constitution and the statute. 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. §§ 416, 890; D. S. Morgan & Co. v. White, 101 Ind. 418; Clews v. Woodstock Iron Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 81; Bentley v. London & C. Finance Corp. Id. 667; Carpenter v. Westinghouse Air-Brake Co. 82 Fed. Rep. 434; St. Louis Wire-Mill Co. v. Consolidated Barb-Wire Co. Id. 803; United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 17. In Beard v. Union & American Pub. Co., 71 Ala. 60, it was decided that the company, having an agent in the state to receive subscriptions to the newspaper it was publishing, and to collect such subscriptions, was not doing business, in the meaning of the constitution; and it was said: "There must be a doing of some of the works, or an exercise of some of the functions, for which the corporation was created, to bring the case within the clause;" referring to the first clause of the fourth section. In Christian v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co., 89 Ala. 198, it was held that the prosecution or defense of an action in the courts of the state is not the doing of business, within the meaning of the constitution; and according to all the authorities, construing similar constitutional or statutory provisions, having in view the like objects or purposes, there are many acts of business a foreign corporation may do without coming within the constitutional or statutory provision. 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 661, 662. The real test is that applied in Beard v. Union & American Pub. Co. supra,—is the corporation engaged in the transaction of business, or any part thereof, it was created and organized to transact? If it be, it "does business," within the meaning of the constitution. If it be not,—if the act it is doing or has done is not within its general powers and franchises,—it is not the business to which the constitutional requirement is directed.

When the suit was commenced, the company had an agent or employé in possession and care of the line of railroad it had constructed in the county of Conecuh, and of the machine it had used in the loading of cars with timber. The railroad and the machine were mere adjuncts or appurtenances to the sawmill it had operated in the county of Escambia. The operation of the mill had been suspended, and the railroad and machine were unemployed. The care and protection of unused property, or the payment of taxes which are a charge upon the property, and the payment of which is essential to the preservation of the title to the owner, cannot be deemed the exercise of corporate powers or franchises, nor the transaction of the business, or any part thereof, for which the company was created and organized. These acts did not confer upon the courts of the county jurisdiction to entertain a personal action against the company. That jurisdiction, under the undisputed evidence, pertained only to "the known place of business" the company had designated. We find no error in the instruction given the jury, and the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles H. Peck, with Mr. William A. Beach, for appellant:

Congress is empowered to prevent preferences to creditors of insolvent national banks, and, having so legislated, the federal law is supreme.

The federal law expressly prohibits any preferences whatsoever with the single exception of protecting the United States against the circulating notes of insolvent national banks.

U. S. Banking Law, § 5236; First Nat. Bank of Selma v. Colby, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 618, 23 L. ed. 688; First Nat. Bank of Bethel v. National Pahquioque Bank, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 402, 20 L. ed. 845; Cook County Nat. Bank v. United States, 107 U. S. 445, 27 L. ed. 537; Baich v. Wilson, 25 Minn. 299, 33 Am. Rep. 467; Schmidt v. First Nat. Bank of Selma, 23 La. Ann. 814; Turner v. First Nat. Bank of Keokuk, 26 Iowa, 568; Venango Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 56 Pa. 14; Raynor v. Pacific Nat. Bank of Boston, 93 N. Y. 874; Hayes v. Beardsley, 186 N. Y. 804.

The design of § 5242 is to render effective the provision requiring the ratable distribution, a receiver will not prevent a recovery by the owner of such property, although thereby he may obtain a priority over the general creditors.

Some of the cases in passing on the question of claimant's right as against the receiver, construe the same as not creating a preference under the federal statute, as, Tuttle v. Frelinghuysen, 38 N. J. Eq. 12; Corn Exch. Bank of Chicago v. Blye, 101 N. Y. 803, affirming 37 Hun, 473; Philadelphia Nat. Bank v. Dowd, 2 L. R. A. 480, 38 Fed. Rep. 172.

Other cases hold that the claimant is entitled to the property or proceeds identified, and this without reference to the federal statute against preference. First Nat. Bank of Monmouth v. Dunbar, 118 Ill. 625; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 148 U. S. 50, 37 L. ed. 363, affirming 39 Fed. Rep. 684; Griffin v. Chase, 36 Neb. 323; Bundy v. Monticello, 84 Ind. 131; First Nat. Bank of Crown Point v. First Nat. Bank of Richmond, 76 Ind. 561, 40 Am. Rep. 261; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 565, 33 L. ed. 688; Beal v. Somerville, 17 L. R. A. 291, 5 U. S. App. 14, 60 Fed. Rep. 447.

And in Flint Road Cart Co. v. Stephens, 38 Mo. App. 341, where a special deposit with the cashier as indemnity was mingled with other funds and paid out, it was held that the trust character of the deposit still attached to funds on hand, and that this was not a preference under the federal statutes.

A party depositing a draft for collection with an insolvent national bank may reclaim the proceeds in the hands of the bank to which it is sent by the insolvent bank for collection, although this collection is mingled with other collections for the insolvent bank and the balance on hand is reduced some by proper disbursements. The question of preference by insolvent bank is not discussed. Importers & T. Nat. Bank of New York v. Peters, 123 N. Y. 272.

A county may have priority on bank funds, in the hands of a receiver, where the deposit by the sheriff is contrary to law and the court holds therefore that no title to the money passed. In this case the deposits were marked "Special" and the identity of the fund was lost and the question of the prohibition of preferences under the federal statute was not passed upon. San Diego County v. California Nat. Bank, 52 Fed. Rep. 59. But see Spokane County v. Clark, infra.

Where a national bank is hopelessly insolvent, and accepts a deposit knowing of such insolvency, the depositor may reclaim the drafts deposited or their proceeds, and this does not contravene U. S. Rev. Stat., 5234 and 5242, as plaintiffs do not claim under a transfer from the bank, but under their original title. Craigie v. Smith, 14 Abb. N. C. 406; Craigie v. Hadley, 90 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9.

And the same was held in Manufacturers Nat. Bank of Boston v. Continental Bank of St. Louis, 25 L. R. A.

2 L. R. A. 609, 148 Mass. 553, but the question of preference was not discussed.

But other cases refuse to grant relief where the identity of the funds cannot be traced. Merchants & F. Bank v. Austin, 48 Fed. Rep. 26; Philadelphia Nat. Bank v. Dowd, 2 L. R. A. 480, 38 Fed. Rep. 172; St. Louis Brew. Assn. v. Austin (Ala.) Nov. 7, 1893.

And where a national bank was allowed to continue business on the directors putting in $100,000, and withdrawing that amount of objectionable securities, and the bank failed before all the securities were selected, the directors could not claim that the balance of the $100,000 was a special trust fund. Booth v. Welles, 42 Fed. Rep. 11.

This case does not discuss preferences under the federal statute.

And in Spokane County v. Clark, 61 Fed. Rep. 538, and Multnomah County v. Oregon Nat. Bank, 61 Fed. Rep. 912, it was held that a county has no priority of claim on a deposit of its funds in a national bank that becomes insolvent, where the identity of the funds is gone as it is contrary to statute forbidding preferences. This conflicts with the case of San Diego County v. California Nat. Bank, supra. Where a lien was allowed in that case the deposit was marked "Special" and it was contrary to law, which does not appear in these cases.

And in Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank of Chicago v. Smith, 21 Blatchf. 276, it was held that the owner of a draft received by an insolvent national bank for collection is not entitled to prior claim on its assets, where the collection is mingled with its funds and the identity is lost, as it would contravene the federal statutes forbidding preferences.

Where individual partners in a private bank were also directors in a national bank, and used a large part of the national bank assets in their own business and assigned their property for the benefit of creditors, and the national bank also failed, the receiver was entitled to such property as was purchased with the moneys of the bank as he might elect to take, but not to such property in which the trust could not be traced. Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 694, 33 L. ed. 704.

A transfer of renewal collateral by an insolvent national bank to another party, where such national bank had no title to the same by reason of non-surrender of the original, will not be held to be within the act forbidding preferences, although the maker of such paper may have to pay the same debt twice. First Nat. Bank of Decatur v. Johnston, 97 Ala. 655.

The case of ELMIRA SAVINGS BANK V. DAVIS, Receiver, holds that U. S. Rev. Stat., §§ 5236, 5242, prohibiting preferences, does not prevent a priority given by a statute of New York to savings banks on their deposits with other banks as the federal act is only intended to protect transfers without preference, of the assets of insolvent national banks among their creditors.

National Secur. Bank v. Butler, 129 U. S. 223, 32 L. ed. 682; First Nat. Bank of Selma v. Colby, supra; Robinson v. National Bank of Newbern, 81 N. Y. 393, 37 Am. Rep. 508; Market Nat. Bank of New York v. Pacific Nat. Bank of Boston, 30 Hun, 53, affirmed, 98 N. Y. 648; Raynor v. Pacific Nat. Bank of Boston, supra; Hayes v. Beardsley, 136 N. Y. 803.

The fundamental principles (1) the constitutional power of congress to establish the national banking system, and (2) the incidental power to adopt, in its judgment, all privileges, immunities, conditions, and regulations needful to the operation of that system—will hardly be challenged.

Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U.

and that the federal statute was not intended to disregard lawful rights and superior equities.

The argument in this case by the court is based largely on the doctrine of set-off against insolvent national banks.

Transfers by insolvent national banks.

A transfer of security to prefer a creditor, by an insolvent national bank is prohibited where the officers ought to have known its condition. Roberts v. Hill, 24 Fed. Rep. 571, overruling 23 Fed. Rep. 511; Brown v. Carbonate Bank of Leadville, 34 Fed. Rep. 776.

And a transfer by a national bank of securities as indemnity for bills previously drawn by such bank, after it has become apparent that the bank is involved, will be held to have been made in contemplation of insolvency and will be void; although the party receiving security does not know of the bank's insolvency. Case v. Citizens Bank of Louisiana, 2 Woods, C. C. 23.

A stockholder in an insolvent national bank cannot secure a depositor by mortgaging to him stock in the bank, as stockholder's liability of an insolvent bank will not allow preferences. Gatch v. Fitch, 34 Fed. Rep. 568.

To prevent a preference, the court of equity in absence of action by comptroller, at the instance of a judgment creditor, may appoint a receiver of an insolvent national bank. Wright v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 3 Cent. L. J. 351.

In Irons v. Manufacturers Nat. Bank, 6 Biss. 301, where a court of equity in aid of execution appointed a receiver of a national bank the question as to how far it would disturb preferences and require repayment from those preferred, was not decided.

Sureties on a bond to obtain dissolution of an attachment against a national bank, will be compelled to give to the receiver of the bank such securities as the attachment was not authorized by law. Pacific Nat. Bank of Boston v. Mixer, 124 U. S. 721, 31 L. ed. 567.

This in effect is different from Price v. Coleman, 23 Fed. Rep. 694, which held that a transfer by a national bank to secure sureties on a bond to release an attachment against the bank is not void, where the government officials had examined the bank a short time before on suspicion of business and had pronounced it solvent, and it had resumed business, but after giving such security failed finally. The transfer not being made after an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, nor made to give a preference or prevent distribution of assets.

In Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 538, 19 L. ed. 432, it was held that congress has the power to restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation of any notes, not issued under its authority.

The federal law permits taxation of national banks by the states, but controls the manner and fixes the limitations; and the taxing laws of a state cannot be upheld when in conflict with an act of congress.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5219; National Bank of

This note does not include cases generally involving the right to attach property of a national bank.

In order to recover from a party taking money or other securities for a certificate of deposit from an insolvent national bank in the ordinary course of business, there should be evidence that the transfer by the bank was in contemplation of insolvency to prefer and to prevent equitable distribution of assets, although the party receiving the paper was a director. Hayes v. Beardsley, 136 N. Y. 236.

To the same effect, see Dutcher v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 59 N. Y. 5.

But the act prohibiting preferences does not forbid transfers of securities for a valuable consideration, under a reasonable expectation of obtaining relief, nor transfers contracted for long prior to insolvency to secure loans being made. Bell v. Hanover Nat. Bank, 57 Fed. Rep. 821; Armstrong v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 6 L. R. A. 223, 41 Fed. Rep. 234; Casey v. La Société de Crédit Mobilier de Paris, 2 Woods, C. C. 77.

And the appropriation on its own claims by a clearing house, of money paid by other banks on call of the clearing house to take up drafts and checks on an insolvent bank, which they had surrendered to its clerk in due course of law in exchange at the clearing house before the bank had suspended and which had been left there as security for a balance due from it to the clearing house, is not an unlawful preference, as the subsequent transaction gives no right of action to the receiver of the bank against the clearing house committee for the amount of the paper on other banks, which it surrendered on the exchange, as the subsequent transactions do not rescind the exchange of securities made while the bank was doing business. *Phillips v. The state law does not and cannot give to a savings bank an equitable lien on its deposit in a national bank.

A preference is always an arbitrary statutory right arising upon a given contingency.

Casey v. La Société de Crédit Mobilier de Paris, 2 Woods, C. C. 77.

An equitable lien is of an entirely different nature.

It is in the nature of a trust.

Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1233-1238; 18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 608; Payne v. Wilson, 74 N. Y. 358.

If a savings bank have such a lien on its deposits with other banks, it attaches when the deposits are made. It is a novel doctrine that a savings bank upon making a deposit thereby acquires a lien on all the assets of the deposit bank.

The savings bank had the statutory right to make the deposits but the national bank had no legal authority to take them on the conditions asserted. All this the savings bank is presumed to have known and contemplated. Moreover, all this is to be regarded as contemplated by the state legislature in enacting the preferential statute; hence the provision of the state law should be read as expressly excluding national banks from its operation.

No logical application can be made in the present case of the doctrine of Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 36 L. ed. 1059, that equitable set-offs against the claims of insolvent banks can properly be made.

In no sense is an equitable set-off a lien, nor does it bear any analogy whatsoever to a lien.

Mr. Edward Winslow Paige also for appellant.

Messrs. Herendeen & Mandeville, for respondent:

National banks are intended to be placed on 25 L. R. A.

the same footing as state banks by section 180 of the Banking Law of this state, chapter 689 of the Laws of 1892, giving to savings banks making authorized deposits in a bank thereafter becoming insolvent a preference over other depositors in the distribution of the assets of the insolvent bank.

The national banking law is not inconsistent with the provisions of our state banking law, giving a preference to savings banks over other depositors in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent national bank.

Sections 5236, 5242, U. S. Rev. Stat., requiring the comptroller to make ratable dividends and prohibiting preferences, came in question in the line of conflicting decisions in state and federal courts as to the right of equitable set-off by a debtor to a bank, of his claims against the bank, such right being denied in some of the cases, upon the ground that to allow such set-off would be, in effect, to give a preference and to defeat the requirement of ratable dividends. This conflict has finally been settled by Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 36 L. ed. 1059, approving Yardley v. Clothier, 17 L. R. A. 402, 8 U. S. App. 207, 51 Fed. Rep. 506, affirming the same case in 49 Fed. Rep. 387; Louis Snyder's Sons Co. v. Armstrong, 87 Fed. Rep. 18; Armstrong v. Warner, 17 L. R. A. 466, 49 Ohio St. 376, and in effect approving—

Hughitt v. Hayes, 186 N. Y. 163. See also Adams v. Spokane Drug Co. 23 L. R. A. 334, 57 Fed. Rep. 888; San Diego County v. California Nat. Bank, 52 Fed. Rep. 59.

The receiver is a statutory assignee of the bank, and gets no better title than the bank had, and takes the funds in the same plight in which they were held by the bank immediately prior to his appointment and must turn them over accordingly, unaffected by the provisions of the national banking act as to ratable distribution.

Casey v. La Société de Crédit Mobilier de Paris, 2 Woods, C. C. 77; Corn Exch. Bank of Chicago v. Blye, 101 N. Y. 803; First Nat. Bank of Monmouth v. Dunbar, 118 Ill. 625; Hade v. McVay, 31 Ohio St. 231; Bell v. Hanover Nat. Bank, 57 Fed. Rep. 821; Chemical Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 59 Fed. Rep. 372.

Even under the stringent provisions of non-preferential bankrupt laws, it has been uniformly held that collateral given at the time of the passing of a present sufficient consideration, even though the possibility or even probability of future insolvency was in the minds of the parties at the time, will be sustained, and contractual rights or equities existing at such a time will be afterward upheld when insolvency occurs.

Hunt v. Mortimer, 10 Barn. & C. 44; Blumenstiel, Bankruptcy, p. 96, and cases cited; Clark v. Iustin, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 860, 23 L. ed. 568; Re Craft, 3 Ben. 221.

A national bank may lawfully receive a special deposit and must in case of insolvency pay over the same, unaffected by the requirements of the national banking act as to ratable dividends.

First Nat. Bank of Carlisle v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 25 L. ed. 750.

Section 180 of the Banking Law of this state making deposits by a savings bank a preferred claim against an insolvent national bank is within the proper sphere of state legislation; is not inconsistent with the proper construction of the national banking act; and to construe the two acts as inconsistent and repugnant would force the national legislation beyond constitutional limitations.

The theory upon which the constitutionality of national bank legislation by congress was finally upheld, is a narrow one, necessarily involving sharp and closely confined limitations.

Western U. Tele. Co. v. Atty-Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790; Waite v. Dowley, 94 U. S. 527, 24 L. ed. 181; Thomas v. Farmers Bank of Maryland, 46 Md. 43; First Nat. Bank of Louisville v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701; First Nat. Bank of Whitehall v. Lamb, 50 N. Y. 95, 10 Am. Rep. 438; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 23 L. ed. 196; Winter v. Baldwin, 89 Ala. 483.

The statutes of the United States which might control state legislation as long as they affect a bank actively engaged in discharging its duties and performing its work, must be construed as consistent and not repugnant to state legislation, or subject to it, when the bank over which the controversy arises has ceased its active career as a federal instrument.

Merchants & P. Nat. Bank v. Masonic Hall Trustees, 65 Ga. 603.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is the receiver of an insolvent national bank, and the plaintiff, a savings bank, created under the laws of this state, claims, with respect to its deposits theretofore made with the former, to be entitled to be preferred in payment, under section 180 of the Banking Law of this state, Laws 1892, chap. 689. The circulating notes have been provided for, and all other conditions of the banking law have been complied with, so as to entitle the claim to be allowed, if not in conflict with the provisions of the national banking law. The state banking law permits the trustees of savings banks to keep an "available fund . . . on hand or deposit in any bank in this state, organized under any law in this state or of the United States," etc. Section 118. Section 180 provides as follows: "All the property of any bank or trust company which shall become insolvent shall, after providing for the payment of its circulating notes, if it has any, be applied by the trustees, assignees or receiver thereof, in the first place, to the payment in full of any sum or sums of money deposited therewith by any savings bank, but not to an amount exceeding that authorized to be so deposited by the provisions of this chapter, and subject to any other preference provided for in the charter of any such trust company." The sole contention is whether this provision can be given effect in the distribution of the property of insolvent national banks. The appellant insists that it conflicts with certain provisions of the national banking law, which were framed to prohibit preferences, and relies upon the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

"Sec. 5236. From time to time, after full provision has been made for refunding to the United States any deficiency in redeeming the notes of such association, the comptroller shall make a ratable dividend of the money so paid over to him by such receiver on all such claims as may have been proved to his satisfaction or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction, and, as the proceeds of the assets of such association are paid over to him, shall make further dividends on all claims previously proved or adjudicated; and the remainder of the proceeds, if any, shall be paid over to the shareholders of such association, or their legal representatives, in proportion to the stock by them respectively held."

"Sec. 5242. All transfers of the notes, bonds, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt owing to any national banking association, or of deposits to its credit; all assignments of mortgages, sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor; all deposits of money, bullion, or other valuable thing for its use, or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors; and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, made with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this chapter, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void, and no attachment, injunction, or execution shall be issued against such association or its property before final judgment in any suit, action, or proceeding, in any state, county, or municipal court."

The provisions of the federal law as to national banks constitute a complete system for their establishment, government, and winding up. Cook County Nat. Bank v. United States, 107 U. S. 445, 27 L. ed. 537. As agencies of the government, in the administration of a branch of the public service, the states are without authority to exercise any control over them, or to affect their operation (except so far as congress may permit), where the legislation will conflict with the national law, or will tend to impair or destroy their utility and efficiency in performing the functions by which they are designed to serve the government. First Nat. Bank of Louisville v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 23 L. ed. 196; Waite v. Dowley, 94 U. S. 527, 24 L. ed. 181; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Atty-Gen. 125 U. S. 531, 31 L. ed. 794. If the state banking law, in these provisions which we are considering, comes into conflict with the operation of the federal law, the former must be held ineffectual to impede the due execution of the latter in all respects therein intended and provided for. Is that the case here? We are not now concerned with questions of the propriety or justice of the state law in directing the claims of savings banks to be preferred in payment over those of other depositors. That is the law of the state, enacted by its legislature, in furtherance of the protection and security designed to be afforded to the savings of the people; and, if the inhibition of section 5242 of the United States Revised Statutes does not extend so far as to prevent its operation in such a case, it must be given its full effect. That effect would be to preserve and enforce a right or preference which had accrued to the savings bank in making deposits of its funds with the national bank, and which will be deemed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, and assented to. Their contractual relations were necessarily influenced and shaped by the provisions of this public law, which gave to that class of depositors a superior claim or lien to that of other depositors or creditors upon the property of the bank. Are these provisions for security against a possible loss of the deposits of savings banks inconsistent with that equal distribution among creditors which was intended by the national law to be effectuated when the moment of insolvency arrived? The language of section 5242 does not seem to convey that idea, in providing that "all payments of money to either [s. e. shareholders or creditors] made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, made with a view to prevent the application of assets in the manner prescribed by this chapter, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." In Corn Ech. Bank of Chicago v. Blye, 101 N. Y. 303, it was said by this court of this section that "it specifically prohibits all transfers of the corporate property made with a view to preferences, and so protects the creditors from any voluntary act of the bank which selects out favored individuals for payment." It is a transfer of property, or a payment of moneys, in contemplation of insolvency, in order to give a preference to the creditor, which the law condemns. Its policy is to secure equality of distribution of the assets among creditors; but it was not intended that, in the distribution, rights lawfully acquired and superior equities should be disregarded and annulled. But we have upon this question a very recent and emphatic declaration by the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 86 L. ed. 1059. In that case the question related to the right of one who was debtor to a national bank to an equitable offset, as against its receiver, appointed by the comptroller of the currency to close up its affairs for insolvency. Sections 5236 and 5242 were relied upon as forbidding it, because of their requirements that there should be a ratable disposition among the creditors, and that there should be no preference given or suffered in contemplation of or after committing the act of insolvency. Chief Justice Fuller, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We do not regard this position as tenable. Undoubtedly, any disposition by a national bank, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, of its choses in action, securities, or other assets, made to prevent their application to the payment of its circulating notes, or to prefer one creditor to another, is forbidden; but liens, equities, or rights arising by express agreement, or implied from the nature of the dealings between the parties, or by operation of law, prior to insolvency, and not in contemplation thereof, are not invalidated. The provisions of the act are not directed against all liens, securities, pledges, or equities whereby one creditor may obtain a greater payment than another, but against those given or arising after or in contemplation of insolvency. Where a set-off is otherwise valid, it is not perceived how its allowance can be considered a preference; and it is clear that it is only the balance, if any, after the set-off is deducted, which can justly be held to form part of the assets of the insolvent. The requirement as to ratable dividends is to make them from what belongs to the bank, and that which at the time of the insolvency belongs of right to the debtor does not belong to the bank." This is very explicit language, and must be regarded as controlling upon us as a construction placed by the highest federal court upon these provisions of the national banking law. In that case, and in those of Waite v. Dowley and First Nat. Bank of Louisville v. Kentucky, we have authoritative expressions of opinion from which to imply the doctrine that state legislation in regulation of the general conduct of the business of the national bank with its depositors is not an interference with any exercise of the governmental power. If, in the course of its business, through force of state laws, rights are accorded to, or liens are acquired by, depositors or creditors, they are not within the purview of sections 5236 or 5242. The distinction between what is legislation by the state which conflicts with the national banking law and what is a constitutional exercise of state legislative power in relation to national banks is found by considering whether it assails or affects the independence of the national bank, in the performance of its functions as an agency of the general government. With respect to its contracts, its rights and remedies, they may, in general, be subject to or based upon state legislation, without impairing their efficiency as national institutions. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty.-Gen. supra. It is the voluntary act of the national bank, in contemplation of its insolvency, and with the view of then preventing the ratable application of its property, which is avoided by the national law. In the present case, while a going concern, it entered into an engagement with the savings bank, which the state law required and regulated, which vested in the latter superior rights or equities, and which, in the possible event of future insolvency, would give to it a prior claim to payment from the assets. When that event happened, and the receiver was appointed, he took over the property of the insolvent concern, as trustee for its creditors and shareholders, under the same conditions as the bank held it, and subject to the right of this plaintiff to be first paid in full before other creditors were paid.

I think the judgment of the general term below was right, and that it should be affirmed, with costs.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Edward M. ILLINGSWORTH
v.
BOSTON ELECTRIC LIGHT CO.

1. Evidence that a bill was rendered to and paid by the owner of electric wires attached to the frames of an electric light company for a part of the expense of repairing a roof to which one of the frames is fastened is admissible in an action by an employe of such owner against the light company for injuries caused by the bad condition of the light wires as tending to show an agreement for a joint use of the frame within the rule which requires of one owner care as to the condition of wires which employes of the other may be required to approach.
2. Reasonable care to keep electric wires in a safe condition is due by an electric light company to persons expressly or impliedly licensed to approach them in performing their duties with reference to other electric wires attached to structures of the electric light company.
3. The question of negligence in leaving uninsulated joints of electric light wires within twelve or fifteen inches of a frame up which persons are required to go in performance of duties with respect to other electric wires is a question for the jury.
4. The employe of one of two joint users of a frame for supporting electric wires does not take the risk of the wires of the other being in bad condition, unless he actually knows of it and voluntarily exposes himself to it.
5. The negligence of a lineman in going up a frame to which are attached electric light wires, as well as those which he is looking after, is a question for the jury, where his piers caught on a wire and in endeavoring to free them his hand came in contact with uninsulated joints of electric light wires within twelve or fifteen inches of the frame.
6. The lack of reasonable care to keep electric light wires insulated is not excused by reason of the fact that mere contact with such wires is not dangerous unless other conditions exist, in view of the circumstances likely to occur which may render the contact dangerous.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County which resulted in a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon plaintiff by defendant's negligent failure to properly protect electric wires in contact with which it was necessary for the plaintiff to come. Sustained.

Defendant was a corporation whose business was that of furnishing electricity for electric lighting and motive power. On May 11, 1891, its wires were strung over a building numbered 114 Sudbury street in Boston and were fastened upon the arms of a frame attached to the roof of the building. The frame and arms were the property of defendant. Above the defendant's wires, and fastened to an arm of the frame were the wires of the fire alarm of the city of Boston. Plaintiff was in the employ of the city as a lineman in the fire alarm department. And for the purpose of reaching the city's wires he was compelled to ascend the frame through the defendant's wires. While descending the frame his piers, which were in his belt, caught on a wire and in attempting to extricate them he received the shock which caused the injury for which the suit was brought.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

The exceptions recite that the court ruled that there was no evidence for the jury, and ordered a verdict for the defendant. The questions argued relate to the liability of the defendant on the evidence, under Pub. Stat., chap. 109, § 12, and Stat. 1883, chap. 221; under Stat. 1890, chap. 404, § 1; and at common law. There is no evidence of any liability under Pub. Stat. chap. 109, § 12, and Stat. 1883, chap. 221. Hector v. Boston Electric Light Co. (Mass.) post, 554. We have no occasion to consider whether it was the intention of Stat. 1890, chap. 404, to give a private person a cause of action for any violation of the first section of that statute, if, in consequence of such violation, such person suffers damage in his person or property. The only provision of that statute which, it is contended, applies to this case, is the requirement that such a corporation as the defendant should suitably and safely attach its wires to strong and sufficient supports, "and insulate them at all points of attachment." This must mean at the points of attachment to the supports. The provision probably relates to the pins or insulators, or other equivalent devices by which electric wires are usually attached to supports. There is no evidence recited in the exceptions of any defect in the insulation of the wires of the defendant at the points of attachment to the support. There was evidence of "two bad joints" on these wires, about 12 or 15 inches from the frame, to one arm of which the defendant's wires were attached. These joints were "not taped or insulated." "The rest of the wire was insulated." We infer that this is evidence that these joints never had been insulated in any manner. As the evidence was that "the plaintiff's hands were severely burned by the electricity," it was competent for the jury to find that the plaintiff's hands had touched a wire or wires of the defendant. On all the evidence in the case, we think they might have found that his hand or hands touched the defendant's wires at one or both of the joints where the wire was not insulated. It was true that a witness for the defendant—an electrical expert—testified "that this accident might have happened if the wires of the defendant had been in as good condition as skill and knowledge could have made them;" but the jury might have disbelieved this testimony, or, if they believed it, might also have believed that although such an accident was possible, under certain conditions, if the wires had been properly insulated, yet it was much more likely to happen if the wires were not insulated. The same witness testified "that a person taking hold of a perfectly insulated wire would not receive sufficient electricity to injure him.

The evidence that a bill was rendered by the defendant to the city of Boston, and was paid by the city, "charging said city a proportionate part of repairing the roof upon an adjoining building, where there was another frame of the defendant, and from which the wires of the defendant and said city extended to, and were fastened upon, the defendant's frame, where the plaintiff was injured," we think was properly admitted. It had some tendency to show that, by some arrangement between the defendant and the city of Boston, the city was paying a part of the expenses of maintaining the structures on buildings to which the wires of the defendant and those of the city were attached, and that, therefore, the city of Boston attached the wires of its fire-alarm service to the defendant's structure on the building number 114 Sudbury street, where the accident happened, by permission of the defendant, and under some contract or arrangement, whereby the city was to pay the defendant something for the maintenance of such structures. The question, then, is, when two business corporations or two persons, under some agreement between themselves, use the same structures, owned by one of them, as supports for separate lines of wire used by each for the transmission of dangerous currents of electricity, what is the duty, at common law, which each owes to the other in regard to the care each must take to have its wires in a reasonably safe condition at or near the structures where the servants of the other have occasion to go in the usual course of business, and where they must come near to, or in contact with, the wires? Such servants, when so employed, are more than mere licensees, taking advantage, for their own benefit, or that of their employer, of the passive acquiescence of the licensor. If they are licensees at all, the license, until it is revoked, is coupled with an interest. The two corporations or persons have, in a sense, a common interest in the maintenance and use of the structures to which the wires of each are attached; and each, we think, should be under the same obligation to the other as persons having common rights in a place or passageway are under to one another, not negligently to place a dangerous substance on the common territory, where it reasonably may be anticipated that others, having common rights, may be injured by it. The purpose for which the structures are used renders some danger from electrical currents inevitable, but the danger ought to be made as small as is practicable by the exercise of reasonable care. In the absence of any agreement on the subject, other than what is involved in the permission of the owner of the structures to the other to use them in common for the support of electric wires, on paying some compensation, we are of opinion that the duty of the owner of the structures is to exercise reasonable care in seeing that his wires are kept, so far as is practicable, in a safe condition at such places as the servants of the other are expressly or impliedly licensed to go in performing their duties with reference to the wires attached to such structures. Under this rule there was evidence for the jury that the defendant was negligent in leaving two joints of its wires without insulation, within twelve or fifteen inches of the frame, up which the plaintiff, in the course of his duty, as a person employed in the fire-alarm service of Boston, was required or expected to go. We, of course, express no opinion upon the liability of the city of Boston for the condition of the wires of its fire-alarm service.

It is contended that the plaintiff took the risk, or that he offered no evidence that he was in the exercise of due care. As the plaintiff was not a servant of the defendant, it cannot be said that he took the risk, unless he knew of it, and voluntarily exposed himself to it, and none of these things is necessarily to be inferred from the evidence. Whether he was in the exercise of due care, we think, was for the jury. It appears that the wires of the defendant were insulated, except at these two joints, and the plaintiff reasonably may have expected that the wires about the frame were entirely insulated; and we cannot say, as matter of law, that he was negligent in not seeing the uninsulated condition of these joints. It does not necessarily show negligence that his pliers got caught on another wire although this may have been the cause of his injury. It was not necessarily negligent that he reached round with his hand to clear the pliers, although it may be that by this movement his hand was extended further from the post to which the arms were fastened, which held the wires, than otherwise he would have extended it. We cannot say, as matter of law, on the evidence, that his hand or hands, in this movement, did not touch one or both of the joints, and that this was the cause of the injury.

The exceptions recite that "the undisputed evidence was that mere contact with one electric light wire, even though bare and uninsulated, would cause no injury, unless other conditions supervened," but there is no contention that these other conditions do not often occur. The fact that other circumstances must occur to render contact with such wires dangerous, if it be true, cannot excuse the defendant from taking reasonable care, in view of all the circumstances likely to occur, to have its wires properly insulated at points where the servants of another have the right, derived from the defendant, of coming near to, or in contact with, the wires. We are of opinion that the questions of the defendant's negligence and of the plaintiff's due care were for the jury.

Albert E. HECTOR

v.

BOSTON ELECTRIC LIGHT CO.

1. Exceptions filed within the time allowed, which the opposite party asks to have disallowed, may be amended in the discretion of the presiding justice, with consent of the excepting party, although the time for filing exceptions has passed.
2. An electric light company allowing its standard for the support of wires on the roof of a building to be used by a telegraph and telephone company for its wires also does not thereby assume any duty to employes of the latter company in respect to the safe insulation of the electric light wires over the roof of an adjoining building to which no wires of any kind were attached, and on which they had no right to go by reason of permission to use the standard on the former building.
3. The liability of electric light companies for injuries received from posts, wires, or other apparatus is not affected by Stat. 1883, chap. 221, granting to such companies the right to lay and maintain wires subject to municipal regulations.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiffs. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Everett W. Burdett and Charles A. Snow, for defendant:

No duty is imposed by law on the owner or tenant of private premises to keep them in a condition reasonably suitable for the use of those who enter upon them for their own business, convenience, or pleasure, and who neither are expressly invited nor are attracted, induced, enticed, or allured by such owner or tenant so to do, and, accordingly, a trespasser or a bare licensee upon such premises cannot hold the owner or the tenant liable for ordinary negligence on his part with respect to the condition of the premises.

Co.* 12 L. R. A. 248, 154 Mass. 349; McEachern v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 515; Metcalfe v. Cunard Steamship Co. 147 Mass. 66; Heinlein v. Boston & P. R. Co. Id. 126; *Files v. Boston & A. A. 459, 155 Mass. 472; Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426; Hart v. Cole, 16 L. R. A. 557, 156 Mass. 475; Sullivan v. Boston & A. R. Co. 156 Mass. 378.

There is no evidence in this case of any invitation, express or implied, held out to the plaintiff by either the owner of the Youth's Companion building or the defendant.

The plaintiff when he was injured was, at the highest, a mere licensee upon the premises, the jury having found specially that he was, "at the time of the injury, upon the roof of the Youth's Companion building by virtue of an implied permission or license from the person or persons having proper authority over the roof and control thereof in respect of granting or denying such permission." The defendant maintains that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant this finding of the jury, and that, upon the evidence, the plaintiff was a mere trespasser. If the plaintiff was a trespasser, then "on the evidence and law in this case, he would not be entitled to recover, because the defendants would not owe him, as a trespasser, the duty that is alleged in the plaintiff's declaration; they would not as a matter of law."

Sullivan v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra.

In order to maintain this action, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish a distinction between the duty of an owner of premises and that of a lawful occupant.

The owner or occupant of private property is not liable for the results of his ordinary negligence to a trespasser or licensee thereon. No distinction in this respect has ever been drawn between the duty of an owner of premises and that of a lawful occupant.

No reason exists for drawing any such distinction.

The court has generally, if not universally, enunciated the rule after considering whether or not the plaintiff is a trespasser or licensee, and not with reference to the defendant's position, whether he is the owner of the premises or has rights less than absolute ownership.

Hart v. Cole, Stevens v. Nichols, Redigan v. Boston & M. Railroad, and Files v. Boston & A. R. Co. supra.

In the case of trespassers or licensees, even though the owner knows or has reason to believe that they are likely to be upon his premises, he is not liable for the results of ordinary negligence on his part.

NOTE.—See, in connection with this case, the preceding case of Illingsworth v. Boston Electric Light Co. (Mass.) ante, 552.

The broad rule laid down by Brett, M. R., in Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 508, to the effect that a man is always liable for the natural and probable consequences of his acts, which he knows, or ought to know, has been considerably departed from and limited in this commonwealth.

The owner of a building is not 'bound to fence or enclose dangerous machinery contained in it for the protection of a mere licensee.'

Buswell, Personal Injuries, 1893, p. 111, and cases cited.

Neither would the defendant owe the plaintiff any duty, even if it were maintaining its wires above the roof by the mere consent and permission of the owner. The defendant would then have the same defenses as the owner.

The plaintiff was not a licensee, but a trespasser, upon all the evidence.

If the plaintiff, before he came in contact with the defendant's wire, appreciated the facts of the case, knew or ought to have known everything that it was material for him to know as bearing upon the question of his danger or security in what he proposed to do, and chose to go forward, then he was a volunteer and would not be entitled to recover, because understanding the risk and choosing voluntarily to go forward, he is held to have accepted the risk.

If a case is submitted to the jury under instructions which permit them to find a verdict which the evidence is not sufficient to sustain, the other party is entitled to a new trial, although the instructions, abstractly considered, were free from objection.

The plaintiff must state what relations or arrangements existed between it and the owner of the roof, before the court can determine upon the declaration, whether the defendant owed the plaintiff any duty.

The words "rightfully there," in the absence of any other allegation showing the nature of the right pursuant to which the plaintiff was upon the roof, must be taken to mean that the plaintiff went there in the proper discharge of the business of his employer and was not a trespasser in so doing because he was there by the license of the owner. He could not be considered to be there by invitation, express or implied, or with rights higher than those of a bare licensee unless he expressly so alleged it.

If the plaintiff was properly on the roof of 41 Temple place under such circumstances as would create, ordinarily, a duty on the part of the defendant with respect to the condition of the premises, yet the plaintiff on the declaration was a mere trespasser in touching or coming into contact with the defendant's wire, no duty to fence or guard the same being alleged.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The exceptions in this case, as amended, were allowed by the presiding justice of the superior court, if it was within his authority and discretion to allow them; otherwise, they were disallowed. The original draft of the exceptions was filed on February 20, 1892, within the time allowed. In April following, the counsel of both parties were heard upon the allowance of the exceptions. The plaintiff's counsel then asked that they be disallowed, which the justice at that time declined to do; but he suggested that the counsel confer together, and that the plaintiff's counsel point out what changes they thought should be made. This was done, and the draft of the exceptions was altered, and some things added to it, with the consent of the counsel of the defendant, who, however, did not admit that all such alterations and additions were necessary. The plaintiff's counsel did not waive their objections to the allowance of the amended draft, but contended that it was substantially a new bill of exceptions, made up and filed after the time prescribed by the statute for filing exceptions has passed. Copies of the exceptions have been furnished us, showing the difference between the bill as originally filed and the bill as amended. The excepting party has a right, if he chooses, to stand upon his exceptions, as originally filed, and to prove the truth of them, if they are not allowed. The extent to which errors in such exceptions can be corrected on a petition to prove the exceptions was considered in Morse v. Woodworth, 155 Mass. 238. The extent to which the presiding justice can allow the excepting party to amend his bill of exceptions has not been determined. In such a case as this is, where many questions of law were raised at the trial, one of which was that upon all the evidence the plaintiff could not recover, it is hardly possible that the original draft of the exceptions, without any change, would be entirely acceptable to either the presiding justice or to the other party. The other party, under the statute, has a right to be heard upon the allowance of the exceptions; and the practice has been to permit the excepting party, if he chooses, with the consent of the presiding justice, to amend his exceptions so as to state more accurately and completely the questions of law which were raised at the trial, and included in the bill of exceptions as filed. It is true that the presiding justice is not required by law to allow any such amendments, but his power to allow amendments is undoubted. Perry v. Breed, 117 Mass. 155. They cannot be allowed without the consent of the excepting party, but with his consent they can be; certainly, so far as is necessary to make the exceptions conformable to the truth, and the whole truth, with reference to the questions of law raised at the trial, and included in the original bill of exceptions. We have no occasion to consider, in this case, whether a distinct exception taken at the trial, and omitted from the bill as filed, by accident or mistake, can be added by an amendment to the original draft after the time has expired for filing exceptions. In the present bill, we think that the amendments allowed by the presiding justice with the consent of the defendant were such as were within his power and discretion to allow.

The plaintiff was a lineman of the New England Telegraph & Telephone Company, and went upon the roof of the building No. 41 Temple Place, Boston, called the "Youth's Companion Building," for the purpose of affixing a telephone wire to a standard erected upon the roof of the building No. 45 Temple place, which adjoined No. 41 on the side towards Washington street. It was intended that this wire should run from West street to this standard, and thence should swerve slightly towards Washington street, and pass across Temple place. He was injured, while on the roof of No. 41, by his left hand coming in contact with a wire belonging to the defendant, through which an alternating electric light current was being transmitted. This electric light wire ran over the southeasterly corner of the building on which he was, and at the point where the plaintiff's hand came in contact with it was about 25 feet from the corner. The wire formed one side of an alternating electric light circuit; the other wire of the circuit running parallel with it, and at a distance of 17½ inches from it. No wires of any kind were attached to the roof of No. 41 Temple place; and the roof was clean, smooth and unobstructed by anything except a scuttle near the back part of it, a skylight near where the plaintiff fell, and two or three other skylights near the rear of the roof. The roof of the building No. 45 Temple place, was about 20 feet below the roof of the building No. 41, and each was a flat, or nearly flat, roof. Near the center of the roof of No. 45, the defendant, which is a corporation engaged in the business of furnishing electric light and power in the city of Boston, had erected a standard about 25 feet in height, on which were three cross arms, running horizontally and at right angles with the line of Temple place. This standard was used for the purpose of supporting various wires which were attached to it, and ran from it to two other fixtures on the other side of Temple place. The highest cross-arm was about 5 feet long, and had on it four glass insulators, placed 17½ inches apart, attached to which were four arc electric light wires. The next lower cross-arm was placed 2 feet below this, was about 8 feet in length, and had upon it six insulators, placed at the same distance apart, to which were attached electric light wires. The two insulators next to the upright post—one on each side—had attached to them the two alternating electric light wires, and the remainder of the insulators had attached to them four arc electric light wires. The lowest cross arm was placed about 1½ feet below the middle cross-arm, was about 12 feet in length, and had on it ten insulators, placed 12 inches apart, to which were attached ten wires, not electric light wires, of which at least six were telephone wires. All the wires attached to this standard ran north-easterly across Temple place, above the southeast corner of the roof of No. 41, to two fixtures on the other side of Temple place, placed on the buildings No. 24 and 34. All the arc electric light wires ran to a standard on No. 24, and the two alternating electric wires on the middle cross-arm, and the telephone and other wires on the lowest cross arm, to a standard on No. 34. The wires thus starting from the same standard on No. 45, as they crossed over the corner of the roof of No. 41, diverged, and form two distinct groups of wires, which, for convenience, are called the first and second groups; the wires running to No. 24 constituting the first group, and those running to No. 34 the second group. The point at which the second group of wires crossed the side of the roof of No. 41 next to No. 45, was distant from the southeast corner of the roof of No. 45 about 15 feet, and the point where the first group crossed this side was distant from the same corner about 20 feet; so that there was a distance of about 5 feet between the two groups on the side of the roof of No. 41, next to No. 45. Between the place where these groups of wires crossed the side of the roof of No. 41, next to No. 45, and the rear of the roof of No. 41, there was a distance of about 70 feet, and there was no obstruction of any kind on this part of the roof, except two chimneys, each 4 feet in width, nor was there any wire; and any one might have gone on any portion of that part of the roof, and looked down upon the roof of No. 45, without encountering any danger. The first group of wires, as they crossed above the corner of the roof of No. 41, were at distances varying from 4 to 6 feet above the roof; the two alternating electric light wires, which were in the second group, were at a distance of about 2½ feet above the roof, and the telephone and other wires running from the lowest arm of the fixture on No. 45 were about 1 foot below the alternating electric light wires.

The plaintiff at the time of the accident, was at work, with others, for the telegraph and telephone company, in stringing a telephone wire from the top of a building in West street to the standard on No. 45, Temple place, and thence to a fixture on the top of a building on the other side of Temple place. He was told by the foreman to go upon the building No. 45 Temple place, and attach this wire to the standard there. He went up through the building No. 29 Temple place, called the "Warren Building," and out upon the roof of that building; thence across the intervening roofs to the roof of No. 41. There were no steps or other means provided for getting from the roof of No. 41 to the roof No. 45, and there was no ladder or rope on the roof which could be used for this purpose. There was access to the roof of No. 41 through the building No. 41, and also access to the roof of No. 45 through the building No. 45. The plaintiff, after getting upon the roof of No. 41, and after calling to a fellow workman in the street to come up on the roof of No. 45, went to look over the side of the roof of No. 41, to see how he could get down upon the roof of No. 45. He was looking over the side of the roof onto the roof of No. 45, and was stooping down (he had to stoop down to clear a large bunch of the wires), when he felt a current of electricity go through him, and he remembered nothing more. The plaintiff was found lying under the first group of wires with four of his fingers burnt, and a wound upon the side of his head, where the hair was burnt off. The nearer of the two alternating electric light wires, as one approached them in going towards the side of the roof, had upon it some pieces of burnt flesh which showed where the plaintiff had touched the wire; and the insulation of the wire, where it appeared that the plaintiff had touched it, was worn off. The plaintiff had had a long experience with electrical apparatus; was familiar with all kinds of electrical wires, and the proper methods of handling them, and the dangers attendant upon the business. He testified "that he knew the general character of the structures used by the various companies in the prosecution of their business in Boston; that the Boston Electric Light Company has a structure of a peculiar color, of its own, and that the fact last referred to was common knowledge among all linemen; that the telephone company had structures of a different color from that of the Boston Electric Light Company; that the colors of the structures used by the other companies in Boston also differed from the color of the structures of the Boston

Electric Light Company; that linemen, if they were close enough to see the color of a structure, could easily tell whether it belonged to one company or another; that in the prosecution of his work as a linemen, he had occasion, in Boston, to go on to roofs which were crossed by all sorts of wires, and to go upon structures which had all sorts of wires; that on the structure on 45 Temple place he would not have been surprised to find thereon electric light, telephone, telegraph, police-signal, and other wires; the telephone wires were sometimes insulated, and sometimes not insulated." It appeared that the alternating electric light wires did not resemble any wires used by other companies, except the police-signal wires. The plaintiff testified, in substance, that he noticed the big bunch of wires, by which he must have meant the first group, but that he did not recollect noticing the others. All he remembered was that there was a big body of wires, and that he had to stoop in order to clear them; he cleared them, and went to the edge of the roof, and looked down; that he could not say whether there were any wires on his left or not; that he noticed that there were different kinds of wires on the roof, after he got onto it; that the only safe rule to follow was to treat every wire as dangerous; that he was very careful not to touch any wire on a roof, because he was liable to get a shock; that even telegraph or telephone wires sometimes got across wires having a dangerous current, and became dangerous; and that the roof on which he was standing was a copper roof, which was a conductor, and made what was called a "ground." It was admitted that the defendant was transmitting through these alternating wires an electric current of 1,000 volts, which was dangerous under certain conditions. But it was contended that to make such a current dangerous the person touching a wire must be "grounded" as it is called; that is, be connected with the earth by substances that are conductors of electricity, while the other wire of the circuit must be grounded at the same time. The accident happened in the morning of March 10, 1890, when it was broad daylight. The jury found, in answer to question submitted to them, that the plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was upon the roof of No. 41 Temple place by the implied permission or license of a person having authority to grant such permission or license. The presiding justice ruled that the plaintiff could not, under his declaration, "claim that the defendant was unlawfully, or without right, maintaining the alternating wires in the position in which they were at the time of the accident; reserving, however, to the plaintiff the right to claim that the defendant negligently maintained said wires in such position." He also ruled "that there was no evidence of any invitation, express or implied," held out to the plaintiff by the owners of the building No. 41, and no evidence of any preparation or adaptation of the building by the owners for the plaintiff's use, and that, "if the plaintiff was a mere licensee, the defendant, if liable at all, was not liable for mere omission on its part to exercise reasonable care as to the position or condition of the wire which caused the plaintiff's injury, but would be liable only for acts of commission," but refused to rule that there was no evidence of any such act of commission. He also ruled "that a mere licensee, going upon another man's land, must take the premises as he finds them, subject to all their concomitant conditions and perils, and that if the plaintiff was a mere licensee, in order to recover, he must show some change or alteration in the condition of the premises, or wires thereon, whereby injury may arise to persons being upon the roof in question, and that such change or alteration occurred during the existence of the license in question, and that the plaintiff had no notice of such change or alteration." He also ruled that if the plaintiff was on the roof of the building No. 41 as a trespasser, upon the evidence in this case, he would not be entitled to recover. If the plaintiff was a licensee, he stated the law as follows: "The law is that as between a licensee and the owner of the premises, where, as against the owner of the premises, he is a mere licensee, he has to take the premises in the condition in which he finds them. He occupies them as a licensee,—pure licensee,—at his own risk, unless perhaps, in the case of some concealed trap. Now, the defendants claim that at most he was only a licensee, if he was that; and they claim that this same doctrine which applies as between the licensee and the owner of the premises applied between the plaintiff and themselves, as the owners and maintainers of these electric wires. That is what they claim. And so they say there was no duty from them to the plaintiff. Now, the plaintiff claims something more. He claims there was more than that; that, whatever might be his relation to the owners of the Youth's Companion building, yet that he was on that building by the permission of the owners, so that he was not a trespasser, was not there unlawfully, and that then, as between him and the defendants, a new element enters. The plaintiff claims that the defendant placed the electric light wires on the building in Temple place, where they were when plaintiff was injured, and had full control of them at that time (that is, the defendant had full control of them at that time); that through some of these wires, thus placed there passed, in their ordinary and daily use, alternating currents of electricity, which under such conditions as were liable to happen, and might reasonably be expected to occur, became dangerous to human life and safety; that this was known, or reasonably ought to have been known, to defendants and their servants who put up and had charge of the wires; that there was also telegraph wires and telephone wires, with the defendants' knowledge and express or implied consent, attached to the same standard to which the wires of the defendant were attached, and at this place ran near the defendants' wires; and that defendants and their servants knew, or, with the exercise of ordinary prudence and attention, would have known, that the servants of the telephone and telegraph companies, whose wires were attached as aforesaid, would in the usual course of their duty and employment, have occasion to come to said standard, and in close proximity with defendants' said wires, and that the natural and probable consequence might be that, unless defendant used due and proper care in respect to their said wires, the said servants of the said telephone and telegraph companies, while in the usual course of their employment and duty as aforesaid, and though in the use of due care themselves, might be injured by said wires, and the electric currents thereof. That is what the plaintiff claims. And what is the result? If the plaintiff satisfies you that these claims are well founded, and that plaintiff, at the time and place of his injury, was a servant of the telephone company,—was lawfully on said building,—and then and there rightfully acting in the course of his employment, and where the defendants ought reasonably to have anticipated he might be, then the defendants owed him some duty in regard to their said wires." That duty the presiding justice afterwards defined as "the duty to use reasonable and ordinary care in respect to the condition of these wires, and the location of them. . . . The defendants must use reasonable and proper care in the kind of wire they use, in the care they take of it while in use, and in regard to the location in which they maintained it."

Under this statement of the law, the claim of the plaintiff was, in effect, that the alternating electric light wires were not properly insulated; that, at the particular place where the plaintiff touched one of them, the insulation had been carelessly allowed to be worn off; and that the wires were placed in a position so near to the roof that a person on the roof would naturally come in contact with them. The jury must have found that there was a license or permission given by the defendant to the telegraph and telephone company to attach its wires to its standard on the building No. 45 Temple place. The principal questions argued are whether the defendant owed the telegraph and telephone company and its servants any duty in regard to the proper insulation or position of its wires at the place where the wires ran over the roof of the building No. 41, and, if it did, whether the plaintiff, in going to the side of the roof, as he did, to look down upon the roof of No. 45, for the purpose of finding out how he could get down upon it, was in the exercise of due care.

The first prayer of the defendant for instructions raises the question whether, upon all the evidence, the plaintiff can recover. We doubt if the plaintiff offered sufficient evidence that he was in the exercise of due care at the time and place of the accident. It was daylight, the wires were visible, and the plaintiff knew that some of the wires might be dangerous. If we assume that, as against the owner of the building No. 41, he was rightfully on the roof of that building for the purpose of going down upon the roof of the building No. 45, there was on the side of the roof a long distance, unobstructed, over which he could have looked down with safety. The plaintiff could look down upon the roof of No. 45 in his own way, and the safe place to do this was obvious. Instead of selecting a safe place, he unnecessarily stooped under some wires which he saw, and knew might be dangerous, without noticing another set of wires, lower down, which were in plain sight. In consequence of this conduct, his hand accidentally came in contact with one of the alternating electric light wires at a point where the insulation was worn off, and he received his injury. If necessary to the decision, it would certainly deserve consideration whether this conduct does not show an unnecessary exposure to a danger which the plaintiff knew, or ought to have known. See Lothrop v. Fitchburg R. Co. 150 Mass. 423. Without determining this question, however, we are of opinion that the defendant, on the evidence, owed no duty to the plaintiff to have its wires properly insulated at the place where he received his injury, or to have its wires at that place supported so far above the roof of the building No. 41 that the plaintiff would not come in contact with them when on that roof. On the evidence recited in the exceptions, the most favorable inference for the plaintiff is that the telegraph and telephone company was permitted by the defendant to use its standard on the building No. 45 Temple place, and that, therefore, the plaintiff, as the servant of the telegraph and telephone company, engaged in its business, had an implied license from the defendant to go upon the roof of this building, and attach telegraph and telephone wires to its standard. Whatever may be the duty of the defendant towards its licensees, it must be confined, we think, to licensees when acting within the scope of the license; and the defendant had no reasonable ground to expect that the servants of the telegraph and telephone company would approach this standard in the way used by this plaintiff. If the presumption is that the defendant maintained this standard on the roof of the building No. 45 by contract with or permission of the owner of that building, the inference would be that it had a license from the owner to go through his building, upon the roof, for the purpose of reaching the standard, and attaching wires to it; and this license might be available to the servants of other companies which were permitted to use the standard, if the standard was erected or maintained by the defendant for the use of other companies as well as of itself. Doty v. Gorham, 5 Pick. 437, 16 Am. Dec. 417. This was the most direct way of reaching the roof of No. 45, and was the way provided by the owner of the building for reaching the roof; and there was nothing in the situation of this and the adjoining buildings indicating that the roof of building No. 41 was to be used for the purpose of reaching the roof on No. 45. The right to go upon the roof of No. 41 for this purpose could only be derived from the owner or occupant of that building. Whatever may be the duty of the defendant, in stringing its wires over the roof of No. 41, to the owner of that building and his servants, we see no evidence that the defendant intended to authorize the use of this roof by the telegraph and telephone company, or had any right to permit the servants of that company to go upon it. Whatever duty, on the evidence, the defendant owed to the plaintiff, as servant of the telegraph and telephone company, under its license to that company to use the standard for the support of telegraph or telephone wires, this duty cannot be held to extend over the whole circuit of the defendant's wires; and the defendant is not required, for the protection of the servants of the telegraph and telephone company, to maintain an effectual insulation of its wires over other buildings than that on which the standard was placed, at places where the defendant had no reason to expect that the servants of that company would go, in the performance of their duties, in using its standard, and where the defendant had neither invited nor licensed them to go.

The first two counts of the declaration are at common law. The third count is under Pub. Stat., chap. 109, § 12, and Stat. 1883, chap. 221. The court required the plaintiff to elect whether he would rely upon the first and second counts, or upon the third, and he elected to rely upon the first and second. As the exceptions must be sustained, and there may be a new trial, it is proper to notice the contention of the plaintiff under the third count, as in the event of another trial the plaintiff may rely upon that count. Pub. Stat. chap. 109, § 12, provides that "when an injury is done a person or to property by the posts, wires, or other apparatus of a telegraphic line the company shall be responsible in damages to the party injured," etc. Stat. 1883, chap. 221, is as follows: "All provisions of law granting to persons and corporations authority to erect, lay and maintain, and to cities and towns authority to regulate telegraph and telephone lines, except sections sixteen and eighteen of chapter one hundred and nine of the Public Statutes, shall, so far as applicable, apply to lines for the transmission of electricity for the purpose of lighting." This last statute relates solely to the authority to erect, lay, and maintain lines for the transmission of electricity for the purpose of lighting, and for the regulation of such lines. It does not relate to the liability of electric light companies for injuries received by any person from the posts, wires, or other apparatus of such companies. This renders it unnecessary to consider whether Pub. Stat., chap. 109, § 12, was intended to include injuries received from an electric current transmitted through wires. It has been argued that this could not have been intended by this section, as telegraphic currents are not dangerous.

In the view we have taken of this case, the questions arising on the demurrer need not be determined.

two weeks only before election instead of three months, as required by Const., art. 10, § 9, is fatal to the amendment, as the provision is that the secretary of state "shall" cause the publishing for three months; and it is also declared in another section that the provisions of the constitution are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words declared to be otherwise.

(September 24, 1894.)

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to file the certificates of relators as nominees for the office of county commissioners, which offices were alleged to be about to become vacant under the provisions of an amendment of the state constitution.
Writ denied.

Statement by DeWitt, J.:

The relators ask a writ of mandamus, directed to the respondent, as county clerk and recorder of Lewis and Clarke county, requiring him, in pursuance to the ballot law (Acts 16th Legal Sess. Laws 1899, p. 185), to file in his office the certificate of the relators' nomination for the office of county commissioner of said county. The petitioners set forth that on September 4, 1894, an assemblage of delegates of the Republican party was duly held, and that at such assemblage the three relators were duly nominated for such office of county commissioner. The formal acts of making the certificate of nomination by the proper officers of the convention are set forth in the petition. It is then alleged that said certificate was duly presented to the respondent for filing, and that he refused, and still refuses, to file the same. The respondent's answer admits all the matter alleged in the petition, and gives his reason for refusing to file the certificate, based upon the following facts: The nominations for said office of county commissioner were for the purpose of electing persons to that office, under the provisions of an alleged amendment to the constitution; and that there is, in fact, no such amendment, and, there being no such amendment, there will be no vacancy in the office of county commissioner, in said county, to be filled at the ensuing election; and that, therefore there is no duty enjoined by law upon the county clerk and recorder to file any certificate of nomination for such office by any political party.

The question presented to this court is whether the constitutional amendment proposed by the legislative assembly by Act approved February 28, 1891, and voted upon by the electors at the general election in November, 1892, became, and now is, a part of the constitution. The facts in relation to the alleged adoption of the proposed amendment are as follows: The state constitution, adopted October 1, 1889, contains the following: "In each county there shall be elected three county commissioners, whose term of office shall be four years. A vacancy in the board of county commissioners shall be filled by appointment by the district judge of the district in which the vacancy occurs." Article 16, § 4. The act of the legislative assembly referred to, approved February 23, 1891, provides as follows: "Section 1. There shall be submitted to the qualified electors of the state, at the next general election, the following amendment to the state constitution: Section 4, art. 16, shall be amended so as to read as follows: Sec. 4. In each county there shall be elected three county commissioners, whose term of office shall be four years; provided, that the term of office of those elected to succeed those elected October 1, 1889, shall expire on the first Monday in January, 1895; and, provided further, that at the general election to be held in November, 1894, one commissioner shall be elected for a term of two years, and two commissioners for a term of four years. A vacancy in the board of county commissioners shall be filled by appointment by the district judge of the district in which the vacancy occurs." The constitution provides, as to amendments of that instrument, as follows: "Amendments to this constitution may be proposed in either house of the legislative assembly; and if the same shall be voted for by two thirds of the members elected to each house, such proposed amendment, together with the ayes and nays of each house thereon, shall be entered in full on their respective journals; and the secretary of state shall cause the said amendment or amendments to be published in full in at least one newspaper in each county (if such there be), for three months previous to the next general election for members to the legislative assembly; and at said election the said amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the qualified electors of the state for their approval or rejection, and such as are approved by a majority of those voting thereon shall become part of the constitution. Should more amendments than one be submitted at the same election, they shall be so prepared, and distinguished by numbers, or otherwise, that each can be voted upon separately; provided, however, that not more than three amendments to this constitution shall be submitted at the same election." Article 19, § 9. The fact as to the publication of the amendment proposed by the Act of February 23, 1891, is that it was published by the secretary of state in the newspapers as required, but for two weeks before the election of 1893 only, and for no longer period. The question now presented is whether the publication of the proposed amendment for only two weeks caused the attempt to adopt the amendment to be wholly a failure.

De Witt, J., delivered the opinion of the court :

Counsel for relators has presented to us the general rules as to when statutes should be construed to be mandatory and when directory, and has argued, upon their analogies, that the provision of our constitution which requires a proposed amendment to that instrument to be published for three months is directory only, and that a disregard of the provision is not fatal to the adoption of the amendment. The reports are full of decisions which have applied these principles as to the construction of certain provisions of statutes, but we need not enter upon an elaborate examination of these principles, for we believe that in considering the provisions of the constitution for amending that instrument we are entering upon a somewhat different field. We cannot better introduce this consideration than by quoting from Judge Cooley, whose language we find cited, and his doctrine largely followed, by the courts which have treated the subject of the construction of constitutional provisions. Judge Cooley says: "But the courts tread upon very dangerous ground when they venture to apply the rules which distinguish directory and mandatory statutes to the provisions of a constitution. Constitutions do not usually undertake to prescribe mere rules of proceeding, except when such rules are looked upon as essential to the thing to be done; and they must then be regarded in the light of limitations upon the power to be exercised. It is the province of an instrument of this solemn and permanent character to establish those fundamental maxims, and fix those unvarying rules, by which all departments of the government must at all times shape their conduct; and if it depends to prescribing mere rules of order in unessential matters it is lowering the proper dignity of such an instrument, and usurping the proper province of ordinary legislation. We are not, therefore, to expect to find in a constitution provisions which the people, in adopting it, have not regarded as of high importance and worthy to be embraced in an instrument which, for a time at least, is to control alike the government and the governed, and to form a standard by which is to be measured the power which can be exercised as well by the delegate as by the sovereign people themselves. If directions are given respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power should be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only; and we impute to the people a want of due appreciation of the purpose and proper province of such an instrument when we infer that such directions are given to any other end. Especially when, as has been already said, it is but fair to presume that the people in their constitution have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms, corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, and with a view to leave as little as possible to implication. There are some cases, however, where the doctrine of directory statutes has been applied to constitutional provisions; but they are so plainly at variance with the weight of authority upon the precise points considered that we feel warranted in saying that the judicial decisions as they now stand do not sanction the application." Pages 94, 95. "And we concur fully in what was said by Mr. Justice Emmot in speaking of this very provision, that 'it will be found, upon full consideration, to be difficult to treat any constitutional provision as merely directory, and not imperative.'" Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. p. 99. At another place in the same work this distinguished authority on constitutional law says: "But the will of the people to this end [that is, amending a constitution] can only be expressed in the legitimate modes by which such a body politic can act, and which must either be prescribed by the constitution whose revision or amendment is sought, or by an act of the legislative department of the state, which alone would be authorized to speak for the people upon this subject, and to point out a mode for the expression of their will in the absence of any provision for amendment or revision contained in the constitution itself." Page 89, § 80. In another place in the same work we find the following language: "The fact is this: that whatever constitutional provision can be looked upon as directory merely is very likely to be treated by the legislature as if it was devoid even of moral obligation, and to be, therefore, habitually disregarded. To say that a provision is directory seems, with many persons, to be equivalent to saying that it is not law at all. That this ought not to be so must be conceded; that it is so we have abundant reason and good authority for saying. If, therefore, a constitutional provision is to be enforced at all, it must be treated as mandatory. And if the legislature habitually disregard it, it seems to us that there is all the more urgent necessity that the courts should enforce it. And it also seems to us that there are few evils which can be inflicted by a strict adherence to the law so great as that which is done by an habitual disregard, by any department of the government, of a plain requirement of that instrument from which it derives its authority, and which ought, therefore, to be scrupulously observed and obeyed." Page 183, § 150.

The court of appeals of Texas, in construing a constitutional provision, uses the following language: "In considering the subject, we think it necessary to first determine whether, in the construction of the organic law, we may, as we might in the construction of a statute, apply the distinction between directory and mandatory provisions, or whether we must construe all provisions of the organic law to be mandatory." Hunt v. State, 23 Tex. App. 897. The opinion of that court then refers to cases which have held constitutional provisions to be directory, and continues in the following language: "But, notwithstanding these decisions are by able courts, the great weight of authority seems to be the other way, holding that the courts nor any other department of the government are at liberty to regard any provision of the constitution as merely directory, but that each and every of its provisions must be treated as imperative and mandatory, without reference to the rules distinguishing between directory and mandatory statutes." 22 Tex. App. 398. The opinion then cites Judge Cooley as we have quoted him above, and continues: "In our own state we know of no instance in which a constitutional provision has been held to be directory merely. This court has held more than once that constitutional provisions are always mandatory, and has adopted the doctrine laid down by Judge Cooley, which we have quoted above. Oss v. State, 8 Tex. App. 254, 34 Am. Rep. 746; Holley v. State, 14 Tex. App. 505. We believe this to be the sound and only safe doctrine. It seems to us that the rule which gives to the courts and other departments of the government a discretionary power to treat a constitutional provision as directory, and to obey it or not, at their pleasure, is fraught with great danger to the government. We can conceive of no greater danger to constitutional government, and to the rights and liberties of the people, than the doctrine which permits a loose, latitudinous, discretionary construction of the organic law. 'We are taught by the constitution itself that those who administer this government are divided into three co-ordinate departments; each of these can only act within its own limited sphere, and they, respectively, are the servants of the sovereign power, the people. There is no power above the people. There is no discretionary power granted in the constitution for either of these departments, nor for all of them united, to exercise a discretionary expansion and flexible power against its rigid limitations, even though such limitations were imposed by improvident jealousy. If abuse exists by reason of defects in the constitution, present or prospective, the true source of authority, the people have the power, and doubtless the wisdom and patriotism, to correct them; and this, in the American idea, is the safe and only depository.' Potter's Dwar. Stat. & Const. p. 665. . . . Upon the weight of authority, and, to our minds, upon the soundest of reasons, we conclude that the provision of the constitution under consideration, and all other provisions of our constitution, are mandatory, and can in no case be regarded as directory merely, to be obeyed or not, within the discretion of either or all of the departments united of the government." Hunt v. State, 22 Tex. App. 399, 400. See also Opinion of the Justices, 6 Cush. 573.

It would seem that the framers of our constitution had in mind the views of Judge Cooley, for they did not leave the language of the constitution open to the construction of courts, but set the matter at rest by the following provision: "The provisions of this constitution are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words they are declared to be otherwise." Const. art. 3, § 29. The court is therefore relieved from much responsibility in the construction of the 25 L. R. A.

organic law. The question is not before us whether the requirement of the constitution that notice of a proposed amendment shall be published for three months is mandatory or directory. The constitution construes itself in this regard, and, as remarked in the opening of this opinion, we seem to be in a somewhat different field than that suggested by relators' counsel as to the construction of statutes.

It being settled that the provision under consideration is mandatory, the inquiry remaining seems to be, What is the consequence of disobedience to the mandate of the constitution? Is the proposed adoption of the amendment nullified, or is the disobedience of the constitution to be treated as simply an omission by the secretary of state? A constitution differs from a statute in that a statute must provide the details of the subject of which it treats, whereas a constitution states general principles, and builds the substantial foundation and general framework of the law and government. It is true that it is a subject of general remark that the modern tendency of constitution makers is to somewhat depart from this practice; but the distinction between a statute and a constitution, as above suggested, certainly remains, and it is still true that constitutions do not generally descend into details. But when we find this practice departed from, and we observe a constitution going into details, such action is significant. Again referring to the eminent constitutional authority above quoted, we repeat: "It is the province of an instrument of this solemn and permanent character to establish those fundamental maxims and fix those unvarying rules by which all departments of the government must at all times shape their conduct; and if it descends to prescribing mere rules of order in unessential matters it is lowering the proper dignity of such an instrument, and usurping the proper province of ordinary legislation. We are not, therefore, to expect to find in a constitution provisions which the people, in adopting it, have not regarded as of high importance, and worthy to be embraced in an instrument which, for a time at least, is to control alike the government and the governed, and to form a standard by which is to be measured the power which can be exercised as well by the delegate as by the sovereign people themselves. If directions are given respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power should be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only; and we impute to the people a want of due appreciation of the purpose and proper province of such an instrument when we infer that such directions are given to any other end." Pages 94, 95. Thus Judge Cooley holds that if we find in a constitution that which some may undertake to argue should be held to be unessential, it was not intended to be unessential by the people in enacting the provision. See also Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 510, citing Koshler v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 554, and citing Cooley as above.

The Kansas supreme court, in a case before it, said: "The two important vital elements in any constitutional amendment are the assent of two thirds of the legislature and a majority of the popular vote. Beyond these, other provisions are mere machinery and forms. They may not be disregarded, because by them certainty as to the essentials is secured; but they are not themselves the essentials." Constitutional Prohibitory Amendment Cases, 24 Kan. 700. In reviewing this Kansas case, the supreme court of California uses the following language: "That the elements mentioned by the learned justice are important and vital cannot be doubted, but that they are the only important and vital elements cannot be conceded. The learned court here assumes, without any reason, that entering on the journals is not vital and important. The convention which framed the constitution of Kansas, and the people who adopted it and made it their paramount law, thought otherwise. This is plainly apparent from their inserting other elements in their constitution. It would be a rash assertion, and one which no sound principle of constitutional law sustains, that the words, 'such proposed amendments . . . shall be entered on the journal,' were inserted in the constitution of Kansas to be observed or not, as the legislature or any other department of the government of that state should think proper. If this is form and machinery, it is form and machinery established by the constitution. It is not unsubstantial and non-essential, but a part of the instrument, which all officers are sworn to support, as much as any other portion of the constitution: for when an oath is taken to support the constitution it embraces the whole instrument. These provisions may not be disregarded, for the reason, says the court, that by them certainty as to essentials is secured. We can conceive of no stronger reason why they should be regarded by legislators and courts. The constitution makers inserted them for that reason. They, in effect, ordain and declare that no other mode or form of machinery is permissible to secure certainty in doing the act permitted. Declaring that those requirements are nonessential is in effect saying that the convention which framed the constitution, and the electors which ratified their action, spent their time in framing and inserting in their organic and paramount law nonessential and unimportant provisions." Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 499, 500. We also find the following language used by the supreme court of Alabama: "We entertain no doubt that to change the constitution in any other mode than by a convention every requisition which is demanded by the instrument itself must be observed, and the omission of any one is fatal to the amendment. We scarcely deem any argument necessary to enforce this proposition. The constitution is the supreme and paramount law. The mode by which amendments are to be made under it is clearly defined. It has been said that certain acts are to be done, certain requisitions are to be observed, before a change can be effected. But to what purpose are these acts required, or these requisitions enjoined, if the legislature, or any other department of the government, can dispense with them? To do so would be to violate the instrument which they are sworn to support, and every principle of public law and sound constitutional policy requires the courts to pronounce against every amendment which is shown not to have been made in accordance with the rules prescribed by the fundamental law." Collier v. Frierson, 24 Ala. 109.

In considering the provisions of our own constitution, and in the light of the decisions, we are clearly of the opinion that the requirement to publish notices of a proposed amendment for three months is not only mandatory, but that it is an essential provision, and that it must be obeyed. We may add further that it seems to us to be a prudent and expedient provision. This requirement of the constitution provides a method for amending that instrument. It is also provided that the constitution may be amended, or a new one compiled, by a convention. Const. art. 19, § 8. This method, of course, is not now under consideration. But it may be said with us as it was said in Pennsylvania: There are only three methods by which a constitution may be changed: First, the method by amendment, as provided in article 19, section 9; second, by convention, as provided by article 19, section 8; and, third, by revolution. Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 15 Am. Rep. 563. The first method was attempted. But that method was not followed as prescribed. Instead, another method was followed; that is, a method identical with that provided in article 19, section 9, except that the advertisement was for two weeks only, and not for three months. As remarked in California, the constitution framers ordain and declare that no other form or mode or machinery is permissible to secure certainty in doing the act permitted. It is also held in the Alabama case, above cited, that an amendment cannot be made by a method other than that provided. We therefore have this situation: The method for amendment is provided by the solemnity of the constitutional enactment, and another method of amendment has been attempted to be invoked. We can see no other result but that such attempt is nugatory, and of absolutely no avail. The California supreme court, in construing the provision that all of the constitution of that state should be mandatory and prohibitory, said: "We well add here that under our constitution no question can be made whether the provision in it for its amendment is mandatory or directory. That question is settled by the constitution itself, which ordains in the most solemn form and manner that each and all of its provisions are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words declared to be otherwise. Article 1, § 22. This section, in our judgment, not only commands that its provisions shall be obeyed, but that the disobedience of them is prohibited." Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 512. The Alabama case is also to the same effect,—that, if a method other than that provided is adopted, the attempt is nugatory. We also find it said in Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, § 483, as follows:

"It may, perhaps, be found generally correct to say that nullification is the natural and usual consequence of disobedience, and that where an act requires a thing to be done in a particular manner, that manner alone must be adopted." If it is held that the command to the secretary of state to publish a proposed amendment for a certain period is nonessential, and may be disregarded, why may not the legislative department of the government follow the same practice, and disregard the requirement that the proposed amendment shall be voted for by two thirds of the members elected to each house, or the requirement that the proposed amendment, with the ayes and nays of each house, shall be entered in full on their respective journals? If one requirement is nonessential, why is not another? And who is to say what is essential and what is not? And by what rules are such distinctions to be made? The constitution does not itself make them. The framers of that instrument made no distinction in the requirements. They made them all mandatory; and, if a court commences to nullify their commands by construction, we do not know where the court would commence, or where it would end, or where it would draw the line which the constitution says shall not be drawn.

We have felt wholly satisfied that the omission to publish the proposed amendment, as required by the constitution, is fatal to its adoption; but we have considered the question at perhaps some length, and have quoted from the authorities with much liberality because this is the first time that such a question of construction has been before us. We cannot but be of opinion, with Judge Cooley, that we would be treading upon extremely dangerous ground were we to hold that a solemn constitutional provision was simply directory and nonessential when we face the express mandatory language of the provision, and also the additional and separate command of the constitution that the provision is mandatory. The command of the constitution is in no uncertain voice. We cannot misunderstand it. We cannot do other than render to it the obedience which our duty demands. It provides that an amendment may be adopted by certain methods. Those methods were not employed. Another method was resorted to. That method accomplished nothing. The amendment was not adopted. There being no amendment to the constitution, there are no offices of county commissioners in Lewis and Clarke county to be filled at the election to be held in November, 1894, and there is therefore no duty enjoined by law upon the county clerk and recorder of that county to file any alleged certificates of nomination for such offices.

The writ of mandamus is therefore dismissed.

The authorities directly in point upon the question of the rights of one who commits murder for property are all referred to in the above opinion, in the one handed down after the first hearing which is reported in 10 L. R. A. 810, in Biggs v. Palmer (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 340, or in the note which is appended to the latter case.

The text-books upon statutory construction which have touched the question agree that there will be no presumption of an intention to repeal the common law. Endlich, Stat. Constr. § 127; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 120, 290; Bishop, Written Law, § 142.

Chancellor Kent says: "Statutes are likewise to be construed in reference to the principles of the common law; for it is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to make any innovation upon the common law further than the case absolutely required. This has been the language of the courts in every age; and when we consider the constant, vehement, and exalted eulogy which the ancient sages bestowed upon the common law as the perfection of reason, and the brightest and noblest inheritance of the subject we cannot be surprised at the great sanction given to this rule of construction." 1 Kent, Com. 464.

Sedgwick does not appear to have noticed the question of presumed repeal of the common law but devotes some space to the question of liberal or strict construction of statutes in derogation of the common law (Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. p. 817), which if bearing upon the question at all can be regarded as simply furnishing a guide to determine how strong in case of the enactment of a statute covering a common-law subject, the language must be to effect a repeal of the common law.

There is no question that the maxim, nemo commodum capere potest de injuria sua propria, no one is able to take advantage of his own wrong, is part of the common law.

Broom classes it among the fundamental legal principles. Broom, Legal Maxims, p. 209.

Coke says: "It is a maxim of law that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong." Co. Litt. 148 B. In Findon v. Parker, 11 Mees. & W. 680, 12 L. J. Exch. 444, 7 Jur. 908, Lord Abinger, C. B., says: "Every man who has been in a court of law has heard the maxim, no man shall take advantage of his own wrong.

I take it to be a universal principle of law and justice, that no man can take advantage of his own wrong. Best, J., Doe v. Banks, 4 Barn. & Ad. 409, Gow. 220.

Blackstone, in his classification of the common law, recognizes established rules and maxims as one of the branches. 1 Bl. Com. 68.

The question then arises, Will a fundamental principle of the common law be repealed by a statute which is simply prescribing a rule of action upon an entirely different subject, with reference to which the principle may have only occasional and accidental application, when the statute does not notice the general principle and there is nothing in the subject to suggest the question of the applicability to it of such principle?

The answer furnished by the text-writers quoted above is "no," and such, as will be seen by the authorities cited infra, is the answer given by the courts.

The subjects are few upon which a complete rule can be formulated in one short legislative session. And unless the formulated rule can be supplemented by existing law the progress will be backward instead of forward.

In the language of Sir Matthew Hale approved by Chancellor Kent: "Where the subject of any law is single, the prudence of one age may go far at one essay to provide a fit law; and yet, even in the wisest provisions of that kind, experience shows us that new and unthought-of emergencies often happen, that necessarily require new supplements, abatements, or explanations. But the body of laws that concern the common justice applicable to a great kingdom is vast and comprehensive, consists of infinite particulars, and must meet with various emergencies, and therefore requires much time, and much experience, as well as much wisdom and prudence, successively to discover defects and inconveniences, and to apply apt supplements and remedies for them; and such are the common laws of England, namely, the production of much wisdom, time, and experience." Preface to Rolle's Abridgement, 1 Kent, Com. 472.

Refusing to presume the repeal of a fundamental principle of the common law by a statute upon a subject which requires no notice to be taken of such principle is vastly different from engrafting an exception upon the statute.

As stated by the Rhode Island court when speaking of the statute of limitations: "There is a wide distinction between ingrafting an exception into a statute by construction, and construing it according to its obvious intent. The rule laid down by Blackstone of considering the old law, the mischief, 25 L. R. A.

An opinion was filed in this case on the 2d day of January, 1891. Subsequently a rehearing was granted, and thereon renewed arguments were made, and the case was again submitted. No controversy is now made as to the applicability of section 30, chap. 28, Comp. Stat. This question was finally settled by the opinion already filed, which is found reported in 81 Neb. 61. The simplification thus accomplished has left but one question for consideration. This arose upon the demurrer, from which fact it is rendered necessary to state as concisely as possible the facts pleaded. The petition was filed by Frank T. Ransom and John C. Watson, as plaintiffs, against Joseph L. Shellenberger, as defendant. In brief, this petition contained the averments that Emma Shellenberger, the owner of the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  section 5, and the remedy, when applied to this statute, shows that its purpose was to out off those cases whose prosecution would, or might, result in fraud. It was clearly not intended to thwart the fundamental maxim that no one may take advantage of his own wrong. Hence, if one by fraud conceals the fact of a right of action for six years, it is not engrafting an exception on the statute to say he is not protected thereby, but it is simply saying he never was within it, since the protection was never designed for such as he." Reynolds v. Hennessy, 17 R. I. 174.

In Fleming v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 27 Minn. 111, it appeared that a statute required railroad companies to maintain fences and cattleguards, and provided if they failed to do so they should be liable for all damages sustained by any person in consequence of such failure or neglect. A railroad employé was injured by the derailment of a train coming in contact with a cow on the track, and the rule that he had assumed the risk was held to apply. The court states that the design of the statute was to impose a general liability upon a corporation operating a railroad without a fence, subject to such qualification as the settled rules of law impose in such cases. Nothing short of an explicit declaration to the contrary, or at least exclusive implication, would warrant a different conclusion.

And the rule as above stated has been almost universally applied by the courts. The ground of the decision has not always been clearly perceived or stated, and in some few cases the rule has been lost sight of entirely so that different principles were applied. But the course of decision has been broad and strong against permitting a person to bring himself within the advantage of a statute by his own wrong.

Divorce statutes.

While it is true that in most statutes providing for divorce an exception is made in case the person seeking the divorce connived at the wrong, yet it is believed that a guilty plaintiff never profited by the absence of such exception. In Massachusetts it was distinctly held that—Connivance will bar a suit for divorce, although not so specified in the statute. Pierce v. Pierce, 3 Pick. 299, 15 Am. Dec. 210; Robbins v. Robbins, 140 Mass. 523, 54 Am. Rep. 488. The cases of connivance at adultery are collected in the note to Wilson v. Wilson (Mass.) 13 L. R. A. 524.

In the following cases there is nothing to show that any statutory exception prevented granting the divorce:

When husband and wife are each seeking a divorce and are in part delicto—the conduct of each being a constant aggravation to further offense by township 7 N. range 14 E. of the sixth P. M., died intestate, leaving as her sole heirs-at-law her husband, Leander Shellenberger, and her two children, Maggie Shellenberger and Joseph L. Shellenberger; that upon her death the said land descended to her husband, Leander Shellenberger, during his life, during which time he was tenant of said land by his right of curtesy, Maggie and Joseph L. being entitled to the remainder after his death; that on April 29, 1886, Maggie Shellenberger died intestate, leaving as her only heir her father, Leander Shellenberger, whereupon Joseph L. Shellenberger and Leander Shellenberger became tenants in common of the aforesaid property; that on May 8, 1886, said Leander Shellenberger, and his wife, Miranda Shellenberger, by warranty deed duly conveyed their interest in said real property to plaintiffs, the same being, as alleged, the life estate of Leander and the undivided one half of the remaining estate; that on the 23d day of July, 1887, said Leander Shellenberger departed this life, whereupon plaintiffs and Joseph L. Shellenberger became the owners of said land as tenants in common. There were other allegations, made with the view of demonstrating the necessity of a partition. The prayer was as follows: "The plaintiffs therefore pray for judgment confirming the shares of the parties as above set forth, and for a partition of said real estate according to the respective rights of the parties interested therein, or, if the same cannot be equitably divided, that the premises may be sold, and the proceeds thereof divided between the parties according to their respective rights, and for such other relief as equity may require." The initial averments of the answer were in denial of each the other—the court ought not to interfere at the instance of either. Cate v. Cate, 53 Ark. 484.

In the struggles for supremacy, or to vent spleen, spite, or hatred the willing actors may fight out the battles of wedded life, but they cannot invoke the aid of the court for a divorce, after their own efforts have failed. Beckley v. Beckley, 23 Or. 228.

In Blurook v. Blurook, 4 Wash. 496, a divorce on the ground of "cruelty" was denied, where it appeared that the cruelty was excited by the plaintiff's conduct.

Proof of any statutory cause for divorce uncondoned is a complete defense to a suit for divorce. Tillison v. Tillison, 63 Vt. 411.

A divorce for desertion will not be granted, where it appears that the one charged with desertion was crowded out of the house. Graham v. Graham, 153 Pa. 450.

Absence by a husband with the consent and in accordance with the desire of the wife will prevent an annulment of the marriage contract on her petition. Merriman v. Merriman, 3 Pa. Dist. Rep. 238.

Statutes of Limitation.

There never has been any question that in equity fraudulent concealment of the cause of action was a good reply to the statute of limitations.

There is some conflict as to when the statute begins to run in cases based on fraud.

But in case of active fraud in concealing a cause of action the courts after much vacillation have with great unanimity refused, as stated in Reynolds v. Hennessy, 17 R. L. 174, to permit the defendant to take advantage of his own wrong. In some states such conduct is expressly provided for by statute, but none of the cases arising under such statutes are given in this note.

In an early English case the plaintiff was given leave to amend his replication to set up fraud in avoidance of the statute of limitations. Bree v. Holbech, Dougl. 655.

But later cases regarded the expressions in that case as obiter and after several expressions by the English judges of opinions on both sides of the question it was decided in Imperial Gas Light & Coke Co. v. London Gas-Light Co., 10 Exch. 39, that fraudulent concealment of the cause of action was no ground for refusing to apply the statute, and a similar ruling was made in Hunter v. Gibbons, 1 Hurlst. & N. 459, 26 L. J. Exch. 1, 2 Jur. N. S. 1249.

The question subsequently came before a higher English court and it was held that reply of fraudulent concealment was good. Gibbs v. Guild, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 59, 51 L. J. Q. B. 818, 45 L. T. N. S. 243, 30 Week. Rep. 691. In that case which was after the passage of the English judicature act consolidated L. R. A.

dating law and equity, the majority of the court doubted the correctness of the cases of Imperial Gas-Light & Coke Co. v. London Gas-Light Co., and Hunter v. Gibbons, supra, and Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., said: "I do not agree that courts have engrafted an exception upon the statute of limitations. . . . If by engrafting an exception on the statute is meant that a court of equity prevents a particular person from taking advantage of the statute, then, no doubt, that is true, but if it is meant that a court of equity by what is done has altered the terms of the statute, then, with great respect, I demur to it. . . . Courts of equity deal with the statute of limitations as they do with every other legal right, whether existing by statute or common law, not by abrogating it, but by saying on principles well understood in those courts, that in some particular cases it is unjust that a party shall be allowed to exercise those rights. . . . that where the existence of the cause of action is concealed from the person who ought to take advantage of it, by the fraud of the person who creates it, such person shall not take advantage of the wrong which he himself has done."

In this country the courts have been equally positive in their assertions.

The general principle of natural justice and of positive law that precludes a party from deriving a benefit from his own wrong has from an early period been applied by courts, both of law and equity, to the construction of statutes of limitations. It has accordingly been repeatedly held that a party should not be permitted by lapse of time during which he has by his own fraud prevented the party whom he has injured from asserting his rights at law; and that he against whom the statutory bar is interposed may avoid it by showing that he has been kept in ignorance of his claim until within the period limited by law for bringing his suit, by the fraudulent practices of the party setting up the defense. Way v. Cutting, 20 N. H. 137.

In Kane v. Cook, 8 Cal. 449, the court, in holding that in all cases a fraudulent concealment of the fact upon the existence of which a cause of action accrued, is a good answer to the plea of the statute of limitations, said: "To hold that the statute of limitations ran against them under such circumstances would be to permit the defendant to take advantage of his own wrong; and to sustain a defense which in good conscience he ought not to be permitted to avail himself of." Statutes of limitations were not intended to protect a party who has by fraudulent concealment delayed the assertion of a right against him until the expiration of the period limited by the statute.

In Bailey v. Glover, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 342, 23 L. ed. 636, the court said: "To hold that by concealing a and every allegation of the petition, except as in said answer the same should be expressly and specifically admitted. Following this denial, the answer was in this language: "That on or about the — day of, — 18—, said Emma Shellenberger died intestate, seised of the premises, leaving as her sole heirs at-law the defendant, Joseph L. Shellenberger, and Maggie Shellenberger, and her then husband, Leander Shellenberger; and upon the death of the said Emma Shellenberger, the said land descended to the said Joseph L. Shellenberger and Maggie Shellenberger, her children and sole heirs-at-law, subject to the life estate of her husband, Leander Shellenberger, during his life, and said Leander became and was the tenant of said land by his right of curtesy, with the remainder after his death to the defendant and Maggie Shellenberger. That on or about the 27th day of April, 1886, the said Leander Shellenberger willfully, feloniously, and of his deliberate, premeditated malice, did kill and murder his daughter, Maggie Shellenberger, and she then and there died intestate and without issue, leaving her father, Leander Shellenberger, who murdered her for the purpose of possessing himself of her estate and title in fee simple to the land aforesaid; and said plaintiffs claim that, by and through said murder, and the death of said Maggie Shellenberger, the said Leander Shellenberger became a tenant in common of said premises with the survivor, Joseph L. Shellenberger. That on or about the 1st day of May, 1886, the said Leander Shellenberger was arrested and charged with the murder of said Maggie Shellenberger. That the said complainants herein, well knowing of the facts, and being attorneys at law, undertook the defense of fraud, or by committing a fraud in such manner that it conceals itself until such time as the party committing the fraud could plead the statute of limitations to protect it, is to make the law, which was designed to prevent fraud, the means by which it is made successful and secure."

Where a debtor promised to confess judgment at a certain term of court, if suit was not brought, so as to save expenses, and delayed doing so until the last day of the term when he announced his intention not to do so, the court refused to permit him to take advantage of his action to bring his case within the statute of limitations, saying that to countenance such chicanery as the making and violating of such an agreement as this would invite into the sacred precincts of a court of justice the arts of the deceitful, and furnish forth a well-appointed place and secure mode of perpetrating frauds. Newton v. Carson, 80 Ky. 309.

In Munson v. Hollowell, 26 Tex. 475, 84 Am. Dec. 582, the court says that it is a general principle that no one would be permitted in a court of justice to claim protection by means of his own fraud, and holds that, in view of the course of decisions upon the subject, enforcing that principle in case of fraudulent concealment of a cause of action is not engrafting an additional exception to the meaning of the statute of limitations which the legislature did not think proper to make. That case was followed in Hudson v. Wheeler, 84 Tex. 387; Andrews v. Smithwick, Id. 544; Brown v. Brown, 61 Tex. 45; Calhoun v. Burton, 64 Tex. 510. The defendant cannot take advantage of his own wrong to bar the action. Hughes v. First Nat. Bank of Waynesburg, 110 Pa. 423.

Where a former slave was induced by the fraud of her former master, and in ignorance of her rights, to continue to labor for him without pay, her action for wages is not barred by the statute of limitations prior to her discovery of the fraud. Hickam v. Hickam, 46 Mo. App. 496.

Fraudulent concealment of the conversion of bank notes will prevent the running of the statute against an action of trover. Arnold v. Scott, 2 Mo. 13, 22 Am. Dec. 433.

In Richardson v. Jones, 3 Gill & J. 163, 22 Am. Dec. 293, which was a proceeding in equity, the court says: "Applicant cannot expect to avail himself of a lapse of time brought about by his own improper conduct."

The probate of a will will not be barred by the twenty years' statute of limitations, in case its existence is fraudulently concealed. Denke, Appellant, 80 Me. 50.

Where the person, against whom a cause of action exists in favor of another by fraud or actual fraudulent concealment, prevents such other from obtaining knowledge thereof, the statute of limitations will only commence to run from the time the right of action is, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence may have been, discovered. Carrier v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 6 L. R. A. 799, 79 Iowa, 80.

In First Massachusetts Turnp. Corp. v. Field, 3 Mass. 204, 3 Am. Dec. 124, the court says: "We should violate a sound rule of law if we permitted defendant to avail himself of his own fraud to bar the action by the statute of limitations."

In Sherwood v. Sutton, 5 Mason, 149, the refusal to permit advantage to be taken of the statute of limitations in case of the fraudulent concealment of the cause of action was treated as an exception to the statute; but Justice Story, who delivered the opinion, recognizes the ground upon which the case of First Massachusetts Turnp. Corp. v. Field, 3 Mass. 204, 3 Am. Dec. 124, was put, that the court would violate a sound rule of law if it permitted defendant to avail himself of his own fraud.

Fraudulent concealment of the cause of action will prevent the running of the statute. Vance v. Mottley, 92 Tenn. 310; Sankey v. McElvey, 104 Pa. 265, 49 Am. Rep. 575; Booner Dist. Twp. v. Frenoh, 40 Iowa, 601; Findley v. Stewart, 46 Iowa, 655; Wilder v. Secor, 72 Iowa, 161; Cook v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 9 L. R. A. 764, 81 Iowa, 551; Lewis v. Denison, 22 Wash. L. Rep. 191; Koenthal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 185, 23 L. ed. 395; Persons v. Jones, 12 Ga. 371, 58 Am. Dec. 478; Re Lands Allotment Co. [1894] 1 Ch. 616; Campbell v. Vining, 23 Ill. 525; Cole v. McGilthry, 9 Me. 131; McKown v. Whitmore, 31 Me. 448; Downs v. Harris, 75 Ga. 384; Bradford v. McCormick, 71 Iowa, 129; Harrisburg Bank v. Forster, 8 Watts, 12; Bowman v. Sanborn, 18 N. H. 205; Jones v. Conoway, 4 Yestas, 109; Glenn v. Cuttle, 2 Grant, Cas. 273; Fleming v. Culbert, 46 Pa. 496; Wickersham v. Lee, 83 Pa. 416; Morgan v. Tener, 83 Pa. 306; Ferris v. Henderson, 12 Pa. 49, 51 Am. Dec. 580.

Some of the courts, which at first decided the other way subsequently came to recognize the rule.

Thus in Mississippi fraudulent concealment at first appears to be no bar. Dozier v. Ellis, 28 Miss. 730.

But the court is not so positive in Fears v. Sykes, 35 Miss. 633.

And in Edwards v. Gibbs, 39 Miss. 166, it is distinctly ruled that fraudulent concealment will bar the running of the statute.

So in Tennessee it was at first held that fraudulent concealment does not make an exception to the statute of limitations. Cocke v. McGinnis, 1 Mart. & Y. 361, 17 Am. Dec. 809.

But it was subsequently decided that the statute will not run in case of fraud which has been said Shellenberger, and, to secure them for their said services, the said Leander Shellenberger did, on or about the third day of May, 1886, with his wife, Miranda Shellenberger, duly convey to the plaintiffs, by warranty deed, duly executed, their interest in said premises, being the estate, as claimed by the complainants, for life of Leander Shellenberger, and one undivided one half of the remainder. That shortly thereafter the said Leander Shellenberger was indicted and charged with the murder of said Maggie Shellenberger, and such proceedings were had in said cause, in the state of Nebraska, against Leander Shellenberger, indicted for the murder of his daughter, the said Maggie Shellenberger, that at the November term of the district court, sitting within and for Otoe county, in the year 1886, he was convicted and sentenced for said murder, which sentence and judgment of the court remain unreversed in said court. That afterwards, and on or about the 23d day of July, 1887, the said Leander Shellenberger was . . . hanged. And the defendant, herein answering charges and avers the fact to be that the said plaintiffs in said petition, at the time they took a conveyance of said premises from said Leander Shellenberger and wife, well knew the facts that the said Leander Shellenberger came to the said lands by the murder of his child, Maggie Shellenberger, and well knew all the proceedings in said court resulting in his conviction, the judgment, and sentence; and this defendant, herein answering, says that the said Leander Shellenberger could acquire no estate, interest, or right or title in and to the lands in controversy by and through his act of the murder of Maggie Shellenberger; and this defendant, in further fraudulently concealed. Shelby v. Shelby, 1 Coke, (Tenn.) 179, 5 Am. Dec. 686; Reeves v. Dougherty, 7 Yerg. 222, 27 Am. Dec. 608.

So in Virginia in Callis v. Waddy, 2 Munf. 511, it was held that a replication of undiscovered fraud was not a sufficient defense to a plea of the statute of limitations, but in Vanbibber v. Beirne, 6 W. Va. 168, the court speaking of Callis v. Waddy, supra, says that the court in that case decided that a replication that the fraud came to plaintiff's knowledge within the limitation period is not good, but that where "plaintiff replied that the cause of action was fraudulently concealed from plaintiff until within five years next before action brought" it was good.

And in Rice v. White, 4 Leigh, 474, the opinion of the justices seems to be to the effect that fraudulent concealment, if properly pleaded, would be a good defense to the statute of limitations.

While in Bagland v. Owen, 84 Va. 227, the plaintiff set up fraudulent concealment of the cause of action in avoidance of a plea of the statute of limitations, and the court dismissed the case on the ground that the proof did not sustain the replication.

Some of the federal courts were inclined to refuse to permit an answer of concealed fraud to prevent the running of the statute.

There is no provision in the bankrupt act for the case of concealment of cause of action, and the court can make no exception on that account. Freelander v. Holloman, 9 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 381.

In Andrews v. Dole, 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 361, the opinion of the court is against engrafting an exception on the statute of limitations.

But those decisions have been superseded by subsequent decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Bailey v. Glover, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 842, 22 L. ed. 636; Rosenthal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 186, 28 L. ed. 385.

Some cases which are apparently adverse are not so in fact.

In Smith v. Bishop, 9 Vt. 110, 31 Am. Dec. 607, the court refused to consider the effect of fraudulent concealment of the cause of action upon the running of the statute of limitations, stating that admitting that a fraudulent concealment would have the effect of preventing the running of the statute, still that concealment must be of facts essential to the action, which was not shown in that case.

Merely silence is not fraudulent concealment. Bates v. Preble, 151 U. S. 149, 38 L. ed. 106.

The federal courts will follow the rule in the state courts as to the statute of limitations. Andrews v. Redfield, 98 U. S. 225, 25 L. ed. 158; United States v. Maillard, 4 Ben. 459. 25 L. R. A.

Exceptions cannot be engrafted on the statute of non-claim against decedent's estate. Yulestra v. Tarleton, 67 A'a. 126.

In that case the concealment was by deceased so that the actual defendant was not guilty of wrong within the rule.

Effort on the part of defendant to avoid service of process is not sufficient to prevent the running of the statute. Amy v. Watertown, 180 U. S. 320, 32 L. ed. 958.

Fraudulent concealment of the person of the debtor cannot be made an exception to the statute. Chemical Nat. Bank v. Klesane, 32 Fed. Rep. 423.

Defendant's concealment of himself is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute. Miller v. Lesser, 71 Iowa, 147.

Hiding under an assumed name will not prevent the running of the statute. Engel v. Fischer, 108 N. Y. 400, 55 Am. Rep. 818.

The above four cases while very close to the line are not strictly within the rule because in every one the concealment or evasion would have been unsuccessful if plaintiff had used the remedies at his command.

There are, however, a few cases directly opposed to those cited supra.

In Troup v. Smith, 20 Johns. 83, the leading case holding the contrary doctrine, the counsel argued that to permit defendant, who has by his own fraudulent concealment prevented the plaintiff from discovering his cause of action to plead the statute in bar would be repugnant to the clearest principles of law and equity. The court said: Courts of equity are perfectly right in saying that a party cannot in good conscience avail himself of the statute when by his own fraud he has prevented the other party from coming to a knowledge of his rights. But "I know of no dispensing power which courts of law possess arising from any cause whatever, and it seems to me that when the legislature" makes certain exceptions to the statute "it would be an assumption of legislative authority to introduce any other provisions." The court then states that the evidence shows no fraudulent concealment, but that the decision is placed upon the ground that the court sitting as a court of law is bound by the express provisions of the statute, and, even if it existed, could not notice the fraud so as to take the case out of the statute. That case has been uniformly followed in subsequent New York cases. Leonard v. Pitney, 5 Wend. 30; Allen v. Mills, 17 Wend. 302; Humbert v. Trinity Church, 24 Wend. 537.

In Somerset County Freeholders v. Veghte, 44 N. J. L. 509, the court in deciding that concealed fraud was not available to remove the bar of the statute of limitations, says that the plaintiff has a answering, says that the said Leander Shellenberger did willfully, maliciously, and of his premeditated malice kill and murder the said Maggie Shellenberger, . . . for the sole purpose of removing her from this life, that he might inherit the lands which descended to her by and through the death of her mother; and the defendant, in further answering, says that it is contrary to the law of the land that any should be permitted to come to an estate or an inheritance by their own willful act of murder; and the said defendant, further answering, says that the said Leander Shellenberger could take no estate from the said Maggie Shellenberger, whose death he had compassed and produced, and that he took no estate to himself, and conveyed none to the said plaintiffs herein, and the said plaintiffs acquired no right, title, or interest in and to the said estate by and through the death of said Maggie Shellenberger, caused by said Leander Shellenberger, as hereinbefore alleged. The said defendant therefore prays that this court will order a judgment and decree that the said Leander Shellenberger took no estate from the said Maggie Shellenberger, whose death was by him compassed and produced by willful murder, and that the said estate upon her death, and her interest in said estate upon her death, caused by the willful murder of the said Leander Shellenberger, descended to this defendant, and the said Leander Shellenberger took nothing by and through his act of willful murder of his own daughter, and for such other and further relief in the premises as equity and good conscience shall decree. O. P. Mason, Guardian ad Litem for Joseph L. Shellenberger."

To this answer plaintiffs demurred, on the complete remedy in equity, and that the counsel has not favored the court with any theory on which the contention that the exception is available at law could be rested on a logical basis. It nowhere appears, however, that the question of the repeal of the common-law maxim was brought to the attention of the court.

A court of law cannot introduce an exception to the statute of limitations which the legislature has not authorized. Fee v. Fee, 10 Ohio, 469, 36 Am. Dec. 108; Miles v. Berry, 1 Hill, L. 298; Clarke v. Reeder, 1 Speers, L. 306; Simons v. Fox, 12 Rich. L. 392; Baines v. Williams, 25 N. C. 451; Hamilton v. Shepperd, 7 N. C. 115.

In neither of the cases holding the contrary doctrine, however, does it appear that the question of implied repeal of the common-law maxim was brought to the attention of the court.

And the New York court had held that a defendant cannot "return into the state" so as to set the statute running by coming clandestinely with an intent to defraud the creditor by setting the statute in operation and then departing again. Fowler v. Hunt, 10 Johns. 464.

Statutes against foreign corporations.

In the case of statutes prohibiting foreign corporations from doing business in the state until the performance of certain conditions precedent, the great weight of authority is to the effect that the corporation itself will not be permitted to set up the fact that it never complied with the requirements for the purpose of defeating recovery upon contracts which it has entered into. Such is the rule with reference to insurance companies when sued on policies. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (Ind.) 20 L. R. A. 405, note. And it has also been held to be true with regard to corporations generally. See note to Edison General Electric Co. v. Canadian Pacific Nav. Co. (Wash.) 24 L. R. A. 821. There is some distinction to be made in cases upon this subject, as some of the courts hold that the contracts are not void when made by such companies, but merely not enforceable by them until they comply with the statute, but the courts which hold the contracts void, so far as suits by the corporation are concerned, refuse to permit the corporation to take advantage of the illegality.

In Berry v. Knights Templars & Masons Life Indemnity Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 430, an insurance company which had not complied with the law of the state where it attempted to do business, set up such failure as a defense to a suit on a policy, but the court held that the defense was not good, on the ground that it could reap no advantage from its own wrong.

Statute compelling railroad company to carry baggage free.

A statute provided that every passenger on a railway train should be entitled to carry a certain amount of baggage free. The railway company advertised an excursion at reduced fare if the passengers carried no baggage. Plaintiff purchased an excursion ticket, and then placed baggage on board, and the company claimed the right to toll for carrying it. Plaintiff insisted on the right to free carriage under the statute, but the court held that he was not entitled to it. Wiles, J., placed his ruling upon the ground that no one would be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, and that getting the baggage on board while having only an excursion ticket was a fraud on the company. Rumsey v. North Eastern R. Co. 14 C. B. N. S. 641, 32 L. J. Q. P. 244, 10 Jur. N. S. 208, 8 L. T. N. S. 606, 11 Week. Rep. 611.

Statute avoiding auction sales when duty unpaid.

A purchaser cannot rescind his own contract at an auction on the ground that he has refused to pay the auction duty pursuant to the condition of sale, notwithstanding the statute provides that in case of such refusal the bidding shall be null and void to all intents and purposes. Malins v. Freeman, 4 Bing. N. C. 395.

Statute of frauds.

The cases are so numerous which have held that fraud is not within the statute of frauds that no attempt will be made here to examine those upon the general subject further than to show the generality of the expressions. But there is one branch of that subject which is peculiarly in point. Whenever a contract is not put in writing because of the fraud or influence of one of the parties he is not permitted to reap an advantage because of that fact.

As examples of the sweeping language in which courts have expressed themselves upon the question of using the statute of frauds to protect fraud the following may be quoted:

Viner states (5 Abr. 523, pl. 40) that where the statute of frauds has been used to cover a fraud the court has always relieved.

The statute of frauds cannot be set up as a protection to fraud. Kinard v. Hiers, 3 Rich. Eq. 423, 55 Am. Dec. 643.

The statute of frauds cannot be used as a cover to protect the perpetration of fraud. Teague v. Fowler, 56 Ind. 569; Lincoln v. Wright, 4 DeG. & J. 16, 5 Jur. N. S. 1142.

Fraud is not within the statute of frauds. Rogers v. Rogers, 37 Mo. 257; Green v. Green, 84 Kan. 740, 55 Am. Rep. 256.

The statute of frauds cannot be used as an in-ground that it "did not state the facts sufficiently to constitute a defense to the said plaintiffs' cause of action." This demurrer was sustained, and, the defendant having elected to stand on his answer, judgment was rendered for such relief as was prayed in plaintiffs' petition, and appointing referees to make partition accordingly. These referees reported that partition could not be advantageously made of the property in kind, whereupon it was ordered sold, and that the proceeds of the sale should be divided between the parties plaintiff of one part, and the defendant of the other part. The defendant Joseph L. Shellenberger, by his guardian ad litem, as plaintiff in error, then brought the case to this court for a review of the ruling on the aforesaid demurrer and the judgment which logically followed it. In the answer it was alleged, as will be noticed by reference to the quotation just made, that plaintiffs, well knowing the facts, and to secure payment of their fees as attorneys at law in the defense of said Leander Shellenberger, received the conveyance by virtue of which they claim to be vested with the title to one half of the property in question. This averment, admitted as it is by the demurrer, does away with the argument attempted as respecting the rights of bona fide purchasers. Under the circumstances charged, and admitted to be true, for the purposes of the demurrer, the defendants in error are vested with no higher or better rights than could be asserted by Leander Shellenberger in his own behalf. The naked question presented is whether or not the murder of an intestate by one to whom ordinarily, as heir, the property would have descended, formed an exception to the statutory rules of inheritance.

strument for fraud. Barnard v. Flinn, 8 Ind. 204; Leahy v. Leahy, 11 Mo. App. 413.

In cases of fraud equity should relieve even against the words of the statute. Montacute v. Maxwell, 1 P. Wms. 618, 1 Strange, 238; Maxwell v. Mountacute, Prec. in Ch. 526.

The statute of frauds was never intended to prevent a court of equity from giving relief in a case of plain, clear, and deliberate fraud. Haigh v. Kaye, L. R. 7 Ch. 469, 41 L. J. Ch. 567, 26 L. T. N. S. 675, 20 Week. Rep. 597.

The statute of frauds was never designed to aid a person in the perpetration of fraud. Turner v. Johnson, 95 Mo. 431.

a. Rule of construction.

It may be necessary to consider one statute on any subject as part of the whole law, statute and common, on that subject, as it is necessary to consider one section or word of the statute a part of that statute. The statute of frauds severed from all other laws, written and unwritten, and taken in its literal sense, would leave the people remediless in a great number of cases of fraud for which ample remedies are provided by the statute of equity jurisdiction. Hitchins v. Pettingill, 58 N. H. 386.

There can be no relief if the statute has positively said so. On the other hand, if that is not expressly declared, or the relief clearly excluded by the policy of the act, the equitable jurisdiction upon fraud exists. The court has interfered against a party meaning to make it an instrument of fraud, and said he should not take advantage of his own fraud, even though the statute declared that in case these circumstances do not exist the agreement should be absolutely void. Mestaer v. Gillespie, 11 Ves. Jr. 627.

b. Prevention of reduction to writing.

If the execution of the writing is prevented by the unfair practices of one of the parties he cannot insist that it is not in writing as a defense to an action on it. Lester v. Foxcroft, Colles, P. C. 108.

In Whitchurch v. Bevis, 2 Bro. Ch. 564, the lord chancellor said that he agreed that if one interposes the medium of fraud by which an agreement is prevented from being put into writing, the case is taken out of the statute of frauds.

Where a marriage agreement was fraudulently recovered from the beneficiary to whom it had been delivered and while out of his possession the marriage was consummated, it was re-established because of the fraud. Mallet v. Halfpenny, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 20, pl. 6, 2 Vern. 373. And in Bowdes v. Amburst, Prec. in Ch. 404, that case is referred to and the court states that it was insisted by defendant that the master of the rolls should observe the statute, and he said: "I do, I do."

Fraudulent omission to sign the marriage settlement is ground for relief. Dundas v. Dutens, 1 Ves. Jr. 196.

Whenever a case is infected with fraud, the court will not suffer the statute to protect it so that any one should run away with a benefit not intended. Reech v. Kennegal, 1 Ves. Sr. 123, 1 Wils. 227.

Equity will not permit the statute of frauds to be set up as a defense by a party infected with fraud. Arnold v. Cord, 16 Ind. 177.

An acknowledged exception to the statute is where the agreement is intended to be reduced to writing but is prevented by the fraud of one of the parties. Finucane v. Kearney, 1 Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 65.

Although in another Mississippi case, Box v. Stanford, 13 Smedes & M. 93, 61 Am. Dec. 142, the court refused to interfere in case of the fraudulent evasion of an agreement to put the contract in writing on the ground that it could engraft no exception on the statute.

But in the latter case there was nothing to show that refusing to carry out the agreement would amount to a fraud, and there are many cases which hold that mere refusal to comply with an agreement to put a contract in writing is not fraud.

c. Fraudulent omission of part of the agreement.

Some of the cases hold that fraudulent omission of part of the contract will authorize relief.

Where the deed is fraudulently made so as to omit a portion of the land bargained for, relief may be granted. McDonald v. Yungbluth, 46 Fed. Rep. 836.

One who puts the contract in writing and fraudulently leaves out a part of the agreement will not be permitted to benefit by the omission. Joyner v. Statham, 3 Atk. 389.

A decree may be made compelling the inclusion in a deed of land which has been fraudulently omitted therefrom. Beardale v. Duntley, 60 N. Y. 580.

A deed may be reformed for fraud. Worley v. Tuggle, 4 Bush, 152; Murray v. Dake, 48 Cal. 643.

The authorities do not all sustain the rule as broadly as the above cases. But none of the cases refuse to apply the maxim when it becomes applicable.

The difference of opinion upon this question goes no further than that some of the courts insist that to entitle the defrauded person to relief there must be some evidence that he has changed his possession in consequence of the fraud. Glass v. Hulbert, 108 Mass. 24, 3 Am. Rep. 418. But this does not at all deny the proposition that the statute

The opinion hereinbefore filed affirmed this proposition. Its correctness will now receive consideration.

Section 80, chap. 23, Comp. Stat., provides that "when any person shall die seised of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or of any rights thereto, or entitled to any interest therein in fee simple or for the life of another, not having lawfully devised the same, they shall descend subject to his debts in the manner following: . . . Second. If he shall have no issue his estate shall descend to his widow during her natural lifetime, and after her decease, to his father; and if he shall have no issue, nor widow, his estate shall descend to his father." This statute has regulated the descent of real property in this state at least since 1866, for it is found in the Revised Statutes of that date. In the former opinion, Cobb, Ch. J., said:

cannot be used to enable one to take advantage of his own wrong.

d. Preventing a will.

It has been uniformly held that one who by promises prevents the making of a will will not be permitted to take advantage of the omission.

In this connection attention is called to the enforcement by equity of trusts ex maleficio, notwithstanding the statute. Upon this subject see the authorities collected in the note to Brown v. Doane (Ga.) 11 L. R. A. 381.

Where a dying man was prevented from republishing his will by reason of the fraud and violence of the heir-at-law, the heir was not permitted to defeat a bill for the establishment of the will by stating that the will was not republished as required by the statute. Dixon v. Olmstead, 1 Cox, Eq. 414.

In a case where one to whom a dying person gave property upon the other's promise to do certain things with certain other property, and the one making the promise refused to perform it but filed a bill to get possession of the property given him, the court said: The defense may be said to be one arising from the fraud and imposition of the plaintiff and has nothing in the world to do with the statute of frauds and perjuries. Walker v. Walker, 2 Ark. 98.

A son procured his mother to prevail upon his father to revoke his will which made the mother executrix, and execute another making the son executor, upon the promise that he would hold in trust for the mother. The court, notwithstanding the statute of frauds, decreed a trust in favor of the mother. Thynn v. Thynn, 1 Vern. 296.

A promise to prevent the making of a will, will be enforced. Sellack v. Harris, 5 Vin. Abr. 31, p. 521 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. Cas. 11, p. 46; Oldham v. Litchfield, 2 Vern. 506, 2 Freem. 284.

There is a case in Ohio in which much of the reasoning is opposed to the principle underlying the authorities cited above.

In Kent v. Mahaffey, 10 Ohio St. 204, a blind testator called for his will which was brought to him by the beneficiary. Instructions were given for its destruction and the beneficiary pretending to comply with them fraudulently substituted for the will a paper which he threw into the fire and misled the testator into the belief that the will was destroyed. The court in accord with a class of cases to that effect, held that the will could not be considered as having been destroyed, and then held that the beneficiary guilty of the fraud could not be held to be a trustee for the heir-at-law. There is some discussion as to the effect of the beneficiary's fraud, but the question does not seem 35 L. R. A.

"The principle of these cases [Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 599, 29 L. ed. 1000, and Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 5 L. R. A. 340], especially that of Riggs v. Palmer, is applicable to the case at bar; their analogies are immediate and certain." As these two cases seem to have specially influenced the court in arriving at its former conclusion, a brief consideration and analysis of them will not be foreign to our purpose. Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong was an action brought by the administratrix of the estate of John M. Armstrong, deceased, upon a life insurance policy issued to said intestate. This policy was what is known as an endowment policy; that is, a policy payable to the assured if he live a designated time, but to some other person named if the assured should die before the expiration of that time. It was pay-to have been squarely presented or discussed as to whether or not the beneficiary could not have been prevented from taking any benefit under the will, and the will have been left to stand as though the beneficiary had died prior to the death of the testator.

e. The rule at law.

Before the passage of the statute of frauds of course there was nothing to prevent the enforcement of a parol promise at law.

In Rockwood's Case, Cro. Eliz. 164, and Dutton v. Pool, 1 Vent. 318, assumpsit was held to lie in case one who had promised a dying person to pay certain annuities refused to do so.

After the passage of that act relief against fraud seems to have been uniformly afforded but application for it has usually been had to equity. Under the modern procedure it would seem that the relief might be granted in any case if the pleadings were in proper form. However, in some actions at law the fraud has been made a ground for relief.

In Flagler v. Pleiss, 3 Rawle, 345, parol evidence was admitted in support of an action of ejectment to recover land which was fraudulently omitted from the deed, and of which the grantor had subsequently taken possession.

Where the title to certain lands was procured by fraud an action of assumpsit was sustained to recover the purchase price. Ayers v. Slifer, 89 Ind. 433.

In an action of ejectment to recover possession of land in the possession of a woman to whom her husband had promised to convey it in consideration of the marriage, by his son to whom the father had conveyed it in fraud of the rights of the wife, the court held that the wife should be permitted to succeed on her cross-complaint to have the property conveyed to her on the ground that where a fraudulent contrivance induces an irretrievable change of possession, equity will enforce the agreement. Peek v. Peek, 1 L. R. A. 185, 77 Cal. 106.

Statute providing for discharge in bankruptcy.

In a case where a debtor changed his name and then procured a discharge in bankruptcy without the knowledge of his creditor, who, after discovering the fraud, brought an action to reach property which was alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed to the debtor's wife, and the defendants pleaded the discharge, the court said: "It certainly could not have been the intention of the bankrupt act that whatever fraud or artifice the bankrupt might resort to for the purpose of keeping knowledge of the proceedings from a particular creditor, or preventing him from opposing able (subject to certain conditions) to the assured, or his assigns, on December 8, 1897, or, if he should die before that time, to his legal representatives. Within six weeks after the issue of the policy the assured was murdered, and suspicion fell upon one Hunter, who held an assignment of the aforesaid policy, and who had been very officious in procuring it to be issued to Armstrong. Upon a trial duly had, Hunter was convicted of the aforesaid murder, and was accordingly hanged. The company set up several defenses to the action, one of which was that the policy was obtained by Hunter with the intent to cheat and defraud the company by compassing the death of the assured by felonious means, and collecting the amount of the insurance,—a design which he attempted to carry out by causing the death of the assured. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, discussed the right of the company to show that Hunter had in like manner procured to be issued other policies of insurance in the same manner as he had procured the issue of the policy upon which a recovery was sought. No other discussion, except, incidentally, of the assignability of the policy, is to be found in the opinion of Justice Field, though in closing it he said: "But independently of any proof of the motives of Hunter in obtaining the policy, and even assuming that they were just and proper, he forfeited all rights under it when, to secure its immediate payment, he murdered the assured. It would be a reproach to the jurisprudence of the country if one could recover insurance money payable on the death of the party whose life he had feloniously taken; as well might he recover insurance money on a building which he had willfully fired." No representative of Hunter was a party to the suit, and the language quoted was, therefore, in so far as it referred to the rights of Hunter, mere obiter dictum.

them, the discharge should nevertheless be valid as to such creditor." It was argued that because the case was not provided for by the provisions of the bankrupt act no redress could be had, but the court said the more rational construction of the act is that the particular matters provided for by the act, and which go to annul the discharge in toto, should be litigated in the United States courts, and that the principles which prevailed before the passage of the act giving creditors protection in the courts in which the protection was claimed, against a discharge which the defendant ought not in law or morals to be permitted to set up against their particular claim, are not abrogated so long as their enforcement by the state courts does not interfere with the jurisdiction which has been specially reserved over certain classes of frauds; nor with the power of those courts to adjudge a discharge void as to all creditors. Pollon v. Lawrence, 77 N. Y. 208.

A discharge in bankruptcy obtained in proceedings of which a creditor was fraudulently deprived of notice, is not binding upon him. Batchelder v. Low, 43 Vt. 662, 5 Am. Rep. 811.

Statutes imposing liability for negligence.

Most of the cases in which liability is imposed for neglect of some imposed duty have turned more upon the particular language of the statute than upon the general principle. But as soon as the alleged contributory negligence approached nearly to positive wrong on the part of defendant the court speedily refused to permit plaintiff to obtain any advantage or if the language of the statute was thought to prevent such ruling the statute was held void as in the case of statutes imposing absolute liability for stock killed. See note to Matthews v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. ante, 161.

In Kroy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 32 Iowa, 300, the court in discussing the effect of a statute making railroad companies liable for injuries caused by its servants said: "It is scarcely necessary to allude to the elemental doctrine that one cannot recover for an injury which is the proximate result of his own failure to exercise ordinary care," and held that because of that doctrine there could be no recovery in that case although plaintiff was within the language of the statute.

An agent of a coal miner whose duty is to see that the provisions of a statute as to placing safety catches on machinery are complied with, which statute makes the company liable for injuries caused by absence of such catches cannot recover damages against the company for injuries caused to himself by reason of the absence of such catches. Beaucoup Coal Co. v. Cooper, 12 Ill. App. 373.

The provisions of the code that a railroad company shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person and caused by the locomotive of the company, when a bell is not sounded or a whistle blown as directed by the statute, does not abrogate the doctrine of contributory negligence. Meeks v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 52 Cal. 604.

In McKelvy v. Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co., 34 Iowa, 455, the court says: "Under a statute requiring a railroad company to do certain things, and providing that if injury occurs by reason of failure to do them the company shall be liable, and that proof of such failure shall be sufficient to warrant a recovery, there surely can be no recovery if a person intentionally drove off from a bank which the statute required the company to protect, and was killed."

It is not the intention of a statute making mining companies liable for injuries resulting from their failure to take certain precautions to avoid injuries, nor the policy of the law, to exempt any one from the direct and immediate consequences of his own carelessness. Spiva v. Osage Coal & Min. Co., 38 Mo. 68.

A statute making the owner of a threshing machine liable for injuries caused by failure to have certain parts of the machinery boxed, does not prevent the defense of contributory negligence. Reynolds v. Hindman, 32 Iowa, 146.

A statute making a railroad company liable for injuries caused by its negligence does not preclude the defense of contributory negligence. Whittier v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 24 Minn. 304.

Contributory negligence is a defense to an action for injuries occurring, where the railroad company has not maintained a statutory fence. Curry v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 43 Wis. 665.

A statute making railroad companies liable for injuries resulting from their failure to give signals at street crossings does not prevent the defense of contributory negligence. Pennsylvania Co. v. Rathgeb, 32 Ohio St. 66.

A statute making a railroad company liable for injuries caused by failing to give signals upon approaching a street crossing does not apply, if there was contributory negligence on the part of the injured person. Horn v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 54 Fed. Rep. 301.

In some of the cases the language of the statute is held to preclude the defense of contributory negligence.

The Tennessee statute making railroad com-

It may be that our statement, that the language above quoted was the only language which bore on the proposition which we have under consideration, should in a slight degree be qualified. That it may be literally exact, a quotation will be made of expressions used argumentatively by Justice Field in his discussion of the admissibility of the evidence of the contemporaneous conduct of Hunter, to which reference has heretofore been made. He said: "The assignment conveying to Hunter the whole interest of the assured, his representative, alone, would have a valid claim under it, if the policy were not void in its inception. Proof therefore, that he caused the death of the assured by felonious means must necessarily have defeated a recovery, and the court erred in refusing to admit testimony tending to prove that such was the fact." The language of Justice Field first above quoted, standing alone, is inapplicable to the facts stated in his opinion. From the statement of the case which he was discussing, considered in connection with the quotation from his opinion last made, it is evident that both his quotations had reference to the admissibility of proffered evidence of like contemporaneous conduct of Hunter. From his opinion, as an entirety, it is evident that proof of this conduct was deemed admissible because of the relationship of Hunter to the policy, independently of the assignment thereof to him. If, as it was claimed, the evidence showed that Hunter acted as the agent of the assured, or in the interest of the assured, in obtaining the issue of the policy in question, his own fraudulent conduct was rightfully considered in determining the validity of such policy as forming a basis for a recovery, no panies liable for damages done by failure to observe statutory precautions to avoid injury is held to be penal, and to exclude the question of contributory negligence, on the ground that it expressly states when the liability shall exist and when it shall not. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Foster, 88 Tenn. 671; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 6 Heisk. 174; Hill v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 323; Chattanooga R. Co. v. Walker, 11 Heisk. 353; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Nowlin, 1 Lea. 523; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Lea. 474; Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 12 L. R. A. 184, 89 Tenn. 370; Knoxville, C. G. & L. R. Co. v. Aouff, 92 Tenn. 28, although the negligence of the injured person is held by the court in those cases to be a ground of reduction of damages, and it may be such as to make them nominal. Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 24 L. R. A. 603, 61 Fed. Rep. 605.

Contributory negligence of a passenger is not a defense to the statute making a railroad company guilty of negligence, by reason of which is lost the life of a passenger or of any other person being in the exercise of due diligence, liable for such loss. Merrill v. Eastern R. Co. 139 Mass. 252; Com. v. Boston & L. R. Co. 134 Mass. 213; McKimble v. Boston & M. Railroad, 139 Mass. 542.

The absolute liability imposed on a railroad company for setting out fire cannot be defeated by a mere passive contributory negligence of plaintiff. West v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 654; Engle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 661.

The question of contributory negligence does not arise in an action under the statute to recover for stock killed by reason of failure to fence. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Brannegan, 5 Ind. App. 540.

Statutes giving dower.

A widow who induces a third person to purchase her deceased husband's lands with the assurance that her claim for dower is extinguished, and who then receives and uses her share of the purchase money, will not be permitted afterwards to claim her dower as against the purchaser. Wood v. Seely, 32 N. Y. 103.

Fraud will estop a widow from claiming her dower. Dougrey v. Topping, 4 Paige, 94, 3 L. ed. 337; Smiley v. Wright, 2 Ohio, 503; Ellis v. Diddy, 1 Ind. 551; Connolly v. Branstler, 3 Bush, 702, 96 Am. Dec. 273.

Estoppel generally.

A large part of the doctrine of estoppel in pais is founded upon this principle. And whenever the facts have called for the application the courts do not seem to have hesitated to apply the principle of estoppel against taking advantage of a statute.

In a Minnesota case in which one about to sell property had pointed out the division lines to the intending purchaser, and many years afterward he attempted to assert title beyond the line then pointed out, the court said the statute of frauds has not abrogated the doctrine of estoppel in pais as applied to purchasers of real estate. Bell v. Goodnature, 50 Minn. 417.

So it has been held that there may be an estoppel to set up the statute of limitations. Bricker v. Lightner, 40 Pa. 199.

But in a Mississippi case the court held that there can be no estoppel against setting up the statute of limitations. Crane v. French, 38 Miss. 529.

But that cannot be now regarded as true to the extent stated in view of the Mississippi decisions cited, supra.

Nebraska decisions.

In addition to the presumption against repeal of the common law there is an additional rule; to be noticed in connection with the case of SHIELLENBERGER V. RANSOM. Chapter 15 of the Revised Statutes of Nebraska provides that so much of the common law as is applicable and not inconsistent with any law passed or to be passed by the legislature is adopted and declared to be law. That practically made the maxim, no one shall take advantage of his own wrong, statutory law in Nebraska, and the question then arises whether or not a statute providing that if a person shall die leaving neither issue nor widow his estate shall descend to his father is so inconsistent with the maxim as to repeal it or prevent its taking effect. The two are certainly not inconsistent within the rule governing the repeal of statutes. See note to State v. Massey (N. C.) 4 L. R. A. 308.

The rule as to concealment delaying the running of the statute of limitations was recognized by the Nebraska court in Campbell v. Roe, 38 Neb. 345.

And in Burlington & M. & R. Co. v. Webb, 18 Neb. 215, 53 Am. Rep. 809, the court construed the railroad fence law as making the company liable for any and all damages which should be done to animals on the track by reason of such failure, and that it precluded the defense of mere contributory negligence, but the court said: "It may be said that this construction of the act would render the railroad company liable for injury to stock when the owner had driven them and left them upon the road. But when you consider the purpose of the act, and give it a reasonable construction, which such statutes require, no such conclusion necessarily follows. The maxim that 'no injustice is done to the consenting person, that is by a proceeding to which he assents' would then apply.

H. P. F.

matter though the action had been brought by the representative of the assured. As the language quoted was pertinent to the issues presented, and the rights of the parties depended on other theory, it must be assumed that upon this theory alone the case was decided. While this view renders the quoted language applicable to matters under discussion, it in equal degree renders it foreign to the facts of the case at bar. This court was, therefore, mistaken in assuming that the analogies of the case of Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong, supra, were, as applied to the case at bar, "immediate and certain."

The majority opinion in Riggs v. Palmer, supra, was, however, that upon which the former conclusion of this court was specially based. In the statement of that case it was said that "this action was brought to have the will of Francis B. Palmer, so far as it devises and bequeaths property to Elmer E. Palmer, canceled and annulled." The facts involved, as given by Earle, J., in delivering the majority opinion, were as follows: "On the 18th day of August, 1880, Francis B. Palmer made his last will and testament, in which he gave small legacies to his two daughters, Mrs. Riggs and Mrs. Preston, the plaintiffs in this action, and the remainder of his estate to his grandson, the defendant, Elmer E. Palmer, subject to the support of Susan Palmer, his mother; and that he gave over to the two daughters, subject to the support of Mrs. Palmer, in case Elmer should survive him and die under age, unmarried and without any issue. The testator, at the date of his will, owned a farm and considerable personal property; he was a widower, and thereafter, in March, 1882, he was married to Mrs. Breese, with whom, before his marriage, he entered into an antenuptial contract, in which it was agreed that, in lieu of dower and all other claims upon his estate, in case she survived him, she should have her support upon his farm during her life, and such support was expressly charged upon the farm. At the date of the will, and subsequently to the death of the testator, Elmer lived with him as a member of his family, and at his death was sixteen years old. He knew of the provisions made in his favor in the will, and that he might prevent his grandfather from revoking such provisions, which he had manifested some intention to do, and to obtain the speedy enjoyment of possession of his property, he willfully murdered him by poisoning him. He now claims the property, and the sole question for our determination is, Can he have it?" Much of the opinion of Judge Earle was devoted to a defense of what he calls "rational interpretation." Quoting from Rutherford's Institutes (page 420), he said: "When we make use of 'rational interpretations,' sometimes we restrain the meaning of the writer so as to take in less, and sometimes we enlarge its meaning so as to take in more, than his words express." In the former opinion filed in this case, there is quoted approvingly from the aforesaid majority opinion, delivered by Judge Earle, this language: "It is a familiar canon of construction that a thing which is within the intention of the makers of the statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter, and a thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute unless it be within the intention of the makers." The language just quoted was originally used with reference to the construction of a will, but was by Cobb, Ch. J., applied to our statute of descent. For this reason, it will hereinafter be considered as applied to statutory construction. The conclusion reached by the reasoning of Judge Earle in Riggs v. Palmer, as well as that in this case, was based very largely on that species of judicial legislation above characterized as rational construction. If courts can thus enlarge statutory enactments by construction, it may be that the references, in the majority opinion in Riggs v. Palmer, to the provisions of the civil law, were very apt as illustrating how, by rational interpretation, our statutes should be made to read. This reference to the civil law was as follows: "Under the civil law, evolved from the general principles of natural law and justice by many generations of jurisconsults, philosophers, and statesmen, one cannot take property by inheritance or will from an ancestor or benefactor whom he has murdered. Dom. Civ. Law, pt. 2, bk. 1, title 1, § 3; Code Napoleon, § 727; Mackeldy, Roman Law, 580-550. In the Civil Code of Lower Canada, the provisions on the subject in the Code Napoleon have been substantially copied." If our statutes of descent contained the above provisions, there would be no difficulty in sustaining the conclusion reached in the former opinion. It is because of their absence that the difficulty arises. The necessity of resorting to what is denominated "rational interpretation" is a confession that our statute in that respect falls short of what it is deemed proper it should have provided. Indeed, there are expressions in the former opinion which in terms very nearly confess that the result reached was by judicial legislation. An instance of this is found in the following quotation therefrom: "I quite agree with the court of appeals that, had it been in the minds of the framers of our statute of descent that a case like this would arise under it, they would have so framed the law that its letter would have left no hope for the obtaining of an inheritance by such means." Similar illustrations and applications of the principle of rational interpretation to those made use of by the writer of the majority opinion in Riggs v. Palmer will be found referred to in Sedgwick on the Construction of Statutory and Constitutional Law, at the beginning of the sixth chapter. They are commented on in this language: "These and similar discussions have amused the fancy and exhausted the arguments of text-writers. I cannot, however, consider them of much value for the student of jurisprudence. Ours is eminently a practical science. It is only by an intimate acquaintance with its application to the affairs of life, as they actually occur, that we can acquire that sagacity requisite to decide new and doubtful cases. Arbitrary formulae, metaphysical subtleties, fanciful hypotheses, aid us but little in our work." Later on in the same chapter this author says: "We may, therefore, affirm, as a general truth, that independently of constitutional questions, and independently of those doctrines of liberal and strict construction which really, as I have said, vest a sort of legislative power in the judge, the object, and the only object, of judicial investigation, in regard to the construction of doubtful provisions of statute law, is to ascertain the intention of the legislature which framed the statute. This rule, though often asserted, has been in practice frequently lost sight of; but there is abundant authority to sustain it. 'The only rule,' says Lord Chief Justice Tindal, 'for the construction of acts of parliament, is that they should be construed according to the intent of the parliament which passed the act;' citing Dukedom of Sussex, 8 Jur. 795. The rule is, as we shall constantly see, cardinal and universal that, if the statute is plain and unambiguous, there is no room for construction or interpretation. The legislature has spoken; their intention is free from doubt, and their will must be obeyed. 'It may be proper,' it has been said in Kentucky, 'in giving a construction to a statute, to look to the effects and consequences when its provisions are ambiguous, or the legislative intention is doubtful. But when the law is clear and explicit, and its provisions are susceptible of but one interpretation, its consequences, if evil, can only be avoided by a change of the law itself, to be effected by legislative, and not judicial, action;' citing Bosley v. Mattingly, 14 B. Mon. 89. So, too, it is said, by the supreme court U. S.: 'Where a law is plain and unambiguous, whether it be expressed in general or limited terms, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction;' citing United States v. Fisher, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 358-399, 2 L. ed. 304-317; Case v. Wildridge, 4 Ind. 51." Gantt, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Hurford v. Omaha City, 4 Neb. 352, said: "It is said that 'no principle is more firmly established, or rests on a more secure foundation, than the rule which declares, when a law is plain and unambiguous, whether it be expressed in general or limited terms, that the legislature shall be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed;' and, again, that the intention of the legislature should control absolutely the action of the judiciary. 'Where that intention is clearly ascertained, the courts have no other duty to perform than to execute the legislative will, without any regard to their own views as to the wisdom or justice of the particular enactment. Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 325.'" In our statute of descent there is neither ambiguity, nor room for construction. The intention of the legislature is free from doubt. The question is not what the framers of our statute of descent would have done, had it been in their minds that a case like this would arise, but what in fact they did, without perhaps anticipating the possibility of its existence. This is determined, not by hypothetical resort to conjecture as to their meaning, but by a construction of the language used. The majority opinion in Riggs v. Palmer, as well as the opinion already filed in this case, seems to have been prompted largely by the horror and repulsion with which it may justly be supposed the framers of our statute would have viewed the crime and its consequences. This is no justification to this court for assuming to supply legislation, the necessity for which has been suggested by subsequent events, but which did not occur to the minds of those legislators by whom our statute of descent was framed. Neither the limitations of the civil law nor the promptings of humanity can be read into a statute from which, without question, they are absent, no matter how desirable the result to be attained may be. The legislature of this state, in 1873, adopted chapter 21, Comp. Stat., providing for compensation for the widow and next of kin of a person whose death is caused by the wrongful act of another, even when such wrongful act amounts to a felony. This created a right of action which but for the statute would have had no existence. The facts of the case at bar may impress upon some future legislature the necessity of an amendment of our law of descent; from that source alone can such an amendment come. Originally, it is probable that the necessity for the Act of 1873 was suggested by a case of hardship. The case at bar may prompt other legislation with respect to our statute of descent.

As the case of Riggs v. Palmer afforded the precedent which strongly influenced this court in reaching the conclusion heretofore announced, it will be profitable, as illustrating the dangers attending the use of case law, to call attention to a portion of the opinion delivered by Judge Earle, and to his misplaced reliance upon Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong, supra, of which an analysis has hereinbefore been given. He said: "Besides, all laws, as well as all contracts, may be controlled in their operation and effect by general fundamental maxims of the common law. No one shall be permitted to profit by his own fraud, or to take advantage of his own wrong, or to found any claim upon his own iniquity, or to acquire property by his own crime. These maxims are dictated by public policy, have their foundation in universal law administered in all civilized countries, and have nowhere been superseded by statutes. They were applied in the decision of the case of Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong, supra. There it was held that the person who procured a policy upon the life of another, payable at his death, and then murdered the assured to make the policy payable, could not recover thereon. Mr. Justice Field, writing the opinion, said: 'Independently of any proof of the motives of Hunter in obtaining the policy, and even assuming that they were just and proper, he forfeited all rights under it when, to secure its immediate payment, he murdered the assured. It would be a reproach to the jurisprudence of the country if one could recover insurance money payable on the death of a party whose life he had feloniously taken. As well might he recover insurance money upon a building that he had willfully fired.' " It is apparent, from this quotation, that the author of the opinion assumed that the action in the case of Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong, supra, was brought by the representative of Hunter, and not by the representative of the assured. This misapprehension of the real interests in controversy, and which were really adjudicated in that case, influenced the majority of the court of appeals of New York, and, by the super-added force thereby given it, this court was also led into error by the majority opinion in Riggs v. Palmer. From the application of an improper rule for the construction of statutes, and from the evident misconception of the points decided in Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Armstrong, supra, we are led to believe that a rehearing was very properly granted in this case, and that it should be determined independently of the controlling force which at first was accorded to the cases cited, as supporting the views already announced in the opinion heretofore filed. Reference has heretofore been confined to the majority opinion in Riggs v. Palmer, supra. Two of the seven judges constituting that court dissented. Gray, J., wrote the dissenting opinion, in which he said: "I cannot find any support for the argument that the respondent's succession to the property should be avoided because of his criminal act, when the laws are silent. Public policy does not demand it, for the demands of public policy are satisfied by the proper execution of the laws and the punishment of the crime. There has been no convention between the testator and his legatee, nor is there any such contractual element in such a disposition of property by a testator as to impose or imply conditions in the legatee. The appellants' argument practically amounts to this: that, as the legatee has been guilty of a crime, by the commission of which he is placed in a position to sooner receive the benefits of the testamentary provision, his rights to the property should be forfeited, and he should be divested of his estate. To allow their argument to prevail would involve the diversion by the court of the testator's estate into the hands of persons whom, possibly enough, for all we know, the testator might not have chosen or desired as its recipients. Practically, the court is asked to make another will for the testator. The laws do not warrant this judicial action, and mere presumption would not be strong enough to sustain it." This language commends itself as more nearly correct in principle, as applied to the case at bar, than to the case in which it was used, for in the latter it applied to the result effected by a will duly executed and probated; in the case at bar there is presented for determination the effect of a statute under and by virtue of which there is vested a certain estate, independently of every other consideration than the death of the ancestor. The force of this distinction is the more apparent when we recall the fact that the case of Riggs v. Palmer was brought to have the will of the testator canceled and annulled in so far as it devised and bequeathed property to the testator's murderer. Under such circumstances, it might be very plausibly urged that, if the testator had understood that his murder had been contemplated by his legatee, to prevent the possibility of a revocation of the bequest to him, such revocation would have speedily followed, and upon this assumption the court might have been asked, with a show of propriety, to declare the revocation which, but for the wrongful act of the legatee, would have deprived him of the bequest in his favor. It is not to be understood that we undertake to determine this either way. What we mean is merely to illustrate the fact that, in the case of Riggs v. Palmer, the question of properly inferable unconsummated intention might have been plausibly urged, while in the case at bar there is no room even for plausibility.

The case of Owens v. Owens, 100 N. C. 240, was where a widow was convicted of being accessory before the fact for the murder of her husband. She afterwards brought suit to have her dower assigned in the real property of which her husband died seised. As applicable to the facts of the case at bar, we quote from the opinion delivered in that case as follows: "The natural feeling inspired by her proved co-operation in the unnatural and wicked act of taking her husband's life, and thus availing herself of the generous provision of the law that secures her surviving, a home for life, is repugnant to a claim preferred under such circumstances of perfidy to the marital relations. In the absence of authority, the well-instructed and able judge who tried the case ruled against the allowance of dower, as it would in fact be to 'reward crime' by conferring benefits that result from, and are procured by, its commission. We feel ourselves unable to concur in this conclusion, for the reason that, while the law gives the dower and makes it paramount to the claims of creditors even, there is no provision for its forfeiture for crime, however heinous it may be, and even when the husband is the victim. The only statutory provision which, for criminal misbehavior, bars an action prosecuted for the recovery of dower, is where she shall commit adultery, and shall not be living with her husband at his death. . . . As there is no other act of the wife which, by statute known to us, works a forfeiture, we do not see how any legal obstacle can be in the way of her getting what the law in unqualified terms gives her." These conclusions have the countenance of other courts of more limited jurisdiction than those whose views have been given, but whose powers of discernment should not therefore be underestimated. In the circuit court of Preble county, O., the case of Drem v. Milliken was determined, and is found reported in 27 Ohio L. J. 156, and 6 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 857 et seq. The opinion of the three judges comprising that court was delivered by Shauk, J. The defendants in error, by their answers and cross-petitions, alleged, in the court of common pleas, that Caroline Sharkey died intestate January 11, 1889, seised in fee of certain real estate, leaving surviving her a son, Elmer L. Sharkey, her sole heir-at-law; that thereafter Elmer executed to the defendants in error several mortgages to secure the payment of certain promissory notes. Their cross-petition contained appropriate averments as to the execution of the notes and mortgages, and for the assertion of a lien upon said real estate by virtue thereof. Answering this cross-petition, the plaintiffs in error, who are brothers and sisters of said Caroline Sharkey, deceased, admitted that said Elmer L. Sharkey was the son and only child of said Caroline Sharkey; that she died intestate; and alleged that on or about the 11th day of January, 1889, the said Elmer L. Sharkey murdered his mother for the purpose of succeeding to her title to the real estate, and that by due process of law he had been hanged on December 19, 1890; wherefore, the plaintiffs in error alleged that said real estate did not descend to said Elmer L. Sharkey. In the court of common pleas demurrers to these answers were sustained, and distribution was ordered in favor of the mortgagees. In the opinion delivered in the circuit court on error, the following apt and forcible language occurs: "The statute of descents neither recognizes a mischief nor provides a remedy. It is a legislative declaration of a rule of public policy. With respect to remedial statutes, the rule quoted has frequent and salutary operation. The mischief and the remedy indicate the intention of the legislature, and guide the court in giving it effect. But the rule affords no warrant for adding an important exception to a statute which, in clear language, defines a rule of public policy. Even in the consideration of remedial statutes, courts should be guided by the maxim 'index animi sermo,' and the interpretation should be consistent with the language employed. Knowledge of the settled maxims and principles of statutory interpretation is imputed to the legislature. To the end that there may be certainty and uniformity in legal administration, it must be assumed that statutes are enacted with a view to their interpretation according to such maxims and principles. When they are regarded, the legislative intent is ascertained. When they are ignored, interpretation becomes legislation in disguise. The well-considered cases warrant the pertinent conclusion that when the legislature, not transcending the limits of its power, speaks in clear language upon a question of policy, it becomes the judicial tribunals to remain silent. Hadden v. Barney, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 518; Hyatt v. Taylor, 42 N. Y. 258; Re Powers, 25 Vt. 261; State v. Liedtke, 9 Neb. 468; Flint & F. Pl. Road Co. v. Woodhull, 25 Mich. 90, 12 Am. Rep. 233; Jewell v. Weed, 18 Minn. 272 (Gil. 247); Woodbury v. Berry, 18 Ohio St. 456; Bruner v. Briggs, 39 Ohio St. 478; Kent v. Mahaffey, 10 Ohio St. 204. The decision in Riggs v. Palmer is the manifest assertion of a wisdom believed to be superior to that of the legislature upon a question of policy. Chief Justice Redfield, in Re Powers, observes: 'It is scarcely necessary, we trust, at this late day, to say that the judicial tribunals of the state have no concern with the policy of legislation.' "

It is unnecessary to enlarge upon this subject. We cannot, however, forbear observing that the title vested in Leander Shellenberger by operation of law, and was dependent upon no condition, not even his acceptance. Upon the death of Maggie Shellenberger, the title vested in her father, eo instanti. The language of section 30, chapter 28, Comp. Stat., is comprehensive and free from ambiguity, and we have been able to find no justification for interference with it.

The former opinion filed in this case is disapproved, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

Re SUCCESSION OF Pierre LANAUX.

Joseph R. HYMEL et al., Appts.

(45 La. Ann. —)

*1. A debtor who deposits with a third party pledges for his creditor, presum-

NOTE.—How far may pledge be effectual of which the pledgeor's agent is made depositary.

The authorities seem to agree unanimously that the validity of a pledge is not affected by the fact that an agent of the pledgeor is made the custodian of the property if the parties agree to such cause and he is in fact placed in possession.

In Weems v. Delta Moss Co., 33 La. Ann. 973, it appeared that the custodian of the pledge selected by the parties was an employé of the pledgeor, and the court in upholding the pledge said the objection that the custodian of the property pledged was an employé of the pledgeor has no force and cannot destroy the effect of the delivery made to the pledgee.

ably purchased with trust funds, and who informs the creditor of the deposit, who accepts the third party as a depositary, loses control and possession of said pledge. The depositary holds the pledge for the benefit of the pledgee. That the third party is the clerk of the pledgeor does not destroy the effect of the pledge.

*2. A deposit of money lost or misappropriated by an insolvent depositary does not give the depositor a general privilege on the es-

The lien may be perfected by placing the property in a separate room of the pledgeor's factory in charge of an employé of the pledgeor, to remain there until the property which consisted of goods in process of manufacture was completed and ready for the market. Sumner v. Hamlet, 13 Pick. 76.

The fact that the custodian selected for keeping the property is an employé of the pledgeor, and that he permits the pledgeor to use the property at times under his supervision, does not defeat the validity of the pledge. Jaquet v. His Creditors, 38 La. Ann. 863.

In Combe v. Tuchelt, 24 Minn. 423, the pledged property was delivered into the possession of an tate of the depository for the return of the money.

On Rehearing.

*3. Delivery of the property pledged to the creditor, or to the third person to hold possession for the creditor, is indispensable to perfect the contract of pledge; and, when delivered to the third person, he must, of course, know of the trust, and accept the obligation it imposes. Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 8133, 8152, 8162; Code Nap. art. 2076; 28 Laurent, Droit Civil, p. 162, pars. 464, 470, 471, 484; 8 Mourlin, Examen du Code Nap. p. 432, par. 1218; 7 Boilleux, Commentaire du Gage (3d Series) p. 129; Jones, Pledges, § 23, 27, 28, et seq.

4. Hence, no pledge is accomplished by the debtor executing his note in favor of his creditor; attaching bonds and certificates of stock to secure its payment; placing note and securities, in a package marked with the creditor's name, in the box of the debtor, in bank; the debtor at the same time instructing his clerk having the key of the bank box to deliver the package on the request of the creditor, and although the instructions are communicated to the creditor, and all is done in pursuance of a pledge promised the creditor, but no delivery ever having been made, and, when the debtor dies, the securities remaining in his bank box, deposited and held as his property. Ibid.

5. In such case the clerk of the debtor, because he receives the instructions of his employer to deliver the securities and communicates such instructions to the creditor, does not become "the third person agreed upon" to take possession of the securities for the creditor, required by the code when the pledge is proposed to be perfected by that method of delivery. Least of all can we hold that by such instructions, and their communication, is any shadow of possession passed to the clerk, of securities in his employer's bank box, never taken from it until his death, when his executor takes charge of box and contents. Ibid.

6. Instructions of an employer to his clerk, with reference to the delivery of the employer's securities to one of his creditors, and communicated to the creditor, whatever their force in the life of the employer, certainly cease to have any effect when the death of the employer occurs, no delivery having ever been made.

7. Death of the debtor fixes the rights of his creditors as they exist at that moment, and a proposed pledge, not perfected by delivery when the debtor's death occurs, confers no rights.

A PPEAL by claimants from a decree of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans sustaining oppositions to the provisional account of the executor which allowed the claims. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

employé of the pledgeor, and the court held that the pledge was valid, but there is no discussion of the effect of making the pledgeor's agent the depository.

In Boynton v. Payrow, 67 Me. 537, a good pledge was held to have been created by the delivery of a savings bank book to the pledgeor's mother, to be delivered to the pledgee.

In McCready v. Haslock, 3 Tenn. Ch. 13, the property belonged to John W. Morton, was sold by him to Pulliam & Co. who retained him as clerk in the store. Subsequently to secure a debt of Pulliam & Co. and Morton the property was pledged to persons who placed it in possession of John W. Morton, Jr., and the pledge was upheld. But the relation of the depository to the concern does not appear further than is shown by his name.

But in Dirigo Tool Co. v. Woodruff, 41 N. J. Eq. 336, the attempted pledge was of the machinery and tools of a manufacturing establishment, and the superintendent of the establishment was left in possession as the agent of the pledgee. Shortly afterwards he stated to one contemplating a loan upon a chattel mortgage of the same property that there was no lien upon it and the pledgee was held bound by his statements and the mortgagee was given priority over the pledgee.

So in D'Meza's Succession, 26 La. Ann. 85, the attempt was made to enforce a pledge of a policy of $5 L. R. A.

insurance, on the ground that it had been placed in the possession of the pledgeor's bookkeeper for the pledgee, but was not sustained, on the ground that the contention that the policy was placed in the possession of the bookkeeper for the pledgee was not borne out by the facts, the court stating that the bookkeeper had never been instructed to deliver the policy to the pledgee.

And in Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. Janin, 48 La. Ann. —, it was held that possession by a lessee of the pledgeor was not sufficient to validate the pledge, although the pledgeor had agreed to lease for the benefit of the pledgee, and the lessee had been informed of the agreement and agreed to recognize the pledgee's rights, if there was no agreement between the pledgeor and pledgee that the tenant should hold the property as a third person for the benefit of the pledgee.

In Casey v. Cavaroc, 36 U. S. 467, 24 L. ed. 779, the depository agreed upon by the parties was the firm of which the president of the pledgeor bank was a member, but instead of his taken possession of the pledge he left it in possession of a clerk of the bank for the purpose of facilitating collections. The court does not discuss the question whether or not the president of the bank would be a lawful depository, but rather assumed that fact, and then held that he did not have sufficient possession to constitute the pledge valid.

H. F. F.

McEnergy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Pierre Lanaux, commission merchant and factor, died in the city of New Orleans September 6, 1892. He was the agent for Mrs. E. Tassin, Octave Hymel, deceased, and J. R. and Seraphin Hymel. These parties intrusted their funds to Lanaux for investment, without specifying and directing the mode of investment. These funds were never, except in case of Mrs. Tassin, loaned to Lanaux; and he was never authorized to use them for his own purposes, or in his business. The mandate, as shown by the witnesses and the correspondence between the parties, was to invest their funds. They were deposited by them with Lanaux for this purpose, and none other. On the accounts current furnished these several parties, it was noted that the funds had been invested, without saying in what particular manner. A short time before his death, Lanaux, for the amounts which he had for investment for these parties, made up separate packages in separate envelopes, in which were placed his individual notes for the amount due each, with bonds and certificates of stock, with the usual blank power of attorney to transfer attached to them. On each envelope or package was indorsed the name of the party to whom it belonged. They were placed in a bank box, and this box, with the key, was placed in the actual corporal possession of De Jaham, his clerk. This box was, according to Lanaux's instructions, placed in the branch depository of the State National Bank for security and safekeeping, through the intervention of George Lanaux, who received the box from De Jaham. De Jaham was instructed and directed by Lanaux to deliver on demand these packages to the persons to whom they were addressed. He had exclusive control of the box containing these pledges, and says he would have delivered them to the parties on demand. It is evident from the testimony of De Jaham and George Lanaux that De Jaham's possession of the box was full and complete, and adverse to that of Lanaux. Mrs. Tassin, who had instructed Lanaux in the same manner as the Hymels as to the investment of her money, subsequently met Lanaux, to whom she loaned her money on the faith of the securities set apart for her, with the understanding that De Jaham was to be the depository of the pledges. De Jaham, after receiving these pledges, informed Mrs. Tassin of his possession of the same for her benefit; and she accepted De Jaham as the depository then, as she had previously signified her assent to do so, when she had the conversation with Lanaux which resulted in the lending of the money. This statement of the facts in relation to Mrs. Tassin brings her case directly under the textual provisions of article 8162 of the Revised Civil Code, and the interpretation placed upon the same by this court. Peters v. Pacific Guano Co. 42 La. Ann. 694; Jacquet v. His Creditors, 88 La. Ann. 868; Weems v. Delta Moss Co. 88 La. Ann. 973; Conger v. New Orleans, 82 La. Ann. 1250. The fact that De Jaham was the clerk of Lanaux could not affect his capacity to act as a third party chosen by the parties to be the detainer of the thing pledged. There was no inconsistency in the two relations. Having accepted the trust, so far as it was concerned, he was a stranger to Lanaux, and in no way bound, by his private relations to him, to violate his obligation as a fiduciary, and to surrender the pledge to him; and he so regarded it, as he says he would have delivered the packages, on demand, to the parties for whom they were intended. Seraphin Hymel, J. R. Hymel, and Octave Hymel were informed of the investment of their funds, either by Lanaux or De Jaham, although the testimony does not show that they were informed particularly as to the mode of investment. It is a fair inference, however, that they were informed by Lanaux and De Jaham, when they spoke to those parties, whom they had visited for the purpose of informing them as to the fulfillment of the trust imposed by them upon Lanaux. This is corroborated by the blank power of attorney which Seraphin Hymel refused to sign, the object of which was to remove and to deposit bonds, bills, stocks, notes, etc. Taking all the evidence together, the impression made upon the mind is that the Hymels had knowledge of the pledging of these bonds, stocks, etc., for them, and that they accepted De Jaham as the custodian. Seraphin Hymel's reason for refusing to sign the power of attorney was that he thought his funds safely invested. This power of attorney was admitted in evidence, over the objection of the opponents; but it was admissible to show, in part, that Seraphin Hymel knew that his funds had been invested in the manner shown by the inventory and the account, and the disposition of his funds, and that he accepted De Jaham as the third party agreed on between the parties to detain the pledge. We see no good reason why the debtor cannot place the thing pledged in the hands of a third party, and inform the creditor of the fact, when, if he accepts the third party, the pledge becomes perfected. Such seems to be the doctrine indicated in Peters v. Pacific Guano Co. 42 La. Ann. 694. The succession of Lanaux could have no greater rights than the decedent. If he had lived, would not the pledgees have had the right to claim the things pledged to them in the hands of De Jaham? If a demand had been made upon De Jaham for the pledges, he could not have set up title in Lanaux, and Lanaux certainly was estopped from claiming the pledges. In fact, he had completely divested himself of possession of the notes, bonds, and certificates of stock after De Jaham had accepted the pledges from him, and had been accepted as the detainer of the pledges by the pledgees. Any attempt of Lanaux to dispose of the things pledged, in the hands of De Jaham, could have been successfully resisted by the pledgees.

And another view of the case is also fatal to the demand of opponents. Conceding that there was no valid pledge of the property, the relations between Lanaux and the Hymels were not those of debtor and creditor. They never authorized Lanaux to use for his own purpose, or in his business, their funds. Their instruction to him, who was their servant and agent, was to invest these funds. They were informed that they had been invested, and it was so noted on the accounts current furnished the Hymels. Lanaux invested these funds in property of which he was the owner, and placed the same in the hands of his clerk, to be delivered on demand. The Hymels, on his death, found in his succession the property destined by Lanaux for them. This property was presumably purchased with their funds, and separated from Lanaux's property, and became their property. Beatty v. McCleod, 11 La. Ann. 76. It is the law that the Hymels, in order to secure the identical fund in the insolvent succession, must separate the fund from the mass of the succession, and distinguish it. But it is also the law, where trust funds have been specifically invested in property which can be identified, the property must respond to the trust fund, and stand in its stead. The Hymels therefore have the right to claim the specific property purchased with their funds by their servant and agent. Ibid.

It is contended by opponents that the notes were null and void because signed and indorsed by De Jaham, and that he had no written authority to sign and indorse them. The mandate to sign and indorse a promissory note must be express and special, but it need not be in writing. Boyd v. Chaffe, 21 La. Ann. 476. De Jaham's authority to sign and indorse the notes was express and special, although not in writing. To perfect the pledge, the delivery of the bonds, notes, etc., was sufficient. Ribet v. Bataille, 35 La. Ann. 1171; Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2158.

On October 8, 1891, S. Hymel deposited with Lanaux $23,000. This deposit was for the purpose of meeting current expenses of his plantation. This sum is placed on the account as an ordinary debt. It is claimed by Hymel that his was a trust fund, and that the executor must turn it over to Hymel's representatives before making a distribution of Lanaux's assets among his creditors. The fund has not been identified, nor has it been traced in its conversion into other property. The depositor has no general privilege on the property of the agent. Lanoux v. Dumartrai, 25 La. Ann. 478; Stone's Succession, 31 La. Ann. 314. It must therefore be rated as an ordinary debt against the succession fund.

The opposition to the claim of the Planters' Fertilizing Company is not well founded. The proof is insufficient to sustain it. The district judge was of this opinion, and we see no reason to disturb his ruling.

Walton & Co. and Moran & Wood's claim for a privilege for coal furnished the plantation was properly allowed, restricted as it was to coal furnished for making the crop of sugar on the several plantations.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended so as to reverse that part of the decrees sustaining the oppositions to the claims of Seraphin Hymel, Octave Hymel, Joseph R. Hymel, Mrs. F. E. Tassin, to be paid, by preference and privilege, out of certain notes and bonds, shares of stock, etc., pledged to them, and mentioned in the inventory and on the account of the executor; and it is now ordered that the opposition to the same be dismissed, and said claims be recognized as placed on the account. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed; the succession to pay all costs.

A rehearing was subsequently granted after which on June 9, 1894, Miller, J., on behalf of the court delivered the following opinion:

The question in this case is whether the appellants, the successions of Seraphin Hymel, of Octave Hymel, Joseph R. Hymel, Mrs. Florian E. Tassin, and Denis Lanaux, are pledge creditors of the late Pierre Lanaux. The account of the executor of the deceased recognized the pledges, and from the judgment of the lower court maintaining the oppositions of ordinary creditors of the deceased, and adjudging that the appellants were not pledge creditors, they prosecute this appeal. The case has been elaborately argued in this court, both on the original trial and on the rehearing, and has engaged our serious attention. The full argument in this court has served to eliminate from consideration a mass of testimony contained in the voluminous record, well calculated to cloud the issue and mislead the court.

At the outset, it may be stated, we regard the debts of the creditors asserting the pledges as established. The pecuniary condition of Pierre Lanaux is unimportant, as this is not the revocatory action. It is of no consequence in this discussion that Pierre Lanaux, the deceased factor, had annually, for years, balances in his hands derived from the sale of the crops of the asserted pledge creditors,—was accustomed to invest for them their balances,—and all evidence tending to show that the asserted pledges were such investments has no bearing on the controversy, the creditors claiming as pledgees, not as owners, for whom the securities had been bought by their agent. The claim of ownership, and at the same time as creditors entitled to the bonds as pledgees, would be inconsistent, besides admitting of no support under the facts; and the creditors properly elected, in the lower court, to stand on their asserted pledgees.

The controversy is between the creditors asserting these pledges on a large amount of the securities of the debtor, and the mass of the creditors interested in disputing the pledges, so as to secure the applications of all the debtor's assets to the payment of his debts. The requisites of the pledge are well defined. The agreement consummated by delivery of the property pledged to the creditor, or the possession of the property by a third person, agreed on to hold for the creditor, are the essentials. There is no substantial difference between our code and the general commercial law on the subject, and in one of the recent text-books the articles of our code are incorporated as expressing the commercial law. In this case there is no pretense of any delivery to the creditors. The claim of the asserted pledge creditors is that the securities were placed in the possession of a third person to hold for them. Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 3133, 3152, 3162; Code Napoléon, art. 2076; Jones, Pledges, §§ 23, 27, 28, et seq.; 28 Laurent, Droit Civil, p. 162, para. 464, 470, 471, 484; 7 Boilleux, Commentaire du Gage, p. 129. The pledges are asserted to have been made in August, 1892. Pierre Lanaux, the debtor, died in September, about a month after. There was no intercourse between the debtor and Denis Lanaux, one of the alleged creditors, having any reference to the pledge claimed for him. We draw the conclusion from the record that there was none with Seraphin Hymel, another alleged pledge creditor, leaving out of view the hearsay testimony of statements from him that his balance in the hands of the deceased factor was safe, or had been invested. With two other of the creditors claiming as pledgees, Octave Hymel and Joseph R. Hymel, there appears to have been intercourse prior to the time of the asserted pledges, from which these creditors derived the understanding, and were assured by the deceased factor, their balances in his hands would be or were invested, and their securities placed in the safe at the New Orleans Insurance Company, in the vault of the branch depository of the State National Bank, in this city. The deceased factor was president of both institutions. With Mrs. Tassin, another of these creditors, the communications of the deceased factor were of a more special character. Her balance in his hands in July, 1892, was large, and she was solicitous to have it secured; i. e. invested in state bonds. He submitted to her his plan, thus: He would make his note for $40,000; secure it by a pledge of state bonds and other securities; place note and securities in the hands of George De Jaham, his clerk; instruct him to put the note and securities in a bank box, in the safe of the New Orleans Insurance Company, in the vault of the branch bank, to which George Lanaux, the secretary, had sole access; at the same time he would instruct him to hold the box subject to the order of De Jaham, having the key of the box, and who would be directed to deliver the note and securities on her request. To this plan Mrs. Tassin assented.

With this review of the relations and intercourse of the deceased factor with his creditors, the next phase of this controversy is the method of the execution of the asserted pledges. On the 8d of August, 1892, Mr. Lanaux directed his clerk, Mr. De Jaham, to make five notes (one for Mrs. Tassin, for her balance, $40,000; one for $31,000, in favor of Octave Hymel; one for $27,500, in the favor of Seraphin Hymel; one in favor of J. R. Hymel, for $25,000; and another, for $10,000, in favor of Denis Lanaux); to attach to each note securities deemed adequate to secure it; to place notes and securities in five packages, each marked as the property of the creditor for whom the contents were intended; and to put the sealed packages in a bank box, for which, Pierre Lanaux told his clerk, George Lanaux would call. All this was done, and De Jaham, the clerk, was instructed to deliver the packages to the creditors. On the day previous, George Lanaux had been requested by Pierre Lanaux to put a bank box in the safe of the insurance company, adding that De Jaham would give the box. On the day following the making up the packages, and placing them in the box, it was taken from Pierre Lanaux's office by De Jaham and George Lanaux, and deposited in the safe of the insurance company, in the vault of the branch bank. De Jaham had the key of the box; George Lanaux, the combination to open the safe. Nothing was said by Pierre Lanaux or by De Jaham to George Lanaux in reference to the box, save the request from Pierre Lanaux to deposit it, and of course there was no syllable of reference to its contents. It bore the name of the deceased factor, and contained, besides the packages, his will, appointing Denis Lanaux his executor. Not a single security was ever delivered from the box. It was untouched from the time it was placed in the safe, at Pierre Lanaux's request, until his death, when it was opened, under the order of the court, to search for his will and inventory his property. The claims of the creditors asserting pledges on the contents of the box on the theory that the securities in their debtor's bank box ought to be deemed, not in his possession, but in that of these creditors, through a third person supposed to hold for them, are fortified, it is urged, by the direction of Pierre Lanaux to his clerk to deliver the packages, and by the fact that the directions, at the request of Pierre Lanaux, were communicated by his clerk to the creditors, or some of them. The testimony on this branch of the case appears to be about this: The information was given to Octave Hymel and Joseph R. Hymel that their funds in the hands of the deceased factor had been invested for them,—were in the safe of the insurance company,—and, to use the language of the witness, they ratified the investments. The testimony of De Jaham on this point is in some degree conflicting,—apt to occur in the testimony of any witness subjected to protracted examination and cross-examination as to details. But giving effect to all his testimony, and that of others, it is our conclusion his communication to Joseph R. and Octave Hymel may be epitomized in the reference by him to the investments being in the safe of the company. To Mrs. Tassin the communication of De Jaham was, in effect, that all had been done with reference to the pledge as proposed to her by Pierre Lanaux,—that is, the execution of the note; placing the note and securities in the package marked for her, the packages in the box, the box in the safe of the company in the bank's vault; his instructions to deliver to her. And De Jaham also stated that he and George Lanaux had accepted the commission confided to them by the deceased. This last statement conveyed the inference of the witness; but the fact is that George Lanaux, entirely ignorant of the contents of the box, had no such commission, and never even heard of it.

It is substantially on this state of facts this court is called on to sustain pledges of securities in the debtor's bank box never taken from it till his death, and then by his executor. It is urged on us that the facts bring the asserted pledges within the essentials so plainly expressed in the code,—that no pledge exists without actual delivery to the creditor, or to a third person for him. The symbol of the pledge, in the Roman law, is the fiat of the creditor closed on the pledge, denoting that actual possession which all recognize as linked to the pledge, and without which none can exist. We are responding to the case of the creditors, to hold that these securities in Pierre Lanaux's box, in bank, directed to be delivered, but never taken from it, are notwithstanding to be deemed, not in his possession, but in that of some third person for the creditors. If we are to reach any such conclusion, it must be on some theory of constructive possession not capable of easy appreciation. We can hardly conceive, even on this theory urged on us, of constructive possession or constructive holding, how the case of the Hymels and Denis Lanaux can be supported. The intercourse with Octave and Joseph R. Hymel with the deceased factor, and subsequently, after his death, with De Jaham, that can be deemed to have the faintest relation to these securities, has been stated. It will not be pretended, in that intercourse, any one was agreed upon or suggested to take possession of the securities for them. Still less can it be maintained that there was ever the shade of any such possession, unless packages in Lanaux's box are to be deemed not in his, but in the possession of some other. With respect to Denis Lanaux and Seraphin Hymel, there was no intercourse with reference to the box or its contents. A day or two after the death of Mr. Pierre Lanaux, De Jaham spoke to Denis Lanaux of a letter in the box for him. That was all he ever heard of the box until the opening under the order of the court disclosed the package marked with his name. With Seraphin Hymel, all intercourse or knowledge of box or contents is a blank. The claims of these—the Hymels and Denis Lanaux—may at once be laid aside. There is no pretense of the delivery to them of the asserted pledges. It would do violence to the record, were we to maintain that there was ever the selection of any third person to hold the securities for them, and still greater violence if we held there was the shadow of any such possession.

Is the case of Mrs. Tassin any stronger? The actual custody of the box containing the securities when Lanaux died is susceptible of no dispute. Whether George Lanaux who received it from Pierre Lanaux, or the company, or the bank in whose vault the box was placed, is deemed custodian, is immaterial. Could the possession of any one of these be deemed that of Mrs. Tassin? Neither George Lanaux nor the company nor the bank had the slightest intimation of her now asserted interest in the contents of the box. With the fact that must be conceded,—that the box was thus received and thus held,—it is plain that no other relation or ownership or accountability grew out of the deposit of the box, other than that arising daily when the customer sends his box to the bank. It must be apparent, then, that George Lanaux held that box for Pierre Lanaux, and in no sense for Mrs. Tassin, whose asserted pledge rests on the theory of her possession, actual or constructive, of the securities in that box, claimed by her. The fact that George Lanaux received the box from, and held it for, Pierre Lanaux, must be accepted, and exert its influence in the solution of the vital issue as to the possession of these securities. Whatever qualifications may be claimed to arise from the previous negotiation between Mr. Lanaux and Mrs. Tassin in reference to the asserted pledge, or from the fact that subsequent to the negotiation he placed the package of securities bearing her name in the box, or from the additional circumstances that the clerk of the debtor, with the key of the box, had his instructions—never fulfilled—to deliver to her the package, and that the instruction, at the request of the debtor, had been communicated to her, still, whatever the force, if any, of these qualifications, or of any other the record exhibits, the unalterable fact remains that when the death of the debtor occurred, which fixes the rights of all creditors as they exist at that moment, the securities now claimed to have been in the possession of a third person, agreed on to hold for the creditor asserting the pledge were in the debtor's bank box deposited as his property. There is, on this branch of the case, another impressive feature. When Pierre Lanaux unfolded his plan to secure Mrs. Tassin, the payment of the large balance in his hands, along with the placing the note in her favor, with the package of securities bearing her name, in the box, and along with the instructions for delivery to his clerk, and the deposit of the box, it was part of that plan that George Lanaux, receiving the box, was to be instructed to hold the box subject to the order of the clerk. If these instructions had been given, and accepted (as doubtless they would have been) by George Lanaux, the case of Mrs. Tassin would, at least in this respect, have represented a different aspect. There would have been the basis for the argument, to whatever extent it might avail, that the box was held for De Jaham along with his mandate of delivery to Mrs. Tassin. But the deceased factor—sick when the proposed pledge was discussed, and attempted to be carried into effect, and unfitted for business—failed to bear in mind the precaution devised by him for the protection of the creditor. Death closed his lips without any instructions to George Lanaux in respect to the box. The record then places George Lanaux before the court as holding the box for him whose name it bore, and from whom it came. It cannot, therefore, for one moment, be contended that he bore the slightest relation to Mrs. Tassin. When the pledge is consummated by delivery to a third person to hold for the creditor, it is the natural result that a liability at once arises between the third person thus selected and the creditor. No such liability, in this case, existed. Laurent thus puts it: "L'article 2076 admet que le créancier gagiste est mis en possession lorsque le gage a été remis à un tiers convenu entre les parties. Il faut donc une convention qui établisse un lien entre le tiers et le créancier gagiste de sorte que le créancier possède par l'intermédiaire du tiers." 28 Laurent, Droit Civil, p. 484. This case can be supported on no theory that George Lanaux held for the creditor, of whose asserted interest he was ignorant, and to whom he sustained no relation of trust or liability.

It is insisted, however, that this court, in solving issue of the possession of these securities claimed by Mrs. Tassin as pledged to her, shall hold for naught that they were in the debtor's box, deposited and held for him, and never taken from it, except by his executor, when the debtor's death occurred. It is claimed that the pledge and possession of Mrs. Tassin are to be supported on the theory that George De Jaham had been selected to hold possession of the pledges for her, and actually had that possession. Her whole case rests on that theory. Is it to be maintained that De Jaham ever was selected to take the securities into his possession, or that he ever had the vestige of any such possession? All must realize the exaction of the code that actual delivery of the pledge must be made to the creditor, or possession delivered to a third person chosen by debtor and creditor to hold for the creditor. What the code means by this selection of a third person to hold for the creditor, and by his possession of the pledge, requires no comment. Was De Jaham ever clothed with any such agency, or vested with any such possession? De Jaham's whole function with respect to the securities was derived from the order of his employer. That was to place the package of securities in his employer's bank box, and deliver the package on the call of the creditor. That order certainly did not authorize the clerk to take the securities into his possession, to hold them for the creditor. Nothing of the kind was contemplated. If the creditor had called, she doubtless would have obtained the securities, and thus obtained the possession essential to perfect the pledge. No such call was made, and the securities remained in the debtor's bank box, undelivered. The clerk never conceived he had any authority to remove the securities from the bank box. When the creditor demanded the securities after the debtor's death, the clerk declined, stating his authority ceased with the death; adding, however, the creditor's right would ultimately be secured. His refusal without any qualification, in our opinion, defined his power, because death revokes all unexecuted orders of the principal. There was then no agreement whatever that the securities claimed as pledged to Mrs. Tassin should be put in possession of the clerk as a third person to hold for Mrs. Tassin. Nor does it in the least affect the question that the clerk communicated the order of his employer to deliver to her, nor that she signified her assent. No license of construction enables us to transform an order of the employer to his clerk for the delivery, if called for, of securities from the employer's box in bank, into a mandate that the clerk shall remove the securities, and take them into possession to hold for the creditor. Least of all can we hold the clerk ever had that possession. Placed in the debtor's bank box, deposited and held as his property, the securities remained untouched until his death, and then were removed only by the executor to inventory the debtor's property.

There was clearly no delivery of the securities; none to the creditor; none to a third person to hold for her. The pledge was inchoate,—a delivery proposed, but never accomplished. The case is of the class of pledges proposed, but not perfected; and nothing is better settled than that inchoate or executory contracts of pledge, not perfected by delivery, confer no rights, as against other creditors. The death of the debtor fixes the rights of the creditors as they exist at that moment. The same rule is enforced when the debtor makes a surrender of his property to his creditors. Civ. Code. No delivery had been made when that death occurred; none after was possible. Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 8188, 8162, 8162, 8182, 8183, 8185; Buard v. Lemae, 12 Rob. (La.) 248; Boyce v. Escoffie, 3 La. Ann. 872; Slidell v. Pritchard, 5 Rob. (La.) 101; Martin v. Williams, 3 La. Ann. 582. See the cases collected in 1 Hen. Dig. p. 686, No. 7; 2 Hen. Dig. p. 1504, No. 1. The creditor's case lacks the life of the pledge in a controversy with creditors, i. e. delivery.

In a commercial community, especially, it is of importance the law of pledge should be clearly understood, and that requisites of common acceptance should not be made uncertain. The creditor's case exacts, we think, that the tests of our law shall be displaced. The case may receive appropriate illustration by supposing that precisely such a pledge as is claimed here for Mrs. Tassin was proposed to any bank or business man. The proposition would be: The execution of the borrower's note, with securities attached; the note and securities placed in a package marked with the lender's name; the package placed in the debtor's bank box; the box deposited in bank by the debtor; his clerk instructed to deliver the package on the call of the creditor; and the creditor notified when all this is done; and of the instructions given the clerk. Does any one suppose that a dollar could be obtained on any such so-called pledge of securities to be kept in the debtor's bank box, supplemented by his directions to his clerk for delivery to the creditor? Would any one suppose that, unless that delivery was obtained, there would be any pledge, as against other creditors of the debtor. On the contrary, the prompt answer, at any bank, to any such proposition, would be that putting securities in the debtor's bank box, with all the formalities and instructions indicated, was neither delivery to the creditor, nor to a third person to hold for him, and hence there was no pledge. If a pledge, dependent, as it is, on delivery to the creditor, or the third person to hold for him, can be accomplished in the mode we are asked to recognize in this case, i. e. of securities never out of the debtor's bank box from the time he placed them in it until his executor took charge of them, there would be no limit to the pledges the debtor might make of the same property. To each lender the debtor might tender the security of his own bank box, with directions to his clerk of delivery to the creditors. The delivery obtained by any of these, relying on this bank-box pledge, would demonstrate that all the others had no pledge. This theory that pledges can be made without the complete dispossession of the debtor, and that the pledge may be consummated by marking the creditor's name on the packages of securities in the debtor's bank box, supplemented by his unexecuted order for delivery, given to his clerk and communicated to the creditor, finds its answer in our code, in the text-books, and adjudicated cases. That answer is: The pledge requires possession in the creditor. Without that possession the pledge is inchoate or executory, only as between the debtor and the asserted pledge creditors, but gives no right whatever as against other creditors. Boilleux thus puts it: "Une apprehension manuelle est de l'essence du contrat de gage; on conçoit que le législateur ait dû subordonner les droits du créancier à cette condition, puisqu'il ne s'agit pas d'un privilège proprement dit, c'est-à-dire d'un droit attaché à la qualité de la créance; mais d'une préférence fondée sur la possession; et le débiteur ne se dessaisissant pas le gage ne serait pas qu'une source de fraudes, rien ne l'empêcherait pas de conférer successivement à plusieurs personnes des droits sur la chose." 7 Boilleux, 129. This commentator on the Napoleon Code is felicitous in his development of the policy to guard against fraud that requires the complete dispossession of the debtor of the pledged property, but all the text-books insist on that dispossession. See, in addition to the authorities cited, Story, Bailm. § 299; Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 24 L. ed. 779; Story, Ag. §§ 867 et seq.

Adhering, as we think, to the text and spirit of the code, it is our conclusion the pledge claimed for Mrs. Tassin was never perfected. There was neither delivery to her, nor possession for her in a third person. The bonds and securities claimed as pledged to her, never delivered, but in the debtor's possession at his death, are to be deemed the common pledge of all his creditors. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3188.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that our former judgment be avoided and set aside; and it is now ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the lower court be affirmed with costs.

Watkins, J., dissenting. Filed July 6, 1894:

With respect to the claim of the opponent Mrs. Tassin, the question is whether the possession of De Jaham was such that the privilege had struck the collaterals that were attached to the note of Pierre Lanaux so effectually as to have consecrated their proceeds to its payment, had said collaterals been seized and sold by any other creditor of Lanaux. The contention of Mrs. Tassin's counsel is: That at the request of Pierre Lanaux it was agreed between him and Mrs. Tassin that she should loan Lanaux the sum of $40,000 out of her funds then in his hands, on his demand note, to be secured by a pledge of Louisiana state consols and New Orleans Insurance Association stock, as collateral security. That it was further agreed between said parties that the pledge was to be arranged in the following manner, namely: The note, together with the securities, were to be placed in the possession of George De Jaham, who was to put them in a bank box, which was to be placed on deposit by De Jaham in an iron safe of the New Orleans Insurance Association, at the time in the branch depository of the State National Bank, and in the custody and under the control of the secretary of the insurance association, who alone possessed the combination of the vault and safe. That the secretary of the insurance association was instructed to deliver the box containing the securities to De Jaham, on his demand; the latter having instructions from Pierre Lanaux to deliver the note and pledged securities to Mrs. Tassin, on her demand. That on the 3d of August, 1892, the note and act of pledge were executed, and they, together with the accompanying securities, were placed in the box, and the box was placed in the safe of the insurance association, where it remained uninterruptedly until after Lanaux's death. That on the 7th of August following the date of the selection of the securities, and in pursuance of the previous agreement of Mrs. Tassin and Pierre Lanaux, and by direction of Pierre Lanaux, De Jaham visited Mrs. Tassin, at her plantation, in the parish of St. John, and explained to her all that he had done,—describing the note which he had executed for Lanaux to her order, with the designated securities attached,—and that Mrs. Tassin expressed herself satisfied that he had carried out the agreement, and approved of what he had done. That, immediately after the death of Pierre Lanaux, Mrs. Tassin called on De Jaham, and, in person demanded the note and securities; but he declined because, in his opinion, the death of Lanaux had terminated his authority in the premises.

The facts bearing on the foregoing propositions are detailed substantially by two or three of the witnesses, and they may be fairly summarized as follows, viz.: Mrs. Tassin states that she had three separate and distinct interviews with Pierre Lanaux on the subject of her business, then in his hands, viz. on the 11th of June, 1892, on the 21st and again on the 25th of July, 1892. In the first interview she gave him instructions to invest for her, in state bonds, the balance of $45,917.26 then remaining in his hands to her credit, in the second, she agreed to loan him $40,000 on his demand note, secured by a pledge of state bonds on the par value of $35,000, and in stock of the New Orleans Insurance Association sufficient in amount to cover the balance of $5,000; in the third, there was a repetition of the second, the details thereof being reiterated. She states that Pierre Lanaux's proposition was to place his demand note for $40,000, with the aforesaid securities attached, in the hands of George De Jaham, which he would instruct him to place in a bank box in the safe of the New Orleans Insurance Association, to which George Lanaux, secretary of the company, had exclusive access, and that at the same time he would instruct the secretary to hold the box subject to the order of De Jaham, who was to be authorized to deliver said note and securities on her demand. That in the last interview with Pierre Lanaux the latter inquired of her, to know if she perfectly understood all the instructions he had previously given her, and that she replied in the affirmative. Mr. George De Jaham makes the following statement, viz.: "Mr. Lanaux gave me instructions before leaving,—that is to say, a few days before, on the 2d of August, he told me to make a note for Mrs. Tassin; to place $40,000 for Mrs. Tassin, or $35,000, in Louisiana state bonds, and to complete the balance of the pledge with New Orleans Insurance Association stock." Again he states: "On the 3d of August, Mr. Lanaux told me that he had given instructions to Mr. George Lanaux to call upon me for a certain box, in which I was to place the pledges for Mrs. Tassin and [others]. . . . Mr. Pierre Lanaux called at the office [on] the 3d, at about 2 P. M. He asked me if I had executed his orders. I told him, 'Yes.' I went to the bank, and got the box. I brought it into the office, opened it in his presence, exhibiting to him the notes for all these different parties, made packages before him, and replaced them in the box. That was on the 3d of August." Again he says: "Mr. Lanaux's instructions were to deliver to the parties whose names were on those packages, at their request." He states that on the 4th of August, at about 11 or 12 o'clock M., he telephoned George Lanaux, secretary of the insurance association, that he was ready to deliver to him the box, and he came and met him, and that they went together, and placed the box in his safe, in the vault of the insurance association. He further states that he retained the key to the bank box, which continuously remained in the safe until after the death of Pierre Lanaux, and was then delivered to him by George Lanaux, and he opened it in his presence. He was asked the question whether he would have delivered the packages to the parties named, if they had demanded them; and his answer was that he would, as Mr. Lanaux had instructed him to deliver the packages to the parties named on the back of the different envelopes, upon their demand. He concludes his answer by making this statement: "His instructions were to put them in the box, as stated yesterday, subject to their demand." This witness further states that he went to "Mrs. Tassin's house on the 7th of August, 1892, . . . and told [her] that Mr. Lanaux had placed, s. c. invested for her, $40,000, on his note, secured by $35,000 of Louisiana fours, and 520 shares of New Orleans Insurance Association, as he had promised her. Mr. Lanaux had told me to go there. Q. Did he instruct you to go there and inform her? A. Yes. Q. After you related to her (Mrs. Tassin) what occurred on the 3d day of August, did she say anything? A. Well, she said it was all right, according to what Mr. Lanaux had promised her." The witness again states that, after Mr. Lanaux's death, Mrs. Tassin called on him for the note and the securities, but he declined to deliver them, because, in his opinion, his authority from Pierre Lanaux ceased at his death. Counsel for the executor said, interrogatively: "And therefore you knew that when he died you would have no power over it, for the reason that it (the box) must be opened in his estate?" But his answer was: "No,

I did not think it belonged, even after his death, to his estate." Q. The instructions of Mr. Pierre Lanaux were up to the time of his death? A. He did not specify up to the time of his death. The words were: 'You will deliver these packages to the parties whose names are on them, on their demand.' These were the only words he spoke to me in reference to these packages." The witness then repeats that the instruments or packages were thus made, and placed in a bank box, and the parties were duly notified of the fact of the pledges having been made; and their accounts current were duly credited with the proper amounts, corresponding with the amounts of the secured notes. Mr. George Lanaux states that on the 2d or 3d of August, 1892, Pierre Lanaux "crossed over from the State National Bank to the office of the New Orleans Insurance Association; came to [his] office, and said, 'George, can you put a bank box in the iron safe of your company?'" To which question the witness replied: "It depends on the size of the box. Our iron safe is pretty full." "Lanaux said: 'Try and put the box in the safe. George De Jaham will give you the box.' That was all P. Lanaux said to me in relation to the box. That was in the morning, between 10 and 11 o'clock. About 2 o'clock that same day, I telephoned to De Jaham, . . . asking him if P. Lanaux told him about a bank box which I was to put in the safe of the New Orleans Insurance Association. He said, 'Yes;' but he was not ready to put the box in the safe, but would telephone me. . . . The following day, De Jaham telephoned that he was ready to put the box in the safe of the company. I answered, to wait for me at Lanaux's office; that I was coming. Immediately, I left my office, and proceeded to Pierre Lanaux's office, on Conti [street], and, together, accompanied by De Jaham, took the bank box from the desk in P. Lanaux's office, and went to the branch depository of the State National Bank, corner of Royal and Conti streets, and, having assistance of employés of the bank, we went into the vault where our safe is. I opened the safe, and, after having moved certain securities from one shelf to another, we succeeded in putting in the bank box. . . . There is no key to the safe. There is a combination. I had the combination. I was the only person who had the combination." On being asked if he knew anything of the contents of the box, he said he did not. He further states: "On the 6th of September I delivered the box to George De Jaham, who called for it. I had received it from George De Jaham. . . . He returned it to me in the course of five minutes." This witness again says: "I surrendered the box to De Jaham, having received it from him. I did not know whose agent he was, or considered himself to be. That I cannot answer. De Jaham will answer that. You cannot expect me to answer for De Jaham." Mr. Denis Lanaux states that the first time he "saw this tin box was on the 6th of September, . . . with De Jaham and George Lanaux. I had been informed by De Jaham that he had a box, which box was in the safe of the New Orleans Insurance Association, which was in the vault of the branch depository of the State National Bank,"—informing witness of the contents. He said that "George Lanaux opened the vault, and De Jaham opened the bank box. We found packages,—one marked 'Property of Mrs. Tassin,' etc. He again said, "De Jaham told me he had the bank box," and, being asked when he was so informed by De Jaham, replied that "it was on the 4th or 5th of September, . . . two or three days before Lanaux died."

On this evidence, there can be no doubt of the following facts being fully established, viz.: (1) That there was an agreement between Pierre Lanaux and Mrs. Tassin that certain specified collaterals were to be attached to his demand note for $40,000 in her favor, as security therefor. (2) That the note was accordingly executed, and the aforesaid collaterals were thereto attached, and that same were placed in an envelope, indorsed, "Property of Mrs. F. E. Tassin," and that this envelope was deposited in a bank box, that was locked, and deposited in a safe in the vault of the New Orleans Insurance Association. (3) That De Jaham was proposed by Pierre Lanaux as the person who was to carry the agreement between himself and Mrs. Tassin into effect, and that Mrs. Tassin was so informed, and unequivocally accepted the proposition. (4) That Pierre Lanaux gave De Jaham instructions in exact conformity with the aforesaid agreement; that, in pursuance of said instructions, De Jaham accepted the trust, and made and executed in favor of Mrs. Tassin a demand note for $40,000, and signed per pro Lanaux, and to that note attached the specified collaterals, and placed them in a bank box, and locked the box, and deposited it in the iron safe of the New Orleans Insurance Association, retaining the key in his possession. (5) That, in pursuance of the instruction of Pierre Lanaux, De Jaham visited Mrs. Tassin, at her plantation, in the parish of St. John, for the express purpose of reporting to her, carefully and succinctly, all he had done, as Mr. Lanaux had promised her he would, and which, she acknowledged to De Jaham, had been done according to their agreement. (6) That De Jaham, assisted by George Lanaux, secretary of the insurance association, and other bank employes, placed the bank box containing the securities specified in the safe of the insurance association, in the vault of the company; De Jaham retaining the key of the box, and George Lanaux keeping the combination of the safe. (7) That the box thus remained on deposit, and was not touched by any one, until after the death of Lanaux, when George Lanaux opened the safe, and permitted De Jaham to remove the bank box. (8) That on the 7th of September, 1892,—the next day after the death of Pierre Lanaux,—Mrs. Tassin called upon De Jaham for the delivery to her of the note and the pledged securities; but her request was declined, on account of Pierre Lanaux's death, De Jaham explaining that she would receive them in a few days. (9) That, on the following day, De Jaham, accompanied by Denis Lanaux, visited the branch depository of the State

National Bank, and called upon George Lanaux, secretary of the New Orleans Insurance Association, for the delivery of the bank box; that the secretary at once opened the vault and safe of the insurance association, and delivered the bank box to De Jaham; and that De Jaham procured the key, opened the box, and he and Denis Lanaux examined the packages therein deposited, whereupon the bank box, with the pledged securities, was returned to the custody of the insurance association.

Recurring to the query propounded, it appears that, in the light of the evidence detailed, it must receive an affirmative reply,—that the possession of De Jaham was such that Mrs. Tassin's privilege had so effectually struck the collaterals that she would have been entitled to the proceeds if any other creditor of Lanaux had seized and sent them to sale. Or, in other words, Pierre Lanaux absolutely lost or discontinued control over the pledged collaterals from the moment the bank box containing them had been, by De Jaham, deposited in the iron safe of the New Orleans Insurance Association. After that date the custody of De Jaham was exclusively for the account of Mrs. Tassin, to whom he was directed by Pierre Lanaux to deliver upon her demand. With Pierre Lanaux's knowledge, and by his direction, the collaterals indicated by him, and agreed upon by him and Mrs. Tassin, were segregated from his other assets, were attached to his demand note in her favor, and placed in an envelope, and marked, "Property of Mrs. F. E. Tassin," and by De Jaham deposited in a bank box, of which he possessed the key. With the assistance of the secretary of the insurance association, and others of its employes, the bank box containing the pledged securities was removed from the desk of Pierre Lanaux, and deposited in an iron safe in the vault of the insurance association, of which its secretary alone possessed the combination, thus completely severing Pierre Lanaux's control and dominion over the box and its contents. And when De Jaham called on Mrs. Tassin, and informed her of all that had been done, "as he [Pierre Lanaux] had promised her," and Mrs. Tassin expressed her approbation of the acts he had performed, "as Mr. Lanaux had promised her," the vinculum of the contract was completed, and henceforth De Jaham was exclusively her agent. That De Jaham so understood the position is fully attested by his statements, to the effect (1) that Mr. Lanaux's instructions to him were for him to deliver the pledged collaterals to the parties whose names were indorsed on the respective packages, at their request; (2) that the instructions of Pierre Lanaux were not up to the time of his death, but that he was to deliver upon the demand of the pledgees; (3) that he (De Jaham) informed Mr. Denis Lanaux, two or three days prior to the death of Pierre Lanaux, that he held a box in the safe of the New Orleans Insurance Association, containing pledged securities; (4) that, immediately after the death of Pierre Lanaux, De Jaham visited the vault of the insurance association in company with Denis Lanaux and the secretary of the insurance company, opened the vault and the safe, and delivered the box containing the securities into the hands of De Jaham, and he unlocked it in the presence of the secretary and Denis Lanaux, and thereupon he and Denis Lanaux examined the securities that were found in the box, and, among the number, the package indorsed, "Property of Mrs. F. E. Tassin;"

(5) that after their examination was completed the packages were returned to their places, Mr. De Jaham locked the box, and returned it to the custody of the secretary of the insurance association, and he, in turn, placed the box in the iron safe, and closed it, as well as the vault, he alone possessing the combinations. What more could have been done, or what additional formality could have been observed, to have perfected the delivery of pledged collaterals to a third person agreed upon by the parties? The text of the law is, "It is essential to the contract of pledge that the creditor be put in possession of the thing given him in pledge," etc. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3152. But there is an express qualification placed upon this article, in these words, viz.: "In no case does this privilege [Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3157] subsist on the pledge, except when the thing pledged, if it be a corporeal movable, or the evidence of a credit, if it be a note or other instrument under private signature, has been actually put and remained in the possession of the debtor, or of a third person agreed upon by the parties." Id. art. 3162. Was not De Jaham the third person agreed upon by the parties? Was not his selection duly notified to him? Did he not carry out his instructions to the letter, in the preparation of the note and pledge, and in giving to Mrs. Tassin information of his having performed all the acts that Pierre Lanaux had promised her should be performed? Did not Mrs. Tassin specifically approve and accept same, and subsequently call on De Jaham for the note and pledged collaterals, in keeping with Lanaux's directions to deliver to her order? And, finally, did not De Jaham declare to Denis Lanaux, before Pierre Lanaux's death, that he held possession of the pledged collaterals, and, after Lanaux's death, did not the secretary of the insurance association deliver them to him? And can it be doubted, in view of the act of the secretary in surrendering the actual possession of well-nigh $150,000 of state bonds into the power of De Jaham, two or three days after the death of Pierre Lanaux, that De Jaham had a right of custody and control, entirely independent of Lanaux? There can be no other solution of the question. What is the answer to the foregoing proposition? That of the district judge was, as appears from his reasons for judgment, that the instructions of Lanaux to De Jaham "were those of an employer to his clerk;" that Lanaux "said nothing about the bank box, or of De Jaham's holding it, or the securities it contained, as the agent for any one, or as a party agreed upon, with whom the box and securities were to be deposited, nor did he, at the time, instruct De Jaham to notify the pledgees that the securities had been placed in the box, subject to their demand. But De Jaham testifies that he did so, at some time not mentioned in the testimony."

It is evident that the judge quo was under a misapprehension of the facts adduced in evidence on all of the foregoing propositions. Pierre Lanaux being dead, his lips are sealed, and cannot speak, but De Jaham's testimony is clear and unmistakable. He says (using his own words): "His instructions were to put it in the box, as I stated yesterday, subject to their demand." Again: "He did not specify, up to the time of his death. His words were, 'You will deliver these packages to the parties whose names are on them, on their demand.'" Again: "I went to Mrs. Tassin's house on the 7th of August, 1892, . . . and told her that Mr. Lanaux had placed—invested for her—$40,000, on his note, secured by $35,000 of Louisiana fours, and 520 shares of the New Orleans Insurance Association, as he had promised her. Mr. Lanaux had told me to go. Q. Did he instruct you to go there and inform her? A. Yes. Q. After you related to her [Mrs. Tassin] what occurred on the 8d of August, did she say anything? A. Well, she said that it was all right, according to what Mr. Lanaux had promised her." From the foregoing it is perfectly evident that De Jaham had been made acquainted with "what Mr. Lanaux had promised Mrs. Tassin" and that one of the things he had promised her was that De Jaham was to deliver the securities to her, on her demand. It is equally evident that he did inform Mrs. Tassin that he had deposited Lanaux's note and the securities he had specified in their previous agreement, which he would deliver on her demand, and that she expressed herself satisfied that he had done all that Lanaux had promised her. It is likewise evident that the dates, places, and circumstances are all precisely detailed, with perfect accuracy.

That De Jaham was at the time the clerk of Pierre Lanaux is a matter of no consequence. The following queries have been propounded, the trend of which is to show that De Jaham acted in the capacity of Lanaux's clerk throughout all these transactions, and that consequently the bonds were at all times in Lanaux's possession, being in his bank box. The two must be taken together, as one is but the counterpart of the other: "(1) Can this court hold, as a proper interpretation of the law of pledge, that a debtor putting bonds in a package marked with the debtor's name, instructing his clerk to deliver,—the creditor apprised in advance that instructions will be given, and notified afterwards by the clerk,—consummates the pledge, although the instructions were not fulfilled, and the bonds always remained in the debtor's box? (2) Would any bank take such a pledge, i. e. lend money on the debtor's bonds, in his bank box, and on his direction to his clerk to deliver, or would the bank have any pledge unless the clerk delivered?" Both of these questions may be answered in the negative without in any manner affecting the claim of Mrs. Tassin.

If it be conceded that De Jaham was acting as Lanaux's clerk, in the transaction with

Mrs. Tassin, and that the collaterals remained in Lanaux's custody all the while, of course there was no pledge. But De Jaham was the third person agreed upon between Pierre Lanaux and Mrs. Tassin to hold the collaterals for the latter, and, though the box may have been the property of Pierre Lanaux, it was removed from his possession before the collaterals were placed in it; and, when the collaterals were deposited in the box, De Jaham locked it, and thereafter retained the key. Then De Jaham, assisted by the secretary and his employés, put the box in the safe of the insurance association, to which the secretary alone possessed the combination. No one had access to the box, but De Jaham; and the secretary gave him access to it after the death of Pierre Lanaux, he being accompanied by Denis Lanaux. And while it is true that De Jaham was the clerk of Pierre Lanaux, within the scope of the latter's business, he was at the same time the third person agreed upon by him and Mrs. Tassin to hold the securities for the latter. There is no incompatibility between the two positions. This was distinctly held in Weems v. Delta Moss Co., 83 La. Ann. 974; this court declaring that "the objection that the two custodians of the property pledged were employés of the company has no force, and cannot destroy the effect of delivery to Reichard." Consequently, this is not the case supposed, of collaterals being in a debtor's bank box, who had given his clerk instructions to deliver, which instructions he had not fulfilled; but it proceeds on the theory that De Jaham was the third person agreed upon by the parties, and that he had possession, with instructions to deliver to Mrs. Tassin on her demand, within the plain and evident meaning of the Code. But a further proof of Pierre Lanaux's lack of possession and control of the collaterals is furnished by the procuration that was annexed thereto, authorizing the pledgees (not De Jaham) to sell the collaterals. Such a mandate to the pledgee is an adjunct of the pledge, and inseparable from it. Such a mandate, in its nature, is irrevocable. Journal du Palais, 12 and 19, of 1827. And in Renshaw v. His Creditors, 40 La. Ann. 87, this court said: "The same principle applies in every case where the mandate is granted as a condition of the contract, or as a means of executing it. In such case the mandate, forming an element of a synallagmatic contract, is impressed with the qualities of such a contract, and is irrevocable. Journal du Palais, 7th July, 1837." And the court further observes: "It is plain that the powers of attorney, here involved, belonged to the class which has been described, forming important adjuncts to the contracts of pledge, themselves, and stipulated, in the interest of the mandatories, that the mandator had no power to revoke them, and hence they are equally irrevocable," etc. Renshaw v. His Creditors, supra. After its execution, Pierre Lanaux had no more power to revoke this mandate to the pledgee, to sell, than he had to revoke the note he had executed. When executed, and delivered into the hands of the depositary agreed upon between himself and Mrs. Tas-sin, the mandate became irrevocable, in so far as he was concerned.

The only question for consideration is whether the agreement between pledgeor and pledgee, and the possession of the third person agreed upon, was binding on Lanaux's creditors, or, in other words, whether Mrs. Tassin's privilege could be enforced on the proceeds of the securities pledged, in case they had seized and sold them, as they evidently had the right to do. Augé v. Variol, 81 La. Ann. 865. If the pledge in favor of Mrs. Tassin was in keeping with the code, it was evidently binding on the creditors of Lanaux; and, as the code authorized that a contract of pledge may be effected by delivery of possession of the thing pledged to a third person agreed upon by the parties, the only question in this case is whether De Jaham had an effectual possession of the bonds. The only figure that the secretary of the insurance association cuts in the transaction is that, being the custodian of the company's vault where the bank box was deposited, his custody proved the possession of De Jaham, and disproved the possession of Pierre Lanaux. If so, the code declares that the privilege of the pledgee does subsist on the thing given in pledge (1) when "it has been actually put and remains in the possession of the creditor;" (2) or when "it has been put and remains in the possession of a third person agreed upon between the parties." Rev. Civ. Code, 8163. The latter character of pledge has been frequently and recently recognized and enforced by this court, on evidence far less clear and cogent than that which is afforded by this record. In Conger v. New Orleans, 82 La. Ann. 1250, a case is presented of a demand for 28 year bonds of the city of New Orleans, which the city had pledged, retaining the bonds in her own possession,—she being the debtor,—and this court said: "Possession, though essential to the validity of the pledge, need not be always in the creditor. It is sufficient that the thing pledged be in one occupying, ad hoc, the position of a trustee. The debtor himself may in some cases be considered as such trustee, and be given possession of the thing by him pledged, provided his tenure be precarious, and clearly for the account of the creditor. The Louisiana doctrine is in perfect accord with the common, Roman, and French laws. See Rev. Civ. Code, 3163; Code Napoleon, 2076, and various cited authorities,—particularly, Pothier, Pandects; Bell's Comm.; Troplong, Nantissement; Dalloz, Répertoire; and Duranton. The authority of the Conger Case has been followed and approved by this court in many subsequent and well considered cases. In Weems v. Delta Moss Co., 83 La. Ann. 973, a case is stated of a pledge having been made of the building and factory of the company, and of its various movable effects, enumerated in the act of pledge, which was entered into between the president of the company and the creditor, appointing one of the company's employés as custodian; and that pledge was maintained against the creditors of the company, after it became insolvent, on the authority of the Conger Case. In Jacquet v. His

Creditors, 38 La. Ann. 863, a case is stated of a pledge having been executed of certain machinery used for the manufacture of tobacco, consisting of boilers, engines, cutters, etc., which was agreed to by the parties, who selected a third person as custodian,—the act of pledge stipulating a right of sale in the pledgee. Same was maintained against the creditors of the partnership after the surrender of the pledgeors, on the authority of the Conger and Jacquet Cases. In Woodward v. American Exposition R. Co., 39 La. Ann. 566, a controversy is stated between the plaintiff, asserting a privilege resulting from a pledge of certain iron rails and other appurtenances used in the construction of a railroad, and which had been secured by an act of pledge of the railroad and all of its appurtenances, by placing same in the custody of a third person named; the plaintiff's privilege being resisted by an intervenor claiming a privilege upon certain lumber he had sold the company for the purpose of building bridges, etc. The demand of the intervenor was rejected, and that of the plaintiff was sustained; his privilege as pledgee of the railroad, in its entirety, being sustained, as upon personal property, on the authority of the Conger, Weems, and Jacquet Cases. In Levy v. Ford, 41 La. Ann. 873, a case is stated of a pledge of a mortgage note for $7,000, for the security of two different claims of two different creditors; a third person holding possession as the mutual mandatory of the pledgeor and the two pledgees, they each having a limited interest in the pledged collateral. This pledge was maintained as against a competing mortgage creditor of the pledgeor. Peters v. Pacific Guano Co., 42 La. Ann. 690, presents the case of the agents of a company engaged in the manufacture of guano giving in pledge, to two lenders of money in Boston, on a cargo of guano, a bill of lading for the goods in transit to the consignee thereof at New Orleans, one of the pledgees holding for the two. This court not only maintained the pledge with respect to the people in Boston, but held, also, that it extended to the consignees of the agents in New Orleans, as well as to the New Orleans bank, to whom he assigned it for another and independent loan, all without the specific knowledge of the guano company, the agent's authority being purely derivative. On the authority of the foregoing well-considered cases, interpreting the provision of the code which declares that a privilege subsists on the thing given in pledge "if it has been put and remained in the hands of a third person agreed upon" (Rev. Civ. Code, 3162), the jurisprudence of this court may be considered thoroughly settled as to the question that is controverted in this case, not only with regard to the parties, inter se, but with regard to creditors, privileged as well as ordinary, even in insolvencies and successions.

As opposed to the foregoing decisions, the opposing creditors cite and rely on Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 24 L. ed. 779, which is a Louisiana case, and is predicated on Louisiana decisions and precepts of the civil law,—as stating a different rule. In that decision a case is stated of a New Orleans bank offering to make a pledge of collaterals as security to the Société de Crédit Mobilier, of Paris, France, for proposed acceptances; the bonds and notes to be placed on deposit with a third person named and agreed upon between the bank and the society, said third person becoming guarantor of the bank. The question raised in that case was whether "there was such a delivery and retention of possession of the collateral securities as to constitute a valid pledge by the law of Louisiana;" and, making answer to that query, the court said: "Clearly, they were never out of the possession of the officers of the bank, and were never out of the bank, for a single moment, but were always subject to its disposal, in any manner whatever, whether by collection, renewal, substitution, or exchange; and collections, when made, were for the account of the bank." In support of this opinion the court refers to only two decisions of this court as bearing on the question at issue, and those decisions were rendered in Geddes v. Bennett, 6 La. Ann. 516, and D'Meza's Succession, 26 La. Ann. 35. In those cases the pledges were not sustained. In the former a case is stated of certain barrels of whiskey being the object of the pledge, the creditor permitting the pledgeor to remove them to his own premises, on his simple receipt,—he subsequently making sale of them to another. In a suit of the pledgee against the purchaser, the sale was maintained. That case has not the least applicability, in my conception, to the Cavaroc Case, nor to the instant one, for the reason that it was not the case of a thing being given in pledge by placing it in the hands of a third person agreed on. In the latter case, certain creditors of the deceased, having made advances on the faith of an insurance policy, which he had left in the hands of his bookkeeper, with instructions to deliver, the right of pledge was denied on the ground that the creditors did not have the possession requisite to constitute a pledge; this court holding "that the policy was never beyond the control of D'Meza, and that Myers & Levy [creditors] never had the requisite possession thereof. The book-keeper never held the policy as agent or trustee for Myers & Levy. Although informed of his employer's intention in regard to one of the policies, he was never intrusted to deliver to Myers & Levy, or any one else. There was therefore no delivery of the policy to Myers & Levy, although the deceased intended to do so. Consequently, they never held it as a pledge, as collateral security for their accommodation indorsements." Our italics. It is evident, upon simple perusal of that paragraph of the opinion, that it was a case of alleged possession, by the creditor, of the collaterals, and not that of a third person agreed upon by the creditor and debtor. The two cases are exactly parallel, and, in my opinion, not in line with the Cavaroc Case. In that case the court made an extensive examination and collation of cases, and, in its summary, gives a very clear and comprehensive definition of the character of possession that is necessary to complete a pledge in the hands of a third person agreed on. "The difference," says the court, "ordinarily recognized between a mortgage [s. e. at common law] and a pledge is that title is transferred by the former, and possession by the latter. Indeed, possession may be considered as of the essence of a pledge (Pothier, Nantissement); and, if possession be once given up, the pledge, as such, is extinguished. The possession need not be actual. It may be constructive, as where the keys of a warehouse containing the goods pledged are delivered, or a bill of lading is assigned. In such case the act done will be considered as a token standing for the actual delivery of the goods. It places the property under the power and control of the creditor. In some cases, such constructive delivery cannot be effected without doing what amounts to a transfer of the property also. In such case there is a union of two distinct forms of security,—the pledge and mortgage; mortgage by virtue of the title, and a pledge by virtue of the possession. This advantage exists when notes and bills are transferred to a creditor by way of collateral security. The possession gives them the character of a pledge. The indorsement, if payable to order, and their delivery, if payable to bearer, gives him the title also, which is something more than a pledge. This double title existed in White v. Platt, 5 Denio, 269, and Clark v. Iselin, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 380, 22 L. ed. 568. Hence, the actual possession of the securities by the creditor was a matter of less importance in those cases." So, in the instant case the collaterals being of the class of commercial paper that is payable to bearer, and which consequently passes a complete title by mere delivery, De Jaham had title as well as possession,—his possession being evidenced by his possession of the key to the box in which the securities were kept, and to which no one else had access, and upon which the opponents acquired no right during Pierre Lanaux's lifetime. But, even if it is considered doubtful whether De Jaham held possession, independently of Lanaux, for the account of Mrs. Tassin, the court, in the Cavaroc Case, cited various cases in which precedents are given of privileges having been recognized, as against creditors, even when the pledgeor retained precarious possession of the thing pledged,—as intimated in the Conger Case. A case in point is that of Clark v. Iselin, supra, in which the court held that the pledge was not vitiated by the pledgee returning the collaterals pledged, to the pledgeor, for collection; also, the case of White v. Platt, supra, to same effect,—the court holding that in such case the pledgeor acts as the servant or agent of the pledgee, and the character of the security is not changed. A strong case of the kind is cited from the Massachusetts court (Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. 497), of a pledge having been maintained through the precarious possession of the pledgeor. The pledgeor was the proprietor of a brickyard, and the pledgee advanced the money requisite for the manufacture of bricks; the contract being that the bricks, as fast as made, should be pledged as security for the advances thus made, but the pledgeor was to retain the bricks in his charge, and sell them at retail, and deposit the proceeds in bank, to the credit of the pledgees. Before sale, the bricks in the yard of the pledgeor were attached for a debt; but the pledge was maintained, the court employing this language, viz.: "To say that the limited authority to sell the bricks by retail, in small sums, on account of the plaintiffs, was a waiver of their possession of the residue that remained in the kilns in their yard, would be clearly against the intent and meaning of the parties, unreasonable, and unwarranted by the evidence. The special authority given by the plaintiffs to the [brickmaker] was to clothe him with the character of an agent to a limited extent only, and no remission to him, in his character of pledgeor, of the plaintiffs' right to retain the bricks according to agreement." The creditor's attachment was dissolved, and the pledge maintained. An example of this kind is furnished by Troplong, in treating of article 2076 of the Code Napoleon,—of which article 8162 of our Code is but a repetition,—of a merchant in Bremen having pledged 60,000 bottles of Burgundy wine to a merchant of Baden, as security for a debt; the wine having been delivered to an agent of the pledgee, it having been agreed that the pledgeor should give it necessary attention and care. It so happened that the agent of the pledgee occasionally left the key of the vault in the possession of the pledgeor, and on one occasion the latter removed some of the bottles of wine to his own premises; and subsequently to his surrender in insolvency the syndic insisted that the pledge was null and void on that account,—the debtor and pledgeor not having been dispossessed of the wine. But the validity of the pledge was maintained, as against the creditors of the pledgeor in insolvency. Troplong, Nantissement, No. 811. A like interpretation is given of the Code Napoleon by other French commentators. 32 Dalloz, Répertoire, p. 455; 18 Duranton, No. 525 et seq. The court, in the Cavaroc Case, citing two leading state decisions, expresses the further opinion on this question, and says: "So, when the debtor is employed in the creditor's service, his temporary use of the pledged article in the creditor's business does not effect a restoration of the possession of the debtor. This is in accordance with the common and the civil law. Reeves v. Copper, 5 Bing. N. C. 186, was a case of this kind. A sea captain pledged his chronometer for a debt. He was afterwards employed by the pledgee as master of one of his ships, and the chronometer was placed in his charge, to be used on the voyage. It was held that the pledge was not lost. He recovered the chronometer, as against a person to whom the master had pledged it a second time. In Hayes v. Riddle, 1 Sandf. 248, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant, at his request, a convertible bond of the New York & Erie Railroad Company, which had been pledged by the latter to the former, in order to get it exchanged for stock of the same company, which was returned, and substituted for the bond in pledge. The defendant never returned either the bond or the stock.

The plaintiff brought action in trover against him for the bond, and recovered its value, being less than the debt for which it was pledged. Judge Story is in perfect accord with the views entertained by the supreme court, and, in the course of an elaborate discussion of the question, says: "As possession is necessary to complete the title by pledge, so, by the common law, the positive loss or delivering back of the possession of the thing, with the consent of the pledgee, terminates his title. However, if the thing is delivered back to its owner for a temporary purpose only, and it is agreed to be redelivered by him, the pledges may recover it against the owner, if he refuses to restore it, after the purpose is fulfilled. So, if it be delivered back to the owner in a new character, as, for example, as special bailee or agent. In such a case the pledgee will still be entitled to the pledge, not only as against the owner, but also as against third persons, for under such circumstances the possession is perfectly consistent with the existence of the original rights of the pledgee." Story, Bailm. § 299, citing various authorities.

In consideration of the authorities I have cited, I think it can be safely affirmed that the pledge in favor of Mrs. Tassin was good and valid—First, because the bonds were held by a third person agreed upon, with instructions to deliver on demand of the pledgee; second, because they were deposited in a vault over which the debtor had no control, and in a bank box, of which the third person agreed upon had the key; third, because the pledgeor had executed a power of attorney authorizing the pledgee to sell the thing pledged; fourth, because the debtor had credited his books with the amount of the pledged collaterals, and also the creditor's account; fifth, because the third person claimed possession just before the pledgeor's death, and was allowed to have access to the pledged collaterals after his death, the safe and vault being voluntarily opened by the secretary of the insurance association, and the box containing the securities unlocked by the third party in the presence of others and the secretary. And finally, if it be considered that the bonds were, after their deposit, in any manner, in the possession or under the control of Pierre Lanaux, through De Jaham, it was only a precarious possession, for the account of Mrs. Tassin, and which cannot be successfully opposed by the creditors of Lanaux, as against Mrs. Tassin. As the case herein presented justifies and establishes the sufficiency and completeness of Mrs. Tassin's pledge, our original opinion should, to that extent, be maintained; but as the proof fails, in my opinion, to show that the Hymels participated in the agreement selecting De Jaham as a third person to take and hold the collaterals specified, this contract of pledge, as to them, is lacking a vital element to give it force and efficacy, as to third persons and creditors of Pierre Lanaux, though it was perfectly good and valid as between the parties. The code requires that there must be an actual delivery to the creditor or pledgee of the thing pledged. This is an essential to the completion of the pledge. It is the test of its efficacy. But the code states, as an exception to this general rule, that if the thing be placed and remain in the hands of a third person, who is agreed upon by the parties, the privilege of the pledgee attaches to the thing pledged; and, having failed to participate in the agreement selecting De Jaham as custodian of the assets placed for the several accounts of the Hymels, their pledges were incomplete, and they acquired no lien or privilege on said assets. And in this respect the opposition of creditors must be maintained, and to that extent our former opinion and decree should be amended; and, as thus amended, affirmed.

McEnery, J., concurs in this opinion with respect to the claim of Mrs. Tassin, but dissents from the views expressed as to other parties, maintaining the correctness of the original opinion of the court, in its entirety.

v.

E. R. TAYLOR.

(46 La. Ann. —.)

- *1. The defendant was indicted for forgery. He signed the name of a number of drawers to a note, and signed an addendum to the note that he was their authorized agent. In a prosecution for forgery the defendant cannot be convicted of having falsely assumed to act as agent.
2. The instrument appears on its face to have been executed by an authorized agent, the defendant. An apparent agent is not guilty of forgery, though he had no authority in fact.

(July —, 1894.)

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the District Court for the Parish of Natchitoches, quashing an indictment charging defendant with forgery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. B. Dubuissou, Dist. Atty., for the State.

No appearance for appellee.

Breaux, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted for forgery. The note he is charged with having forged reads:

"69.28. On or by the 16th day of November next, we, or either of us, promise to pay J. P. Readhiner or bearer the sum of sixty-nine 88-100 dollars, for value received of him, bearing 8% from date till paid. This Feb. 3, 1890. Henry Weber. Boston Thomas. Taylor Mason Ray. Nat. NOTE.—For definition of forgery, see note to State v. Wheeler (Or.) 10 L. R. A. 779.

As to how far wrongfully assuming authority to sign as agent constitutes forgery, see subd. 2, a, in note to People v. Munroe (Cal.) 24 L. R. A. 87.

"I was authorized to sign the above names of the order. E. R. Taylor."

He moved to quash the indictment on the ground that the facts charged do not constitute the crime of forgery. This motion was sustained by the district court. From the order quashing the indictment the state appealed. Without brief or oral argument the appeal was submitted for decision.

The defendant is charged with having made an instrument purporting to be a note signed by a number of persons. The facts, as charged, are that he executed an instrument purporting on its face to be executed by him as agent. Assuming that the facts are correctly charged, forgery is not the crime the defendant has committed. Forgery is defined as the making or altering of a writing so as to make the alteration purport to be the act of another person. This definition does not embrace the making of a note per procuration of the party whom he intends to represent. The false assumption of authority is not the forgery denounced by the statute, and falsely assuming to act as agent of the maker of the instrument does not make the alteration purport to be the act of another. It is his own unauthorized and wrongful act, and not the fraudulently falsifying of another's name, as in forgery. It was not a false making of another's signature. It did not purport to be the signatures of the drawers personally, but their signatures as written by the defendant acting as an agent. He did not personate others, and fraudulently write their names, but stated on the face of the instrument that he was an authorized agent. This did not constitute forgery, though he may have had no authority in fact. The agency expressed takes the instrument out of the category of false making in the sense of forgery.

Mr. Wharton, in his work on Criminal Law [8th ed.] (vol. 1, p. 668), says that to sign the name of another without authority is forgery when similitude is attempted. There was no attempt made to imitate the signatures of the drawers, or to impose by attempting to create the impression that they had signed. To constitute the offense, there must be some attempt made to imitate a genuine instrument, and the writing falsely made must purport to be the writing of another. These elements of forgery are not proved by the instrument copied in the indictment. From 2 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 819, we quote, as pertinent: "If a man draw, accept, or indorse a bill of exchange in the name of another, without his authority, it is forgery. But if he sign it with his own name, per procuration of the party whom he intends to represent, it is no forgery; it is no false making of the instrument, but merely false assumption of authority." Mr. Bishop, in his Criminal Law (vol. 2, p. 582), is equally as clear and positive that "indorse a bill of exchange under a false assumption of authority to indorse it per procuration is not forgery, there being no false making." The crime charged was false making and forgery. In fine, we are persuaded, after an examination of a number of authorities, that an instrument which shows on its face that the person signed as agent of the drawer of a note cannot be the subject of forgery. The act has not one of the essentials of the crime of forgery,—a false making of an instrument apparently genuine. The falsehood, if there is falsehood, is in the agency,—in assuming to act as agent,—and not in forging an instrument.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from quashing the indictment be affirmed, the indictment being invalid and void.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

Re B. R. FOSS.

(.....Cal.....)

1. The existence of a treaty which provides for extradition for certain crimes does not deprive either nation of the power and right to exercise its own discretion to surrender criminals in cases not coming within the terms of the treaty.
2. The surrender as an act of comity by a foreign nation of a fugitive whose crime is not one for which the treaty required his surrender does not violate any right secured to him by the treaty, or entitle him to his discharge on habeas corpus.
3. The discharge of a person who has been surrendered by a foreign nation in extradition proceedings on setting aside the indictment against him does not prevent his arrest on a subsequent complaint for the same offense.

(May 2, 1894.)

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the discharge of petitioner from the custody of the sheriff of Plumas County to which he had been committed under a charge of embezzlement after having been extradited from the Hawaiian Islands. Petition remanded. The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. E. McLaughlin, for petitioner:

A treaty concluded between any foreign country and the United States is "the supreme law of the land."

U. S. Const. art. 6; United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 871.

The offense of embezzlement or embezzlement of public moneys is not enumerated among the offenses for which extradition may be had in the treaty between the Hawaiian Islands and the United States.

Treaty with Hawaiian Islands, §14; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 7, p. 606; 2 Moore, Extradition, p. 1102.

When a treaty has been entered into, naming certain crimes as the ones for which extradition may be had, this must be regarded as declaring that only such offenses as are named in the treaty are extraditable. There is no authority to demand for any other.

1 Moore, Extradition, p. 5; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 617; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 47; United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 872;

NOTE.—Effect upon prisoner's rights of necessity of amendment of charge upon which he was extradited.

The old view of this subject seems to have been that it was immaterial what changes were necessary in the indictment. When once the pursuing government had acquired possession of the person of the fugitive it could proceed to try and convict him of any offense which he could be proven to have committed. The position of the United States government upon the question is well shown in a controversy which it had with Great Britain over a fugitive whose surrender it had demanded from that government.

In Winslow's Case, the fullest statement of which is to be found in 2 Wharton's International Law Dig. 759, upon an application for extradition to Great Britain, that country insisted upon the right to exact a stipulation as a condition of the surrender of the criminal that he should not be tried for any offense committed prior to his surrender, other than the extradition crimes proved by the facts upon which the surrender would be granted. The United States government took the position that such a requirement was not within the terms of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and stated that it should regard the provisions of the treaty as abrogated if such stipulation was insisted upon. The secretary of state cited the opinions of numerous authorities to the effect that where a criminal was in good faith demanded for one offense within the treaty and surrendered therefor, there was no agreement, understanding, or practice so far as the two countries in question were concerned that he might not be placed on trial for another offense with which he was charged in addition to the extradition crime. The English courts discharged Winslow from custody, and the president of the United States sent a message to congress announcing that the provisions of the treaty between the two countries upon the subject of extradition must be considered as having been abrogated by such action. Great Britain subsequently withdrew from its position, as it said temporarily until a new treaty could be negotiated, 25 L. R. A.

and rearrested and surrendered such of the criminals who had been discharged pending the correspondence as were still within its jurisdiction.

The above position was in accordance with decisions of courts in the United States which were called upon to pass upon the question.

Thus in United States v. Caldwell, 8 Blatchf. 131, a plea to an indictment for bribing an officer of the United States which set up that defendant was brought into the jurisdiction under extradition proceedings in which he was charged with forgery, was held bad, and a similar ruling was made in United States v. Lawrence, 13 Blatchf. 295, where one indicted for forgery attempted to defeat the jurisdiction, on the ground that the forgery for which he was placed on trial was not the one for which he was indicted.

So in the court of appeals of New York it was held that the prisoner may be detained even for the purpose of a civil suit. Adrian v. Lagrave, 59 N. Y. 110, 17 Am. Rep. 317, rev'g the reasoning in the lower courts as reported in 1 Hun, 689, and 45 How. Pr. 301.

One who after escaping from prison where he was confined under conviction for burglary, if extradited for robbery and assault with intent to commit murder, may be held on his former conviction, although the extradition charges against him are ignored by the grand jury. Re Miller, 23 Fed. Rep. 32.

So the attorney-general has held that fugitives when surrendered to justice without more being said, are surrendered thereto generally, absolutely and simply. 15 Ops. Atty-Gen. 500.

The jurisdiction of the courts is not restricted to the extradition crime. 15 Ops. Atty-Gen. 514.

But when the question came before the supreme court of the United States it was held that a person who has been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by virtue of proceedings under an extradition treaty can only be tried for one of the offenses described in the treaty and for the offense with which he is charged in the proceedings for his extradition until a reasonable time and opportunity have been given him after his release or trial upon

United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 30 L. ed. 425.

A person brought from a foreign country can only be tried for an extraditable offense.

People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 274; Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 627; Spear, Extradition, §§ 602-604; Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 421; United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 370; United States v. Rauscher, supra; Ex parte Coy, 32 Fed. Rep. 911; Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697, 26 Am. Rep. 242; State v. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio St. 273, 48 Am. Rep. 431; 1 Moore, Extradition, p. 191.

A right of person or property secured or recognized by treaty may be set up as a defense to a prosecution in disregard of either with the same force and effect as if the right was secured by an act of congress.

Ex parte Hibbs, and United States v. Rauscher, supra.

A person extradited cannot waive his rights or privileges of exception under the provisions of the treaty.

Ex parte Coy, 32 Fed. Rep. 911; 2 Moore, Extradition, p. 251.

Under the implied restrictions contained in the Hawaiian treaty as well as under the express provision of said treaty and the rights guaranteed thereunder, the compulsory method used by both countries through the authorities of each to procure his return to California were in violation of the rights of the petitioner as a citizen of the Hawaiian Islands, and the treaty being as it is not only an international law but the supreme law of the United States its protection was his, and the demand of the governor, the request of the United States minister, his arrest in the Hawaiian Islands, his delivery to John S. Bransford, and his return to California through such legal compulsion used and against which he could not rebel, were each and all acts in violation of a right of person secured and recognized by the treaty and a direct violation by Minister Willis and Governor Markham of a law of the United States. The right of one government to demand and receive from another the custody of an offender who has sought an asylum upon its soil depends upon the existence of treaty stipulations between them, and in all cases is derived from and is measured and restricted by the provisions express or implied of the treaty.

United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 378.

It is impossible to conceive of the exercise of jurisdiction for any other purpose than that mentioned in the treaty and ascertained by the proceedings under which the party was extradited, without an implication of fraud upon the rights of the party extradited, and of bad faith to the country which permitted his extradition.

United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, such charge, to return to the country from which asylum he had been forcibly taken under such proceedings. United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 30 L. ed. 425.

In the Rauscher Case, the defendant was extradited under a charge of murder and was placed on trial under an indictment for an assault and unlawfully inflicting upon a seaman cruel and unusual punishment contrary to the provisions of a statute of the United States. It was insisted that the evidence upon which he was convicted of the charge for which he was indicted was the same as that upon which the magistrate acted in surrendering him and that therefore it was proper to try him for the lower offense. The court in answer to this contention said: "It may be very true that evidence which satisfied that officer that the prisoner was guilty of the crime of murder would also establish that he had inflicted cruel and unusual punishment on the person for whose murder he was charged; but as the treaty only justified his delivery on the ground that he was proved to be guilty of murder, before the committing magistrate, it does not follow at all that such magistrate would have delivered him on a charge founded on precisely the same evidence, of inflicting cruel and unusual punishment, an offense for which the treaty made no provision, and which was of a very unimportant character when compared with that of murder. If the party could be convicted on an indictment for inflicting cruel and unusual punishment where the grand jury would not have found an indictment for murder, the treaty could always be evaded by making a demand on account of the higher offense defined in the treaty, and then only seeking a trial and conviction for the minor offense not found in the treaty. We do not think the circumstance that the same evidence might be sufficient to convict for the minor offense which was produced before the committing magistrate to support the graver charge justifies this departure from the principles of the treaty."

The Rauscher Case is regarded in England as settling the law, here, to the effect that the extradited person cannot be tried for an offense other than 25 L. R. A.

that mentioned in the extradition proceedings. Re Woodhall, London Times, May 10, 1883; 1 Moore, Extradition, § 166. And the charge for which the prisoner in the Woodhall Case was surrendered having failed, she was discharged and returned to England, although the attempt was made to hold her on another charge. 1 Moore, Extradition, § 167.

The Rauscher Case is in accord with some decisions which had been previously rendered in this country, and of course it has furnished the rule since.

The trial is limited to the offense charged in the extradition proceedings. Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697, 26 Am. Rep. 242; State v. Vanderpool, 39 Ohio St. 273, 48 Am. Rep. 431; Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 627.

A defendant cannot be extradited for the murder of one person and tried for the murder of another. Ex parte Coy, 32 Fed. Rep. 911.

There can be no trial for other than an extradition crime. United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 370.

A prisoner will not be surrendered upon a charge of murder, if the evidence shows only manslaughter. Re Kelley, 2 Low. Dec. 339.

One extradited for forgery under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain cannot be tried for uttering forged instruments. Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 421.

But in another case, Re Adutt, 55 Fed. Rep. 376, in which there was a request for one upon the ground that he had committed forgery, and the evidence showed that he had uttered forged instruments, the court held that forgery includes uttering forged instruments and that the prisoner was not, therefore, entitled to his discharge.

After the decision of the Rauscher Case, the question arose whether or not a conviction could be had of a lower offense included in the offense charged in the extradition proceedings.

A letter by Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, dated May 26, 1885, expresses the opinion that a conviction may be had of a lower offense which is included in the one for which the extradition is obtained, although the lower offense would not of itself be sufficient to procure the extradition.

421, 80 L. ed. 425, 429; 1 Moore, Extradition, p. 288.

The principle that an extradited fugitive from justice can be tried only for the crimes named in the treaty between the extradition countries does not apply where a party was forcibly taken from a foreign country and not under an extradition warrant.

Ker v. People, 110 Ill. 627, 51 Am. Rep. 706; United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 436, 80 L. ed. 434.

It appears in the petition that the only evidence of a charge and the only charge considered was the indictment. The whole matter was probably governed by the McCarthy Case in which the Hawaiian government stated that an indictment would be accepted by them as proof of a charge.

Moore, Extradition, pp. 760-762.

This was the precedent upon which they acted and upon which they accepted the request of Minister Willis as made for the government of the United States, a similar request having been made in that case. This was the charge upon which B. R. Foss was extradited. A charge "must be in the form of an indictment found or affidavit made before a magistrate," and in cases of extradition "a copy of such indictment of affidavit certified as authentic, etc." shall be produced as evidence that the charge has been made in proper manner.

Spear, Extradition, p. 281.

Upon that particular charge and upon that alone the foreign government extradited petitioner. He came before the court in which such indictment was found and filed, and upon a hearing the court set the indictment aside, thus establishing by its order in the premises that no such charge existed, or had ever existed, and the prisoner was thereupon by an order of the court to that effect released and went on his way.

Thus the Hawaiian government had been deceived, and it seems to us the whole proceedings had were as naught in any court. As no valid charge existed when the demand was made the demand was unauthorized and void.

The evidence upon which the extradition warrant was based having fallen and the defendant having been released, he could not be subjected to further restraint "until a reasonable time had been given him after his release on that particular charge in which to return to the country from which he was extradited."

7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 617; United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 427, 80 L. ed. 433; Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 421.

But the supreme court of New York at special term has decided that one extradited for assault with intent to kill cannot be convicted of an assault in the second degree. People v. Hannan, 9 Misc. 600,—and such decision would seem to be the only one possible in view of the Rauscher Case, and the court's statement of its effect in Ker v. Illinois, 119 U. S. 436, 80 L. ed. 421, that the accused should be tried for no other offense than the one for which he was delivered under the extradition proceedings.

That leaves as the sole question for consideration, How far must the indictment as first drawn be technically accurate? Ex parte Foss, appears to be the pioneer case upon this question, although in a Texas case the court had held that the fact that the indictment is different from the charge made before the magistrate, is immaterial if it corresponds with that made in the extradition papers. Kelly v. State, 13 Tex. App. 158.

And in People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 274, the court concedes that the defendant can only be tried for the offense for which he was extradited; but holds that it is sufficient if the offense charged is the same as that for which he is put on trial, although the terms of the charge in the extradition paper may have been different from those in the information presented at the trial.

The Canadian cases.

The Canadian cases seem to agree with the rule as maintained by the United States in its controversy with Great Britain in the Winslow Case.

In Rosenbaum's Case, 18 L. C. Jur. 633, 2 Whart. International Law Dig. 773, 1 Moore, Extradition, § 422, the Supreme Court of Canada refused to interfere with the rendition of a prisoner, on the ground that the laws of the United States, from which country the request came, did not prohibit the trial of such prisoner for offenses other than those for which he was extradited. The court says: "I am not aware that it has been laid down in England that a man once within the jurisdiction of English courts can set up the form of his arrest or the mode by which he came into custody as a reason for a discharge when accused of crime."

352, the prisoner was extradited for forgery and was tried and found guilty of uttering a forged promissory note.

In Reg. v. Van Aerman, 4 U. C. C. P. 238, 2 Whart. International Law Dig. 764, the defendant was surrendered by the United States to Canada on the charge of forgery, and application was made for his release on the ground that his offense was obtaining money under false pretenses, and the court in denying the motion said that while disposed to regard the offense as forgery, yet being in custody he was liable to prosecution for any offense which the facts would support.

In Re Burley, 1 L. J. N. S. 34, 2 Whart. International Law Dig. 765, the prisoner was extradited on the charge of robbery and tried on assault with intent to kill.

In Reg. v. Cunningham, Cassell's Dig. 1885-86, p. 107, a prisoner extradited for forgery was convicted for uttering a forged order for payment of money. The question of the right to try the prisoner upon such charge was raised at the trial and discussed to some extent, but as the court of appeals held that the proof did not support the indictment and discharged the prisoner, the question was not authoritatively passed upon.

In Reg. v. Waddell, 25 N. B. Rep. 93, the court was equally divided upon the question whether or not one who being in prison under charge of arson, escaped and was extradited for that offense, could be placed upon trial for the prison breach.

The English rule.

In one case for which the British government disclaimed responsibility in the controversy over Winslow the rule claimed by the United States seems to have been followed.

In Re Heilbronn, 2 Whart. International Law Dig. 764, there was an extradition for forgery, upon which charge there was an acquittal, and then the prisoner was tried and convicted of larceny.

But the English statute provides that the prisoner can be tried for only the charge on which he was extradited. See Bouvier's Case, 37 L. T. N. S. 844, 43 L. J. Q. B. 17.

H. F. F.

To obtain the surrender of a man on one charge and then to put him on trial for another, is a gross abuse of the constitutional compact.

The fugitive surrendered to one charge is exempt from prosecution upon any other. He is within the state by compulsion of law upon a single accusation. He has a right to have that disposed of, and then to depart in peace.

7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 618.

Mr. H. S. Webb for respondent.

DeHaven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner, Foss, was indicted by the grand jury of the county of Plumas for the crime of embezzlement. At the date of the finding of this indictment the petitioner was in Honolulu, and there remained until February, 1894, when, upon the request of the American minister, and upon "a requisition to that effect" from the governor of the state of California, he was surrendered by the provisional government of the Hawaiian Islands to the agent appointed by the governor to receive and convey him back to this state, there to be tried for the offense with which he was charged in the indictment referred to. The treaty between the United States and the government of the Hawaiian Islands in relation to the extradition of fugitives from the justice of either of such countries does not provide for the extradition of a person charged with the crime of embezzlement, and the warrant issued by the Hawaiian government for the arrest of the petitioner, and for his delivery to the agent appointed by the governor of this state to receive him into custody, does not refer to the treaty, but the proceedings preliminary to the issuance of such warrant were conducted in accordance with the rules prescribed by the treaty to effect the extradition of a person charged with either of the offenses for which extradition is there provided. The petitioner, upon his return to this state, was brought before the superior court of Plumas county, in which the said indictment against him was pending, and he then moved to set the indictment aside. The motion was granted, and he was discharged from custody, and within two hours thereafter a complaint was filed with a justice of the peace, charging him with the same embezzlement named in the indictment previously set aside, and he was again arrested, and, after examination, held to answer the charge before the superior court of Plumas county; and he is now in the custody of the sheriff of that county awaiting his trial.

The petitioner claims that his imprisonment under the circumstances here stated is illegal, and he seeks to be discharged therefrom under the writ of habeas corpus upon which he has been brought before this court. In support of this general contention he insists that his arrest in the foreign country, and enforced return to this state, and detention here for the purpose of being tried for the crime charged in the indictment, was and is in violation of his rights under the treaty between the United States and the government of the Hawaiian Islands. That treaty, in article 14, provides: "The contracting parties mutually agree to surrender, upon official requisition to the authorities of each, all persons who being charged with the crimes of murder, piracy, arson, robbery, forgery or the utterance of forged paper, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall be found within the territories of the other, provided that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime had there been committed." 9 Stat. at L. p. 981. It is argued that the treaty, in thus enumerating the offenses for which fugitives who have sought an asylum in either country shall be delivered into the custody of the other upon demand of its government, in effect prohibits the surrender by either nation of a person charged with any other than one of the mentioned crimes; that the treaty is to be construed as containing an implied stipulation upon the part of the United States that a person committing any other crime against its laws than one of those named in the treaty, and who thereafter escapes to Hawaii, shall not be subject to arrest and return to the United States, there to be tried for such nonenumerated crime, even though the government of Hawaii should voluntarily surrender him for that purpose as a matter of comity. In our opinion, the language of this treaty will not bear such a construction. It is, of course, true that, when a treaty provides for the extradition of fugitives charged with particular crimes, the reciprocal duty of delivering up to the justice of the other persons charged with crime is confined to the particular cases for which the treaty has provided. Com. v. Harves, 13 Bush, 708, 26 Am. Rep. 242; United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 411, 412, 30 L. ed. 425. Thus in Com. v. Harves, just cited, it is said: "The right of one government to demand and receive from another the custody of an offender who has sought asylum upon its soil depends upon the existence of treaty stipulations between them, and in all cases is derived from and is measured and restricted by the provisions, express and implied, of the treaty." But, while this is so, the existence of a treaty which provides for extradition for certain crimes does not deprive either nation of the power and right to exercise its own discretion in cases not coming within the terms of the treaty. It is only to the extent that the treaty imposes an obligation to surrender persons charged with particular offenses that there is any restriction placed upon the sovereign right of the nation in which the fugitive is found to either permit or refuse to permit his arrest and return to the country from which he has fled. In other words, in relation to persons charged with offenses not named in the treaty, each government, as an incident of its sovereignty, may either grant or deny to the fugitive an asylum within its jurisdiction. This conclusion is so obviously correct that no extended argument is necessary to sustain it, and the principle is thus stated in section 269 of volume 2 of Wharton's International Law Digest: "The rule, 'expressio unius est exclusio alterius,' applies to extradition treaties, and under such treaties process can be sustained only for enumerated offenses. This, however, would not preclude in extraordinary cases, and an appeal, not on the basis of the treaty, but on the ground of comity, for surrender of a fugitive charged with a nonenumerated offense, when such offense is one which would justify such an extraordinary measure. . . . Thus, in 1796, the secretary of state [Mr. Pickering] 'expresses his concurrence with Mr. Liston [British minister at Washington] in the opinion that, while the reciprocal delivery of murderers and forgers is expressly stipulated in the twenty-seventh article of our treaty with Great Britain, the two governments are left at liberty to deliver other offenders, as propriety and mutual advantage shall direct. . . . The attorney-general has just called, and thinks the opinion expressed to be correct.' Mr. Pickering to the president June 8, 1796. MSS. Dom. Let. In a letter of same date to the governor of Vermont, Mr. Pickering says: 'The reciprocal delivery of murderers and forgers is positively stipulated by the twenty-seventh article of the treaty. The conduct of the two governments with respect to other offenders is left, as before the treaty, to their mutual discretion; but this discretion will doubtless advise the delivery of culprits for offenses which affect the great interests of society.' " The crime with which the petitioner is charged, not being an extraditable offense under the treaty between the United States and the government of the Hawaiian Islands, it must be presumed that the surrender of the petitioner was made by the latter in the exercise of its own sovereign discretion, and as an act of comity. This violated no right secured to the petitioner by the treaty referred to, as that treaty does not in terms or by necessary implication deny to that government the right to surrender, or deprive the United States of the right upon such surrender to receive into its custody fugitives charged with offenses not enumerated in the treaty. The cases of United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 30 L. ed. 425; Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697, 26 Am. Rep. 242; United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 370, 14 Fed. Rep. 180; Ex parte Hibbs, 26 Fed. Rep. 421,—cited and relied upon by petitioner, do not sustain his contention upon this point. Those cases simply declare that when a defendant has been surrendered in pursuance of a treaty for trial upon a specific charge named therein, he cannot be placed upon trial for any other than the particular offense named in the extradition proceeding. This rule is well settled, but it has no application whatever to the case presented by the petitioner here.

It is also contended in behalf of petitioner that he was only surrendered by the government of the Hawaiian Islands for trial upon the indictment referred to in the warrant issued by that government commanding his arrest and delivery into the custody of the agent authorized to convey him back to this state, and that, when this indictment was set 25 L. R. A.

aside, he had fully met its accusation, and was entitled to a reasonable time within which to return to the foreign asylum, and that he cannot be lawfully detained here to answer the complaint upon which he is now held for trial before the superior court. If it should be conceded that a fugitive from justice, surrendered by a foreign government on grounds of comity, has the same right to his discharge upon habeas corpus, when imprisoned upon a different charge than that for which he was delivered up, as if he had been extradited under the provisions of a treaty, and arrested and detained for trial upon another offense than that named in the extradition proceedings, in violation of the implied provisions of the treaty, still we do not think the petitioner here would be entitled to a discharge upon the facts appearing in this record. The order setting aside the indictment did not operate as an acquittal of the petitioner for the offense therein charged, and is not a bar to his further prosecution for the same offense by indictment or information; and, as he is now held by virtue of an order of commitment based upon a complaint charging him with the identical offense named in the indictment set aside, and to answer which he was surrendered by the Hawaiian government for trial by the state, the petitioner should be remanded.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The petitioner, Foss, was indicted by the grand jury of Plumas county, in this state, for the crime of embezzlement. At the time of the indictment he was in the Hawaiian Islands. A requisition was made upon the government of the island for his extradition here to answer the charge preferred by said indictment, and under extradition proceedings he was returned to said Plumas county. He moved to set aside the indictment, and his motion was granted, and he was discharged from custody. Within two hours afterwards a complaint for embezzlement was made before a justice of the peace, and he was arrested upon a warrant issued by said justice. He now applies to this court under the proceeding of habeas corpus to be discharged. There is a treaty between the government of the Hawaiian Islands and the government of the United States for the return from one to the other country of persons charged with certain enumerated crimes; but the crime of embezzlement is not one of the crimes so enumerated. Said treaty is to be found in 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 606.

The first point made by petitioner is that he cannot be returned to this country and tried here for any crime not enumerated in the treaty. There are certain very strong authorities to sustain this point, particularly Com. v. Hawes, 13 Bush, 697, 26 Am. Rep. 242; United States v. Watts, 8 Sawy. 370, 14 Fed. Rep. 130; Holmes' Case, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 593, 10 L. ed. 605; United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 407, 30 L. ed. 425; Spear, Extradition, pp. 205, 221, et seq. The questions raised by this point need not, however, be here passed upon definitely, because we think that the petitioner should be discharged upon the second point made by his counsel, to wit, that, the indictment upon which the extradition was secured having been set aside, and the petitioner entirely discharged, he cannot afterwards be held upon a complaint before a justice of the peace, without having been given reasonable time to return to the country from whence he was brought. The treaty above mentioned provides that a person charged with crime shall be extradited only "upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been committed there. It further provides that the person demanded shall be brought before a court of the country in which he is, "to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered;" and if, upon such hearing, the magistrate is satisfied that the evidence sustains the charge, he may issue a warrant for the surrender of the fugitive. Now, in the case at bar it appears that the judge at the Hawaiian Islands was presented with a certified copy of the indictment that had been found against the petitioner, with the affidavit of the foreman of the grand jury, and that he acted entirely upon the sufficiency of the evidence as afforded by said indictment. And the indictment upon which the authorities of the Hawaiian Islands acted, and which it may reasonably be supposed was considered as sufficient evidence for action there, having been set aside and held invalid by the court in Plumas county, and the prisoner having been discharged under said indictment upon which the extradition papers were based, he could not be held upon a complaint before a magistrate and proceedings which were entirely unknown to the authorities of the Hawaiian Islands, and upon which their order for the arrest of the fugitive was not in any way based. As was said in Com. v. Hawes, supra: "By providing the terms and conditions upon which a warrant for the arrest of the alleged fugitive may be issued, and confining the duty of making the surrender to cases in which the evidence of criminality is sufficient, according to the laws of the place where such fugitive is found, to justify his commitment for trial, the right of the demanding government to decide finally as to the propriety of the demand and as to the evidences of guilt is as plainly excluded as if that right had been denied by express language. It would scarcely be regarded an abuse of the rules of construction, from these manifest restrictions, unaided by extraneous considerations, to deduce the conclusion that it was not contemplated by the contracting parties that an extradited prisoner should, under any circumstances, be compelled to defend himself against a charge other than one upon which he is surrendered, much less against one for which his extradition could not be demanded." And I think the right under the treaty is one which the petitioner himself may assert. The petitioner, in my opinion, should be discharged from custody.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

F. C. WHITING, Appt.,

v.

C. H. ADAMS.

(.....Vt.....)

1. The mortgagee in a common-law mortgage covering both land and crops, who, after filing a bill for foreclosure, seizes the crops and proceeds to sell them under the provisions of the law relating to the foreclosure of chattel mortgages, is guilty of conversion and must account for them at their market value.
2. The value of the lumber at the place of disposal, without any allowance for expenditure in wrongfully cutting and removing standing timber from the premises, is the measure of damages against a mortgagee in possession for thus wrongfully wasting the premises after he had received all that was due him on his mortgage by conversion of personal property.

(Start, J., dissents.)

(July 16, 1894.)

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Chancery Court for La Moille County directing complainant to account for certain property which he had taken in proceedings for the foreclosure of his mortgage. Affirmed.

Adams had been the owner of certain real estate for many years. He gave a mortgage on it to C. A. Ober. Ober foreclosed the mortgage and obtained the legal title. He conveyed this to H. A. Jackson, who had made an arrangement with Adams by which Adams was to repay him the amount paid to Ober, with a small advance thereon and to retain possession the payments to be made, a certain amount down and the remainder in designated annual payments. Jackson was to have a lien on the crops to secure each annual payment and Adams was to refrain from committing waste. After part of the purchase money had been repaid to Jackson, he assigned his rights under the contract to F. C. Whiting the complainant in this action. Adams being behind in one payment, Whiting filed a bill to foreclose the mortgage, took possession of the premises, sold some of the personal property, and cleared a wood-lot and carried away the wood. The facts having been brought to the attention of the chancellor, he rendered the following decree: "That the orator account to the defendant for the gross value of the timber cut on the mortgaged premises, found by the master to be the sum of $816.20; for loss occasioned by cutting stumps too high $12; for hay in bay $137; and on scaffold $18; for rent of premises to the date hereof $21.33; and for corn as found by the master $7.50; making in all the sum of $1,012.08, with interest thereon from such times as the report shows interest should be cast, to the date hereof.

NOTE.—The question of measure of damages for destruction of trees is fully treated in the note to Bailey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (8. Dak.) 19 L. R. A. 658, and authorities upon the question of 25 L. R. A.

It is further ordered that the mortgage debt be treated as all due and payable at the date hereof, and the amount thereof at this date be ascertained and adjudged to be $690.30, and enough of the said sum of $1,012.08 is applied thereon to pay and extinguish the same and leave nothing due on the mortgage. A surplus is left in the hands of the orator belonging to the defendant, but it is considered that the defendant cannot have a decree for its payment, nor for the possession of the premises without a cross-bill. If no cross-bill is filed, let the original bill be dismissed with costs to the defendant and in any event, in view of the unnecessary and offensive conduct of the orator, let the defendant recover his costs."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. B. A. Hunt, for appellant:

The orator had a common law chattel mortgage on the crops and caused the same to be foreclosed in method furnished for foreclosure of chattel mortgages, and the sale is conclusive and its proceeds are what should be accounted for and all evidence should have been excluded, as well as other evidence excepted to in said report.

Taggart v. Packard, 39 Vt. 628; Calkins v. Clement, 51 Vt. 635; White River Bank v. Downer, 29 Vt. 332.

Orator should account for rents and profits, what he did receive or what he ought to receive, managing prudently. He should account for stumpage value received or what he ought to receive, managing the same prudently. The report shows nothing that he has actually received at time of hearing from anything except the sale, so if there is any doubt about the amount the court will balance interests by the rents in some cases.

Wright v. Parker, 2 Aik. 212.

If a mortgagor is not bound to pay expense of getting timber out, he should not have gross value of the same; and if he is entitled to gross value of the same, then he should pay this expense of getting it out.

Ross, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition to foreclose in legal effect, a mortgage. The parties agree that they stand, in regard to the premises, in the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee. This admits that the defendant has an equity in all the property embraced in the contract sought to be foreclosed. The orator cannot rely upon any other rights than those of mortgagor, however absolute his paper title to the property. Davis v. Hemenway, 27 Vt. 589. The defendant had been in possession of the premises many years. He gave a mortgage on them, which was foreclosed and became absolute April 30, 1889. H. A. Jackson bought out the orator in the foreclosure proceedings, and on the same day bargained them to the defendant, upon his agreeing to pay $1,180 therefor. This sum was to be paid on time, extending over several years. It is apparent that Jackson held the title to the premises as security for the payment of that sum. The defendant had remained in possession. By the contract he was still to remain in possession, carry on the premises without suffering or committing waste, and, if he cut any lumber, pay Jackson an agreed stumpage. Jackson also thereby retained a lien on all crops grown each year, until the payment for that year was fully made. The defendant paid to Jackson $550 before November, 1892. He was then behind, in the payment of that year, $150, and some interest. The orator purchased Jackson's interest in the premises, and took a deed thereof, agreeing to carry out Jackson's contract with the defendant. This was August 18, 1892. November 1, 1892, he brought this petition, which was served on the defendant November 24, 1892. Soon after the orator went to the premises, and found the house locked, and the defendant temporarily absent. He effected an entrance, removed all of the defendant's things, including his livestock, put in a tenant, forbade the defendant to enter, and caused his arrest for entering. He took possession of the crops grown that year, which, at a fair valuation, were worth more than enough to pay all that was then due under the contract. The premises were ample security for all that was to become due under the contract. There was a timber lot on the premises. The orator soon entered upon that, and stripped it of everything that was valuable. Waiting thirty days after taking possession, the orator placed the land contract in the hands of a deputy sheriff, who proceeded to sell the crops grown on the premises, under the provisions of the statute for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage.

The first question arising is whether this sale was authorized by law. The land contract in which the lien was reserved was not a chattel mortgage. It was not executed as required for a valid chattel mortgage. Rev. Laws, §§ 1966, 1967. If in other respects duly executed,—which we do not consider, nor determine,—it was not sworn to by the parties to it. The method of foreclosure pursued by the orator was a part of the act authorizing chattel mortgages, and applicable only to such mortgages as are executed in accordance with its provisions. Longey v. Leach, 57 Vt. 377; Howard v. Witters, 60 Vt. 578; Stafford v. Adair, 57 Vt. 63; Calkins v. Clement, 54 Vt. 635. Although the land contract does not run to Jackson and his assigns, yet the title to the premises was vested in him. Hence, the title to the emblements, or annual crops grown thereon, vested in him, except so far as they were released by the contract. By that the title to the yearly grown crops between the parties to that contract was held by Jackson as security until the payment of that year was made. Paris v. Vail, 18 Vt. 277; Smith v. Atkins, Id. 461; Briggs v. Oaks, 26 Vt. 188; Briggs v. Bennett, Id. 146; Gray v. Stevens, 28 Vt. 1, 65 Am. Dec. 216; Esdon v. Colburn, 28 Vt. 631; Lealand v. Sprague, Id. 746; Baxter v. Bush, 29 Vt. 465, 70 Am. Dec. 429; Bellows v. Wells, 36 Vt. 599; Cooper v. Cole, 38 Vt. 191. But the defendant, in legal effect, being a mortgagor in possession, the crops grown by him might possibly have been held, if attached by his creditors. Cooper v. Cole, supra. The land contract, between the parties, was a common-law mortgage of the yearly grown crops, to secure the payment agreed to be made that year. Atwater v. Mower, 10 Vt. 75; Coty v. Barnes, 20 Vt. 78; Wood v. Dudley, 8 Vt. 480; Taggart v. Packard, 39 Vt. 628; Blodgett v. Blodgett, 48 Vt. 82. Such mortgage can be foreclosed, or a bill brought to redeem the property, in the ordinary method of foreclosing mortgages. Blodgett v. Blodgett, supra. The orator—not at law, but in equity—succeeded to the rights of Jackson under the contract. He can maintain the bill, as originally brought, to foreclose the defendant's rights, not only in the land named in the contract, but also in the crops grown in the year 1892. The crops are the growth of the land, and held by the contract for payment of a part of the same debt for which the land is held. They are both held for the payment of the same claim. He cannot, in equity, be allowed to separate their foreclosure, thereby increasing the cost, and proceed against the land for the payment of the debt by this bill, and at the same time take an independent proceeding, under the chattel-mortgage law, to obtain payment also from the crops. Proceedings prescribed by the chattel-mortgage law are adapted and intended for mortgages executed under the provisions of that law. Calkins v. Clement, supra. He did not attempt to sell the crops under a common-law mortgage. Taggart v. Packard, supra. By attempting to sell the crops in a method unauthorized, he converted them to his own use, and must account for them at their fair market value. The defendant's right to redeem equitably vested in the land and crops, taken as one security for the payment of that portion of the debt which was then overdue. He was under a duty to exercise this right with reference to both, and not with reference to the crops, separate from the land. Soon after bringing his bill, and therein acknowledging the equitable right of the defendant to redeem both the land and crops, the orator took possession, for condition broken, in a manner calculated, if not intended, to deprive the defendant of his right of redemption. He not only removed the defendant's household goods, but turned out his livestock, sold the hay in a manner unauthorized, but began at once to cut and remove all the timber suitable to be manufactured into lumber.

A mortgagee in possession is under a duty to use the premises and property like an ordinary, prudent owner. He is bound to make necessary repairs. He cannot improve the owner out of his equity, nor can he unnecessarily, when the security is ample, encroach upon the body of the property pledged. He is bound to derive a reasonable income from the use of the property, and apply it first to keeping the interest extinguished, and the surplus to the extinguishment of the principal. He can legally no more commit waste than can the mortgagor. He is chargeable for loss incurred by his willful default. He is not entitled to receive anything for his own personal services. Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1215-1217, and notes; Barnett v. Nelson, 54 Iowa, 41, 37 Am. Rep. 183; Sanders v. Wilson, 34 Vt. 318; French v. Baron, 2 Atk. 120; Moore v. Cable, 1 Johns. Ch. 385, 1 L. ed. 780, and note; Benedict v. Gilman, 4 Paige, 58, 3 L. ed. 340, and note; Currier v. Webster, 45 N. H. 226; 2 Jones, Mortg. §§ 1123, 1125. Section 1123 says he must account for waste committed by him while in possession. In section 1125 it is said: "If the property is otherwise sufficient, the mortgagee has no right to open and work mines, and, if he does so, will be charged with the gross receipts, without any allowance for the expense of working." Under the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity, every case is largely controlled by its own facts. From the facts reported, from the manner in which the orator took possession, in which he sold the personal property, and in which he stripped the premises of all the valuable lumber, when his security was ample, it is apparent that he purposely and intentionally disregarded the rights of the defendant, and intended to place him and the property in such condition that he could not raise on the property the money required to redeem it. He thereby placed himself in the light of a willful trespasser. In such cases, at law, the jury may award exemplary or punitive damages. To allow him to take the property, in such cases, at its market value, would allow him to compel its sale at that value, however much to the inconvenience and against the will of the owner. The decisions on the subject of the rule of damages in such cases have not been in full accord, and it would be difficult to reconcile them. Many times evidently, the decision has been controlled by the form of action. Foots v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490, 20 Am. Rep. 151. For a full discussion of the question and review of the authorities, see Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend. 505, 24 Am. Dec. 66, and note; Batchelder v. Kelly, 10 N. H. 486, 84 Am. Dec. 174, and note; Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168, 5 Am. Dec. 204, and note; Coal Creek Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Moses, 15 Lea, 800, 54 Am. Rep. 415, and note; Blaen Aeon Coal Co. v. McCulloh, 59 Md. 408, 48 Am. Rep. 560, and note. In Bolles Wooden-Ware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 432, 27 L. ed. 280, this question was considered. Judge Miller, who delivered the opinion of the court, commends the research of the plaintiff's counsel in placing before the court all the authorities, English and American. The English cases relate largely to mining coal. He quotes from the opinion of Lord Hartley, in the house of lords, in Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co., L. R. 5 App. Cas. 83, as a statement of the English doctrine, as follows: "There is no doubt that if a man, furtively and in bad faith, robs his neighbor of his property, and, because it is under ground, is probably, for some little time, not detected, the court of equity in this country will struggle, or, I would rather say, will assert its authority, to punish fraud, by fixing the person with the value of the whole of the property he has so furtively taken, and making him no allowance in respect of what he has so done as would have been justly made to him if the parties had been working by agreement." But, "when once we arrive at the fact that an inadvertence has been the cause of the misfortune, then the simple course is to make every just allowance for outlay on the part of the person who has so acquired the property, and to give back to the owner, so far as is possible under the circumstances of the case, the full value of that which cannot be restored to him in specie." Judge Miller then says: "There seems to us no doubt that in the case of a willful trespass the rule as stated above is the law of damages, both in England and in this country, though in some of the state courts the milder rule has been applied, even to this class of cases. . . . On the other hand, the weight of authority in this country, as well as in England, favors the doctrine that where the trespass is the result of inadvertence or mistake, and the wrong was not intentional, the value of the property when first taken must govern, or, if the conversion sued for was after value had been added to it by the work of the defendant, he should be credited with this addition." Winchester v. Craig, 83

Mich. 205, contains a full examination of the authorities on the point." In that case, which was trover, for timber worth, when felled, $60.71, but, when sold by the wrongdoer, worth $850, the court applied the harsher rule to a bona fide purchaser from the tortfeasor, holding that such purchaser took only the rights of his vendor. We think this case states the result of the authorities here and in England on this point. In the case at bar this court is not trammelled by the form of the action. The only question is, In what sum shall the orator account for the lumber which he wrongfully stripped from the premises, when there was, if the personal property should be applied, nothing due on his equitable mortgage? When he took possession the condition of the mortgage was broken. This gave the orator the right to take peaceable possession of the premises, and the crops grown that year. His entry was not wrongful. But when he converted the personal property, on which he had a lien, he was, in equity, paid in full for all there was due him on the equitable mortgage.

The orator's counsel contends that the balance of the value of the personal property, above the amount due on the payment for the year 1892, was not sufficient to pay the costs of bringing the bill of foreclosure. But this is not certified to be the truth. There is no statement of the costs of bringing the bill. The court of chancery denied the orator any costs, on account of his "unnecessary and offensive conduct." Hence, while the orator's entry may have been lawful, so he would not be guilty of a forcible entry, he was, on the facts found, guilty of wrongfully wasting the premises, after he had, by conversion of the personal property, received enough to pay in full what was then due on his mortgage. It is true that equity never enforces forfeitures nor inflicts penalties or punitive damages. But the question is not one of enforcing penalties, nor of inflicting forfeitures or punitive damages. The defendant's rights in the lumber continued while the orator was cutting and removing it to the place where he disposed of it. The question is whether the orator, under the circumstances, shall be allowed to deduct, from what the value of the lumber was at the place of disposal, what he had expended in cutting and removing it there. It is contended that the orator supposed he had the right to cut and remove the lumber. He was under no mistake as to the facts, and is presumed to know the law applicable thereto. He must therefore be held to have willfully, as well as wrongfully, cut and removed the timber. All his acts in so doing were done against the known will and protest of the defendant. As we have heretofore found, in equity the orator could charge nothing for his services in properly caring for the property while he was in possession. Much more, he should not be allowed for them in wrongfully stripping the premises of what would be most valuable and useful in aiding the defendant to raise on them the money required to redeem them. On the facts found, we do not think that the orator is entitled to an allowance for his expenditure in wrongfully cutting and removing all the standing lumber from the premises; thus leaving the sugar orchard unprotected from violent winds, which may greatly damage it, although, at the time of the leaving, no special damage had arisen from this cause. If the orator's acts could be fairly and reasonably justified, because consented to by the defendant, or because the security was insufficient, and must be immediately utilized to save the orator from loss, he should account for the lumber cut, at its stumpage value. Sanders v. Wilson, 34 Vt. 818. But neither the court of chancery nor this court can justify his acts. These views affirm the decree of the court of chancery. If the defendant should desire to move for leave to file a cross-bill, he can do so in the court of chancery.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Georgiana DOWNS, Admx., etc., of David Downs, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HARPER HOSPITAL.

(.....Mich. ....)

1. An injury to a inmate of a hospital for the insane, which is a purely eleemosynary institution, caused by the tortious or negligent acts of its managers or employees, will not create a liability against the institution for damages.
2. The fact that patients who are able to do so are required to pay for the privileges of a hospital will not of itself destroy its character as a charitable institution, or make it liable to such a patient for negligence or torts of its employees.

NOTE.—As to the liability of charitable institutions for negligence, see note to Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School of Reform (Ky.) 28 L. R. A. 200.

(September 25, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servants. Affirmed.

The facts were stated in the opinion:

Mr. James H. Pound, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff had two theories upon the evidence, which entitled her to go to the jury:

1. The unquestioned contract which promised to give plaintiff's intestate good care, and keep him in a safe place, the defendant being apprised of his infirmity, for an agreed consideration of $10 per week, then paid presently, which it is clear they did not do, to plaintiff's consequent damage, the value of her intestate's life.

2. Affirmative wrongdoing in after contracting for a present consideration then paid to keep David Downs safely, they put him in an unsafe room from which he was enabled to escape, and after contracting to give said David Downs care, commensurate with his sickness, absolutely refusing and neglecting so to do, and putting him wrongfully into a room so insecurely fastened as to offer no real resistance to him in case of his being seized with a desire to injure himself; and also in putting him into an insecurely situated strong room.

Defendant is not an active living private charity at all.

The attorney-general would not have the power to control this trust. It is a corporation with vested rights and does not depend upon the will of the government alone.

Atty-Gen. v. Federal Street Meeting House in Boston, 3 Gray, 1; Atty-Gen. v. Merrimack Mfg. Co. 14 Gray, 586; Perry, Tr. § 732.

This is a private charity not a public one.

Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 22, 52 Am. Rep. 495.

Within a corporation's sphere of action it is liable for torts as well as infractions of contracts.

Messrs. Edwin F. Conely and Orla B. Taylor, for defendant in error:

What should be the treatment of a patient in a hospital, what should be done to him, what should be done for him, and what should be done with him, are matters of judgment and discretion, and a case for the review by a petit jury of such judgment and discretion is not presented by showing merely that an error was made.

VanDeusen v. Newcomer, 40 Mich. 90.

The "strong room," so called, was simply a part of the hospital building or buildings as an entirety, and the defendant, whether a charity or not, discharged its duty of reasonable care and diligence by the employment of competent persons to execute the work.

The plaintiff is not entitled to indemnity for the alleged wrong out of the charity or trust fund.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff's decedent and husband became insane from disease, and, by advice of his physician, was conveyed to Harper Hospital. He was violent, and was confined in a room in the third story of the building, which was especially arranged for such patients, having a framework of iron over the windows. The deceased wrenched this iron framework off, jumped from the window, and was killed. Plaintiff brings this suit to recover damages for the benefit of herself and children, alleging negligence on the part of the defendant.

Defendant is a body corporate organized under Act No. 242, Laws 1863, entitled "An Act for the incorporation of hospitals or asylums in cases where valuable grants or emoluments have been made to trustees for such purposes," and, at the time the alleged right of action is said to have accrued, was engaged in maintaining at Detroit the hospital commonly known as "Harper Hospital." In the declaration it is alleged that on or about January 26, 1890, Downs was ill, and was so disordered in mind from the effects of disease and pain that he became and was temporarily insane, violent, and dangerous, so that it became necessary to place him under restraint and skillful medical treatment to prevent him from harming himself and others, and to effect his cure; that the defendant, at the request of plaintiff, and well knowing Downs' mental and physical condition, received him into Harper Hospital as a patient, and, in consideration of the payment of $2 per day, agreed to give Downs proper medical treatment, and to keep and restrain him so that he should suffer no bodily injury which he might inflict upon himself, and to have the room in which he was confined secure, with a proper and sufficient guard, framework, or other suitable protection over the window of such room, and so securely fastened that Downs, when confined in the room, would not be able to tear away the framework or grating over the window and throw himself therefrom, and to keep him properly handcuffed, so that he could not injure himself by tearing away the framework or bars over the window, or by throwing himself out of the window, and also to keep some suitable person constantly in attendance upon him. It is further alleged that the defendant, in disregard of its alleged duties and obligations, wrongfully, carelessly, and negligently failed to safely keep and care for and give medical attendance to Downs, and so keep and restrain him that his body should suffer no injury, and his life should be preserved from injury which he might produce by his own conduct and actions; that the defendant did not have the room where Downs was confined secure, and with a proper and sufficient guard, framework, or other suitable protection over the window, and so securely fastened that Downs, when confined in the room, could not tear away the framework or grating over the window, and throw himself therefrom; that the defendant did not keep Downs properly handcuffed, so that he could not do himself injury by tearing away the framework or bars and throwing himself out of the window, and did not keep some suitable person constantly in attendance upon him. It is further alleged that the defendant, well knowing Downs' mental and physical condition, and that he was temporarily insane, violent, and liable to injure himself and others, and to throw himself from the window of the room where he was confined, removed the handcuffs from Downs' wrists, placed him, alone and unattended, in the padded room of the hospital, where insane persons are usually placed, and did not have the grating or framework over the window of such room properly constructed or properly secured and fastened, and that such framework or grating was made and fastened in such an insecure, unsafe, careless, and negligent manner that Downs, while insane, pulled down the ironwork and grating from the window, and threw himself therefrom, falling a distance of about 85 feet to the pavement, thereby receiving such injuries as to cause his death on January 29, 1890. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant, for the reason that the defendant was a charity which could not be made liable for a tort.

The organization of the defendant had its origin in two deeds,—one executed February 8, 1859, by Walter Harper, and the other by Ann Martin, March 10, the same year. The lands therein described were conveyed to seven prominent citizens of Detroit in trust for the founding of a hospital. The purpose was stated in the deed by Mr. Harper to be "the institution, erection, and maintenance of a hospital in the city of Detroit, or in the immediate vicinity thereof, for the succor, care, and relief of such aged, sick, and poor persons who shall apply for the benefit of the same, and who shall seem to my trustees hereof to be proper subjects of such aid as their means will enable them to afford." The particular scheme for founding the hospital, and all the details, were left to be devised and controlled by the trustees. It also provided for organizing and permanently maintaining a school for the instruction of youth in the different arts and trades, after the manner of what is known in Prussia as the "Flintenberg School." The deeds also provided that, if the legislature should enact a law enabling a corporation to be formed for the purposes named in them, the trustees might convey all the lands and funds to a corporation formed therefor. The trust was accepted by the trustees, and under the law above referred to the trustees conveyed the property to the defendant, a corporation, May 17, 1863. Other bequests have been made to the defendant for the same purpose, which in one year amounted to over $100,000. The corporators receive no compensation or dividends. It is purely an eleemosynary institution, organized and maintained for no private gain, but for the proper care and medical treatment of the sick. Hospital physicians and attendants are, and of course must be, paid. The receipts have not always been sufficient to meet ordinary expenses, and one year a private citizen gave $1,000 towards the deficiency. The law under which the defendant is organized recognizes it as a charity; exempts its property from taxation; provides that its funds shall be used faithfully and exclusively for the purposes of its organization, and that it may receive, by gift, grant, or devise, any property, but only for the purpose for which it is incorporated. It has no shares, and is not a stock corporation. If the contention of the learned counsel for the plaintiff be true, it follows that the charity or trust fund must be used to compensate injured parties for the negligence of the trustees, or architects and builders, upon whose judgment reliance is placed as to plans and strength of materials; of physicians employed to treat patients; and of nurses and attendants. In this way the trust fund might be entirely destroyed, and diverted from the purpose for which the donor gave it. Charitable bequests cannot be thus thwarted by negligence for which the donor is in no manner responsible. If in the proper execution of the trust, a trustee or an employé commits an act of negligence, he may be held responsible for his negligent act; but the law jealously guards the charitable trust fund, and does not permit it to be frittered away by the negligent acts of those employed in its execution. The trustees of this fund could not by their own direct act divert it from the purpose for which it was given, or for which the act of the legislature authorized the title to be vested in the defendant. It certainly follows that the fund cannot be indirectly diverted by the tortious or negligent acts of the managers of the fund, or their employés, though such acts result in damage to an innocent beneficiary. Those voluntarily accepting the benefit of the charity accept it upon this condition.

The fact that patients who are able to pay are required to do so does not deprive the defendant of its eleemosynary character, nor permit a recovery for damages on account of the existence of contract relations. The amounts thus received are not for private gain, but contribute to the more effectual accomplishment of the purpose for which the charity was founded. The wrongdoer, in a case of injury, but not the trust fund, must respond in damages. This proposition seems too clear to require argument or authority. It is not, however, inappropriate to remark that better facilities for the care, cure, and treatment of the sick, both of the poor, and of those who are able to pay, are secured by the establishment of hospitals like that of the defendant. These facilities are increased by the receipt of money from those who are able to pay in whole or in part for the benefits received. Several hospitals of this character exist in this state, founded by private munificence. Obviously, they would not have been founded if their donors had known, or ever supposed, that their charitable purposes might be thwarted by the verdicts of juries for the negligent acts of those who must necessarily be employed in the execution of the charity. The following authorities appear to sustain the above position: Foote v. Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507; McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 482, 21 Am. Rep. 529; Gooch v. Association for Relief for Aged Indigent Females, 109 Mass. 558; Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 496; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Artist, 9 C. C. A. 14, 60 Fed. Rep. 865, 23 L. R. A. 581.

In what we have said, we are not to be understood as intimating any opinion as to whether there is any liability of the trustees for the alleged defect in the construction of the room where the deceased was confined, or of those who were intrusted with his care and treatment. This question was not passed on by the court below, and we express no opinion upon it.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

A. F. BULLARD

v.

George W. THORPE et al.

(.....Vt.....)

1. A writ of prohibition will issue against actions brought before a justice of the peace by splitting up an entire cause of action so as to make the amount claimed in each too small to permit an appeal, where relief has been denied by the justice leaving no other remedy.
2. An agreement of counsel that a justice of the peace is an aged man not to be affected to his disadvantage by the result of the proceeding will not prevent a writ of prohibition against unlawful proceedings in this court from issuing against him as well as the party and his counsel.

(August 14, 1894.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to prevent the prosecution of proceedings in trover to recover possession of property which had been pledged, the ground of relief being that one cause of action was split into several so as to keep it out of the jurisdiction of an appellate court. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dee & George for petitioner.

Taft, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the first instance in this state, within our knowledge, of a petition for a writ of prohibition. No mention is made of one in our reports, and it is first mentioned in legislation in the Revision of 1889, when the supreme court was given power to grant one. That provision still exists in Rev. Laws, § 783. The writ may issue if "necessary to the furtherance of justice and the regular execution of the laws." The proceedings to obtain one are regulated by Rev. Laws, chap. 74. The object of the writ in this jurisdiction can be accomplished generally by appeal, exception, or writ of error. One never issues if there is other adequate remedy. It is an ancient and valuable writ, the use of which in all proper cases should be upheld and encouraged, as it is important to the due and regular administration of justice that each tribunal should confine itself to the exercise of those powers with which, under the constitution and laws of the state, it has been intrusted. The writ is so ancient that forms of it are given in Glanville (Beames' Translation) pp. 56, 97, et seq.,—the first book of English law, written in 1189,—and mention is made of it in nearly all the treatises upon the common law, and the early reports. The object and scope of the writ is stated in 3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 112, as "a writ directed to the judge and parties of a suit in any inferior court, commanding them to cease from the prosecution thereof, upon a suggestion that either the cause originally, or some collateral matter arising therein, does not belong to that jurisdiction, but to the cognizance of some other court." The writ goes against "as well the party and his counsel as the judge himself." 5 Jacob, Law Dict. 1st Am. ed. 816. If a court has no jurisdiction of a cause, nor of a collateral matter incidental thereto, prohibition is an appropriate remedy, if the party aggrieved has no other relief. The remedy is a liberal one, and is not to be applied sparingly. It was so far extended that in Bracton's time (6 Bract. Twiss' ed. 245) it was said in case an inferior judiciary took jurisdiction of a matter rightfully, and a superior court had cognizance of the same matter, "the superior tribunal ought to be preferred to the inferior, and, if (the tenant) has shown to the superior court that he has been impleaded concerning the same thing in an inferior court a prohibition shall issue on the part of the king that proceedings shall not be taken on that plea in the inferior court." In Quimbo Appo v. People, 20 N. Y. 531, Selden, J., speaks of the "broad remedial nature" of the writ, and says that it "was never governed by any narrow technical rules, but was resorted to as a convenient mode of exercising a wholesome control over inferior tribunals. The scope of this remedy ought not, I think, to be abridged, as it is far better to prevent the exercise of an unauthorized power than to be driven to the necessity of correcting the error after it is committed."

The writ does not lie to prevent errors and irregularities in the proceedings if the matter adjudged is within the jurisdiction of the tribunal. Toft v. Rayner, 5 C. B. 162. It is no part of its office to prevent or correct errors in questions of which the court has cognizance. It is to prevent the unlawful assumption of jurisdiction, and it may be either jurisdiction of the entire subject-matter, or of something collateral or incidental thereto. It "lies to prevent the exercise of any unauthorized power in a cause of which the subordinate tribunal has jurisdiction, no less than when the entire cause is without its jurisdiction." One general ground of prohibition is that, though the subject-matter of suit is within the proper jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal, yet that in some collateral or incidental matter it is proceeding contrary to the common law or some statutory provision. Thus, it would seem, if we pursue these principles, that the courts have authority by this proceeding to supervise the execution of the laws, not merely by keeping inferior tribunals within their proper jurisdiction, but also by enforcing a correct execution of the laws, as well the common as the statute law. Jacob says: "Or if, in handling the matters clearly within their cognizance, they [the courts] transgress the bounds prescribed to them by the laws of England, . . . a prohibition will be awarded." Upon the principal points above noted, the following cases may be referred to: 5 Jacob, Law Dict. 817; Gould v. Gapper, 5 East, 364; Brymer v. Atkins, 1 H. Bl. 164; Darby v. Cosens, 1 T. R. 552; Leman v. Goultly, 3 T. R. 8; State v. Hopkins, 1 Dud. L. 101; State v. Hudnall, 2 Nott & McC. 424; State v. Ridgell, 2 Rail. L. 560; State v. Nathan, 4 Rich. L. 513; Ex parte Williams, 4 Ark. 537, 38 Am. Dec. 46; Quimbo Appo v. People, 20 N. Y. 531; High, Extr. Leg. Rem. chap. 81.

It has been held that prohibition will not lie if the inferior court has prima facie jurisdiction; i. e. if, upon the face of the papers, the cause is within the cognizance. It was so held in State v. Judge of Superior Dist. Ct. 29 La. Ann. 360. This does not seem to be just, for a plaintiff thereby may be enabled to recover upon a claim that is without the jurisdiction of a court by framing his declaration showing a cause of action within it. We think the rule in such cases has been to grant such writs upon showing by evidence, abundante the record, that the court had no jurisdiction. In an anonymous case (1 P. Wms. 476) it is said: "A prohibition lies in chancery on affidavit that the matter is out of the jurisdiction; but no affidavit is necessary if, on the face of the declaration, the matter appears to be out of the jurisdiction." In a suit for tithes the tenant pleads that the party who sues is not incumbent, but that J. S. is. In this case it does not appear on the face of the papers that the court has no jurisdiction; "yet a prohibition must go, 'or else he [the tenant] shall be charged twice for his tithes.'" Green v. Penilden, Cro. Eliz. 228. These cases recognize the doctrine that prohibition may lie if the lack of jurisdiction does not appear upon the face of the paper. It is in cases in which there can be no appeal that a writ of prohibition is frequently applied for. Justices in a bastardy proceeding allowed an appeal to the general sessions. The latter court, denying the motion to dismiss the appeal, were proceeding to try the case when the alleged putative father applied to the supreme court for a mandamus to the sessions to vacate the order entertaining the appeal, or other remedy. The supreme court, holding that there was no appeal, said: "It is a case for a prohibition, instead of a mandamus. Let the order be made accordingly." People v. Tompkins, 19 Wend. 154. One had been tried, convicted, sentenced, and sentence executed. He was subsequently tried, convicted, and condemned to death, there being no appeal for the same offense. A prohibition was granted to restrain the execution, which was confirmed unanimously by the court of appeals. Ex parte Brown, 2 Bail. L. 828. A court entered judgment of death for an offense not capital. The error could not be corrected by appeal. The court held that, although the cause and person were within the jurisdiction of the court, it transgressed the bounds prescribed by law, and granted a prohibition. State v. Ridgell, Id. 560.

One can conceive of many instances in which the writ may be the only remedy. A justice of the peace takes cognizance of a 25 L. R. A.

suit not appealable upon a claim of which he is the absolute owner. A person convicted of, and sentenced to be hung for murder, after he has been acquitted of the same offense, his exceptions having failed without his fault. An inferior court proceeds to execute a judgment, notwithstanding an appeal. What remedy is there in such cases save a writ of prohibition? The petitioner has established the substantial allegations of his petition. Stripped of its verbiage, the case is this: The petitionee Thorpe pawned to the petitioner nine items of personal property, valued at $40, to secure the loan of about $25. That the petitioner has sold, upon due notice, a part of the property, and received therefor about the sum of $13; and that there still remains due him about as much more, which the petitionee Thorpe refuses to pay. That Thorpe, by his attorney, Buck, has begun a series of suits in trover for the items of the property so pawned, bringing a separate suit for each item, before the petitionee Greene, a justice of the peace, placing the ad damnum in the writ at $20, so that no appeal to the county court can be had from the decision of said Justice Greene. Thus, the claim, which is an entire one, is split up, so that the justice can have final jurisdiction of the suits. That this is done to deprive the petitioner of his right of appeal, and the county court of its rightful appellate jurisdiction in the matters. That two suits have been brought for the first two items, and that one has been tried. That said justice, upon trial, refused the petitioner's plea and proof of the facts herein stated, and the petitioner is put to great and needless expense in procuring bail and defending said suits. It is clear from the proofs that there were but two contracts in respect to the pawned property, the two valises and contents being pledged subsequently to the pledge of the trunks and contents; but, by the arrangement at the time the valises were left in pledge, the whole property became pledged for all that was due the petitioner from Thorpe. Whether there was one contract or two is immaterial so far as this case is concerned, for the subject-matter of the two suits already brought against the petitioner was embraced in the first contract.

It is well settled, we think, without a contrary decision, that a person cannot split up an entire indivisible claim, so as to give a court jurisdiction, that it would not otherwise possess. If he do, prohibition shall go. If he can do so, a justice of the peace can be given cognizance of causes involving immense sums. Girling v. Aldas, 2 Keb. 617; 19 Hen. VI. chap. 54; 1 Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 46; 2 Rolle, Abr. 290; Keilway, 106a; Catchmade's Case, 6 Mod. 91; Hutson v. Lowry, 2 Va. Cas. 42. It is often a difficult question to determine whether the transactions constitute an entire or a divisible contract, but we think if several items of property are pledged at one time, for one sum, and no reason exists for a demand of the several items at separate times, that it is one entire contract. In Farrington v. Payne, 15 Johns. 482, the defendant justified, under an attachment of one bed and three quilts. The actions were trover,—one for the bed, and another for the quilts. The court said the taking "was one single, indivisible act, and the plaintiff ought not to be permitted to vex the defendants by splitting up his claim for damages into separate suits for each article so seized." A claim for three barrels of potash was split up; a suit brought for the price of one, and another for the price of the other two; and the court says: "And yet the plaintiff has set up and divided his entire demand into separate suits, which of itself would be a fatal objection to the judgments." Smith v. Jones, 15 Johns. 229. In Willard v. Sperry, 16 Johns. 121, one note for $125 was split up into five parts, and as many suits brought; and: "Per Curiam. The judgment is erroneous. The note, forming one indivisible contract, cannot be the foundation of several suits. It is a usurpation of jurisdiction, and a justice might, if this be tolerated, take cognizance of contracts to any amount." In Colvin v. Corwin, 15 Wend. 557, two actions were brought for lottery tickets, and the defendant admitted that the tickets were delivered to him by two different agents of the plaintiffs, at different places and at different times. A judgment in one suit was held a bar in the other, and it is said: "The justice of the case also accords with this disposition of it. The splitting up of small demands to multiply suits is strongly discountenanced by this court. It is unnecessary and oppressive." This case was overruled in Secor v. Sturges, 16 N. Y. 548, in respect to the construction of the contract, but not the legal rule applicable to the contract if it was an entire one. But if a demand is split up, and judgment recovered for a part, the legal proposition that a judgment for a part of one entire demand is a conclusive bar to any other suit for another part of the same demand is everywhere inflexibly maintained. Whitney v. Clarendon, 18 Vt. 258; Morey v. King, 51 Vt. 388; Burritt v. Belfy, 47 Conn. 323, 36 Am. Rep. 79; Smith v. Jones, Farrington v. Payne, and Willard v. Sperry, supra; Miller v. Overt, 1 Wend. 487; Colvin v. Corwin, supra; Bates v. Quattlebom, 2 Nott & McC. 205; Bennett v. Hood, 1 Allen, 48, 79 Am. Dec. 705. If A., by one act, converts 1,000 bushels of wheat belonging to B., and valued at one dollar per bushel, can B. maintain an action of trover for each bushel? Would it not be an outrage to allow a separate action for each bushel? No appeal being allowed, is not prohibition the only remedy? It has been held in this state that a plaintiff may waive a part of a claim and recover; that he may demand less than in justice he is entitled to, and thereby confer jurisdiction upon a justice, though the case upon its merits would properly belong to a higher jurisdiction. Stevens v. Pearson, 5 Vt. 503; Wightman v. Carlisle, 14 Vt. 296; Parkhurst v. Spalding, 17 Vt. 527. This principle is not involved in the case at bar, for the petitioners Thorpe waives no part of his claim.

It is a common practice in this state to consolidate actions, pending in the same court, that might have been brought in one. It was an early doctrine of the common law that when several suits on separate contracts were brought, and only one was necessary, to award prohibition. In Girling v. Aldas, 2 Keb. 617, the contracts were several; and: "Per Curiam. A prohibition must be awarded. If the causes may be joined in one action, they must." And a prohibition was awarded. "If there be several contracts between A. and B. at several times, for several sums, each sum under 40s. and they all amount to a sum sufficient to entitle the superior court, they shall be there put in suit, and not in a court which is not of record." Anonymous, 1 Vent. 65; Girling v. Alders, Id. 73; Clerk v. Andrews, 1 Show. *11. The fact that the court is not one of record we think immaterial upon the question of jurisdiction. The whole subject-matter of the pledge, or of the two pledges, conceding there were two, was within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace; so the claim was not split up to give Justice Greene jurisdiction, but to give him final jurisdiction, thereby defrauding the county court of its rightful jurisdiction. The evil is the same whether the jurisdiction of which the county court is defrauded is original or appellate.

Reference is herein made to many principles governing the proceedings relating to prohibition, principally by way of illustration as the subject in this jurisdiction is comparatively new. The exact question presented and the one decided is this: We hold, if a person has an entire claim, he cannot split it up, and bring as many suits as there are parts, thus subjecting the defendant to as many suits as there are parts, and the resulting needless expense, without being, if the defendant has no other remedy, subject to prohibition. The petitioner sought for relief before Justice Greene, without avail, and he is entitled to a writ of prohibition, which must issue in the name of the state.

In the brief for defendants it is stated: "The justice, Henry C. Greene, an aged man, is, by agreement of counsel, not to be affected by the result in this case to his disadvantage." If he is too old to be affected by the result of these proceedings, it is evident he is too aged to be administering the law, even in a justice's court. The writ must issue against him as well as the party and his counsel.

What effect upon these proceedings the discontinuance of one of the suits may have we do not consider, for it is not shown that either suit has been ended. It is ordered that a writ of prohibition issue in the name of the state, signed by the clerk, directed to the petitioners, prohibiting them from proceeding any further in the actions mentioned, and set forth in said petition, and for the collection of the petitioner's costs of this proceeding, as taxed by the clerk.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

Oscar F. COWHICK, Admr., etc., of John Y. Cowhick, Deceased, Pf. in Err.,

John K. SHINGLE et al.

(.....Wyo.....)

A partial payment by one of two parties jointly and severally liable upon a promissory note will not suspend the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the other.

(September 21, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Laramie County to review a judgment in favor of defendant Altman in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a joint and several promissory note to which Altman pleaded the statute of limitations. Affirmed.

Statement by Clark, J.:

The plaintiff in error was plaintiff below. The action was brought in the court below to recover upon a promissory note made by the defendants to plaintiff's intestate, and which is as follows:

"$100.00. Cheyenne, Wyoming, January 3, 1888.

"One year after date, we jointly and severally promise to pay to the order of John Y. Cowhick one hundred dollars, at the First National Bank of Cheyenne, for value received, waiving benefit of stay and exemption laws, and appraisal on sale before execution, with interest at 1½ per cent per month from date until paid. If this note is not paid at maturity the undersigned agree to pay expenses of collection, including attorney's fees. John K. Shingle. H. Altman."

It is alleged in the petition of plaintiff "that the time within which said note was due and payable has long since elapsed, and yet said note has not been paid, nor any part thereof, except interest thereon from the date of said note up to and including the 1st day of June, A. D. 1890, which said interest from the date of said note up to and including said 1st day of June, A. D. 1890, was paid to said John Y. Cowhick by said John K. Shingle, without the knowledge or consent of Henry Altman, on said 1st day of June, A. D. 1890." The defendant Shingle made default. The defendant Altman interposed a general demurrer to the petition, and for ground thereof relies upon the statute of limitations, which demurrer was sustained by the court below. Plaintiff brings the case here, assigning as error (1) that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer of defendant Altman to plaintiff's petition; (2) that the court erred in rendering judgment in favor of defendant Altman. The cause of action upon the note accrued on the 7th day of January, A. D. 1889, and this action was commenced on the 2d day of February, A.

D. 1894,—more than five years after the cause of action accrued. The sections of the statute relied upon are the following of the Revised Statutes of 1887:

"Sec. 2368. Civil actions other than for the recovery of real property can only be brought within the following periods, after the cause of action accrues.

"Sec. 2369. Within five years an action upon a specialty or any agreement, contract or promise in writing.

"Sec. 2381. When payment has been made upon any demand founded on contract or a written acknowledgment thereof, or promise to pay the same has been made and signed by the party to be charged an action may be brought thereon within the time herein limited, after such payment, acknowledgment, or promise."

The foregoing statutory provisions have been in force in this state since June 1, 1886. Prior to that time, and since March 1, 1874, the code provision in force here, which corresponds with section 2381, supra, was section 21, chapter 18, Comp. Laws 1876. We quote the latter section, as we shall have occasion hereinafter to refer to it. It was as follows: "Sec. 21. In any case founded on contract where any part of the principal or interest shall have been paid, or an acknowledgment of an existing liability, debt or claim or any promise to pay the same shall have been made, an action may be brought on such case within the period prescribed for the same, after such payment, acknowledgment, or promise, but such acknowledgment or promise must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby."

Mr. R. W. Breckons for plaintiff in error.

Mr. H. Donzelman, for defendant in error:

The common-law rule is that payment by one is not payment for all so as to suspend the running of the statute of limitations.

Bell v. Morrison, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 367, 7 L. ed. 181; Clarke v. Bradshaw, 3 Esp. 155; Brandram v. Wharton, 1 Barn. & Ald. 468.

In most of the states the doctrine has been expressly repudiated; and in those few states in which Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Dougl. 628, was followed, the legislatures, like the law-making power of England, overturned the rule by express legislation.

NOTE.—The above opinion is a good presentation of the law upon this side of the interesting question of the effect of payment by one of several joint and several debtors upon the running of the statute of limitations. The condition of the decisions upon the subject is well illustrated by the cases upon the effect of payment by one partner after dissolution of the firm, which are collected in the note to Kerper v. Wood (Ohio) 15 L. R. A. 661.

In Illinois, in the case of Kallenbach v. Dickenson, 100 Ill. 427, the subject was reviewed at great length.

The court decided that the payment must be made by the party to be charged.

Davis v. Mann, 48 Ill. App. 301.

The Alabama courts are decisive on the subject.

Louther v. Chappell, 8 Ala. 353, 42 Am. Dec. 643; Myatts v. Bell, 41 Ala. 222. See also, Steele v. Souder, supra; Littlefield v. Dingwall, 71 Mich. 223; Tate v. Clements, 16 Fla. 339, 26 Am. Rep. 709; Steele v. Jennings, 1 McMull. L. 297; Walters v. Kraft, 23 S. C. 578, 55 Am. Rep. 44; Belote v. Wynn, 7 Yerg. 534; *Muse v. Rep. 491.

In some of the cases a distinction is made between payments made before the debt is barred, and payments made afterward. Of this distinction, it is said in Whitcomb v. Whiting, Dougl. 653, Smith, Lead. Cas. pt. 2, p. 1022: "No such distinction can be found in the English cases."

Statutes originally enacted in another state, when adopted, are deemed to be taken with the settled construction given them in the state from which they are carried.

Section 2381 was taken from Ohio.

It was held by the supreme court of the state of Ohio that the statute meant, not only that promise and acknowledgment must be made by the party to be charged, but that payment likewise must be so made.

Hance v. Hair, 25 Ohio St. 340; Marienthal v. Mosler, 16 Ohio St. 506.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is the settled construction of our code of civil procedure that "where it appears upon the face of the petition that the cause of action accrued at such a period that, under the statute of limitations, no action can be brought, the defendant may demur to the petition on the ground that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." Sturges v. Burton, 8 Ohio St. 215, 72 Am. Dec. 582. It is clear that more than five years elapsed between the date the cause of action accrued upon the note and the commencement of the suit, and hence the demurrer of the defendant Altman was properly sustained by the court below, unless the payment of the interest by the defendant Shingle on the 1st day of June, 1890, had the effect of suspending the running of the statute in favor of the defendant Altman. Briefly stated, the sole remaining question for determination is, Does a partial payment by one of two parties jointly and severally liable upon a promissory note suspend the running of the statute in favor of the other? Before proceeding to the consideration of our own statutes, so far as they bear upon this question, it may not be amiss to briefly look into the history of the law upon this subject.

The first statute in our system of jurisprudence which placed limitations upon personal actions was chapter 16 of 21 Jac. I., enacted in 1623. In the construction of this statute, and of statutes enacted at an early day, by several of the states of the Union, which were substantially like it, there was great diversity of opinion upon the question we have presented here. The leading case on this question in England is Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Dougl. 652, decided in 1781, where it was held by Lord Mansfield and his associates that "payment by one is payment for all,—the one acting virtually as agent for the rest,—and, in the same manner, an admission by one is an admission by all; and the law raises the promise to pay, when the debt is admitted to be due." Willes, J., concurring in the views expressed by Lord Mansfield, further said: "The defendant has had the advantage of the partial payment, and therefore must be bound by it." This case seems to be wholly opposed in principle to the case of Bland v. Haselrig, 2 Vent. 151, decided many years before, but after the adoption of the Statute of 21 Jac. I. While the doctrine of Whitcomb v. Whiting, was several times seriously questioned by eminent English judges,—notably by Lord Ellenborough in Brandram v. Wharton, 1 Barn. & Ald. 463,—it became the generally accepted rule in England, and was such until parliament interfered in 1828, and, adopting what is known as "Lord Tenterden's Act," declared among other things, that no joint contractor should be in any manner affected by any written acknowledgment or promise made by his co-contractors, thus limiting the effect of written acknowledgments or new promises to the parties making them. This act, however, contained this proviso: "Provided, always, that nothing herein contained shall alter or take away or lessen the effect of any payment of any principal or interest made by any person whatsoever." We cite this thus fully because it is urged upon us that this statute is in substance the same as our section 2381, quoted in the statement of facts hereto appended, and inasmuch as the English courts after the adoption of the act, gave the same effect to a partial payment by one of two or more joint obligors as was given in Whitcomb v. Whiting, that hence the cases so holding are authority for the proposition that our statute should be so construed as to make a payment by one obligor effective as to the others. I cannot assent to this contention, because, considering the state of the law in England at the time of the adoption of Lord Tenterden's act as declared by the courts there, it seems clear to my mind that the effect of the proviso in that act was to leave the legal effect of a payment made by "any person whatsoever" just exactly what it had been held by the courts to have been. In fact, it might be very strongly urged that the proviso was in effect a legislative affirmation of the rule previously established by the courts; and such in effect seems to have been the view taken by the court in Wyatt v.

Hodson, 8 Bing. 809, and by Chief Justice Shaw in Sigourney v. Drury, 14 Pick. 387. By this act of Lord Tenterden the effect of the decision in Whitcomb v. Whiting, was limited solely to partial payments, and its effect in that respect was entirely overthrown in 1856 by the Act entitled the "Mercantile Law Amendment Act." So that long before the territory or state of Wyoming came into existence the doctrine of that celebrated case had met its death in the land of its birth, and, as stated at pages 608 and 609 of Wood on Limitations, "the judgment of the profession, as well as of the people generally, as to the wisdom of the doctrine, is best evidenced by the circumstance that it has been nearly obliterated by legislative and judicial action."

In the United States, under statutes substantially like the English statute, the doctrine of Whitcomb v. Whiting, met with great disfavor at an early day, and was wholly repudiated in several well-considered cases. Among them may be mentioned, as especially worthy of consideration, Bell v. Morrison, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 351, 7 L. ed. 174; Easter Bank v. Sullivan, 6 N. H. 125; Coleman v. Fobes, 22 Pa. 156, 60 Am. Dec. 75; Leroy v. Cadet, 17 Serg. & R. 126, 17 Am. Dec. 650; Van Keuren v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y. 524, 51 Am. Dec. 323; Shoemaker v. Benedict, 11 N. Y. 176, 62 Am. Dec. 95; Yandes v. Lefavour, 3 Blackf. 371; Belote v. Wynne, 7 Yerg. 534; Muse v. Donelson, 2 Hump. 166, 36 Am. Dec. 309; Louther v. Chappell, 8 Ala. 353, 42 Am. Dec. 645; Voorhies Succession, 21 La. Ann. 659; Walker v. Duberry, 1 A. K. Marsh. 189; Steele v. Jennings, 1 McMull. L. 297. In some of the above cases the acknowledgment or partial payment relied upon to take the case out of the statute was made before the bar of the statute had become complete, but in my judgment there is no distinction in principle between the legal effect of acknowledgment or payment made before or after the bar of the statute had attached. In either case the legal effect thereof is to create a new cause of action. Muse v. Donelson, 2 Hump. 169, 36 Am. Dec. 309; Bell v. Morrison, and Shoemaker v. Benedict, supra; Allen v. O'Donald, 28 Fed. Rep. 17, at page 25; Wheelock v. Doolittle, 18 Vt. 440, at page 442, 46 Am. Dec. 163; Willoughby v. Irish, 35 Minn. 68, at page 69, 59 Am. Rep. 297.

In the case of Coleman v. Fobes, supra, it is said: "We cannot but regard the case of Whitcomb v. Whiting, which declared that a payment by one joint debtor was a new promise by all, as being at the bottom of all the confusion that exists in the decisions in England and in this country on the subject of this statute, in its relation to joint debtors." And, from the review in that case of the English decisions, it would seem that the doctrine had led to inextricable confusion, and to such extreme views that the statute was in effect a nullity, as shown by the decision in Goddard v. Ingram, 3 Q. B. 839. In this case the two defendants had been partners with one Shuttleworth. The partnership was dissolved in 1832, and, upon the dissolution, was indebted to the plaintiffs, bankers, in the sum of £2,000. In 1839 James Goddard, one of the plaintiffs, who was individually indebted to the old partnership, on his single account, in the sum of £35, drew his check upon his own bank for that sum, and placed it to the credit of the partnership. A day or two afterwards, Shuttleworth, who was hopelessly bankrupt, called at the bank, and expressed himself satisfied with the transaction. This was held a sufficient payment to take the case out of the statute as to the two defendants; and, in the light of this case, it is not surprising that the Pennsylvania court should say: "To carry out this principle of Whitcomb v. Whiting would allow a debtor that is hopelessly bankrupt to bind others by his new promise, and even to be hired to do it, and thus far the example has led in England." On the other hand, it is true that in many states, especially the New England states, the doctrine of Whitcomb v. Whiting was upheld, and, under statutes similar to the English statute, enforced. In Sigourney v. Drury, supra, Chief Justice Shaw rendered an opinion sustaining the doctrine of Whitcomb v. Whiting, and which may well be considered the leading case upon that side of the question in the United States. Cox v. Bailey, 9 Ga. 467, 54 Am. Dec. 358, is another strongly reasoned case in favor of the doctrine. The same rule was held to be the law in Rhode Island, Connecticut, Maine, and other states; but it is, I think, a circumstance worthy of great consideration that within a few years after the rendition of the decisions sustaining this rule the legislatures of nearly all the states so holding, by legislative enactment, declared that no joint debtor should be deprived of the benefit of the statute by reason of the fact of payment by his codebtor.

It must be admitted that at the time of the adoption of section 21, chap. 18, Wyo. Comp. Laws 1876, to wit, December 11, 1873,—in fact, at the time of the organization of the territory of Wyoming, in 1868,—the rule that one joint debtor was affected by the partial payment of his codebtor in such way as to deprive him (the former) of the benefit of the statute prevailed in only a few of the states of the Union, to wit, Connecticut, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Delaware, Georgia, Oregon, North Carolina, Missouri, and perhaps, at that date, Minnesota and one or two other states. In all the other states, and in England as well, the rule had been entirely overthrown, either by judicial decision or by legislative enactment. This fact is in my mind a strong circumstance as evidencing the judgment of the profession, and of the people as well, concerning the wisdom and propriety of the rule here contended for by the plaintiff, and is entitled to consideration in attempting to properly construe our statute upon the subject, because, when we come to construe our statute it is a fair presumption that our legislature, when engaged in legislating upon a subject so generally acted upon in other jurisdictions, did have some regard for the general state of the law upon that subject, and we may very properly bear this in mind when we undertake to ascertain what was the legislative intention with respect to the statute. It is urged upon us that "when a statute is in general terms it is subject to the principles of the common law, and is to receive such construction as is agreeable to that law in cases of the same nature;" and then it is said "that the common-law rule is clearly laid down in Whitcomb v. Whiting." As a rule the term "common-law" means both the common law of England, as opposed to statute or written law, and the statutes passed before the emigration of the first settlers of America. Patterson v. Winn, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 241, 8 L. ed. 111; Com. v. Leach, 1 Mass. 61. And, applying this definition to the matter in hand, I am unable to perceive that there is any common-law rule upon the subject. At common law there was no limitation as to time upon the right to bring a personal action. Such limitations are, and always have been, pure creatures of the statute; and the rule contended for is a rule which grew up and developed in the construction of the Statute of 21 Jac. I., and in no other way. It was first announced in 1781 by Lord Mansfield, in Whitcomb v. Whiting; and, while any statement of the law made by that great judge is entitled to great weight and respect, his declarations, even as to the common law, are simply persuasive authority.

This brings us now to the consideration of our own statute, and, before reviewing the authorities construing this and similar statutes, I will examine the statute independently of them. It is quite clear that under the statute no written acknowledgment or new promise, howsoever solemnly executed or made by one of two codebtors, could in any measure suspend the running of the statute as to the other, and this would be so whether the acknowledgment or promise was made before or after the statutory bar had attached. This being so, it would seem that inasmuch as the law does not permit one codebtor, by his express promise or acknowledgment, to bind the other, it would logically follow that he could not, by an act which is simply, in legal effect, an acknowledgment from which the law implies a promise, bind him. I am unable to escape this conclusion, and it seems to me to be abundantly justified by the authorities. In 1866 the 24th section of the Code of Ohio was identical with section 21, chap. 18, Wyo. Comp. Laws 1876. Thereafter, the legislature of Ohio adopted a new Code, section 4992 of which is identical with our section 2381, Wyo. Rev. Stat. 1887. These sections are set forth in the statement of facts preceding this opinion. In my judgment the two sections are in substance the same. There is no sort of difference in their effect. In Marienthal v. Mosler, 16 Ohio St. 570, the supreme court of Ohio, in construing the 24th section of their Code, used this language: "By comparing this section with the one for which it is substituted in the Limitation Act of 1831, and judicial constructions given to the Act of 21 Jac. I., it is apparent that the legislature did not intend to enlarge the facilities for taking cases out of the statutory bar. Before this can now be effected by an acknowledgment of an existing debt, or a promise to pay the same, it 'must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby.' No change is made in the effect of a part payment of a debt. It will be seen, 25 L. R. A.

however, that the same effect is given to such part payment as is given to a written promise signed by the party to be charged thereby. It would seem, therefore, from analogy, that the payment must be made by the party to be affected thereby, or by an agent authorized for that express purpose. In the contemplation of the statute, the part payment of a debt is regarded as evidence of a willingness and obligation to pay the residue, as conclusive as would be a personal written promise to that effect. It could not then have been intended to give this effect to payments other than those made by the party himself, or under his immediate direction. Surely, nothing short of this would warrant the assumption of a willingness to pay, equal to his written promise to that effect." In Hance v. Hair, 25 Ohio St. 849, it was held, under the same section, that "a partial payment on a joint and several promissory note by one of the several makers will not prevent the running of the statute of limitations as to the other makers." And the case of Marienthal v. Mosler, supra, was expressly affirmed. In Kerper v. Wood, 48 Ohio St. 618, 15 L. R. A. 656, the statute in existence and relied upon was section 4992, Ohio Rev. Stat., identical with our section 2381, Wyo. Rev. Stat. 1887. The court quoted from the decisions in Marienthal v. Mosler, supra, and Hance v. Hair, supra, and say, at page 631, 16 Ohio St.: "These decisions give emphasis to the reason and language of the statute. A payment or acknowledgment or a promise in writing will not avail to take a case out of the statutory bar, unless made by the party to be charged thereby, or by an agent authorized for that express purpose." It is quite apparent from these decisions from Ohio that the supreme court of that state regarded the two sections as the same in substance, and, in view of the fact that we adopted our statute from that state, these decisions are entitled at least to more than ordinary weight in the construction of our statute. In Com. v. Hartnett, 8 Gray, at page 451, it is said that "it is common learning that the adjudged construction of the terms of a statute is enacted as well as the terms themselves, when an act which has been passed by the legislature of one state or country is afterwards passed by the legislature of another." In Steels v. Souder, 20 Kan. 89, Mr. Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion of the court, in construing a statute identical with section 21, chapter 18, Wyo. Comp. Laws 1876, uses this language: "The language may indeed be open to three constructions,—one, that the mere fact of payment, whether by a party to the instrument or not, keeps it alive as to all originally liable on it; another, that payment by one party keeps it alive as to all; and, third, that payment, like acknowledgment or promise, keeps it alive only as to the party paying. It seems to us that the latter is the true construction. No valid reason exists why payment should be more potent than acknowledgment or promise. Indeed, payment was treated by the courts as simply an evidence of acknowledgment. Such construction makes the various provisions of this section not only harmonious with each other, but with the general provisions of the statutes making each party to an instrument severally liable thereon. Severally liable, each should be severally protected. We conclude, then, that payment suspends the running of the statute only as against the party making the payment." I think there is no room to doubt the correctness of the learned justice's views with respect to the effect of the payment. It is certain that Lord Mansfield made no distinction between the legal effect of a payment and acknowledgment, and such is the generally accepted opinion. It is true that Tindall, Ch. J., in Wyatt v. Hodson, 8 Bing. 809, attempted to draw a distinction between a payment and "an ordinary acknowledgment;" but, however much force there may be in his remarks when applied to an ordinary oral acknowledgment, I am unable to perceive any in cases where the acknowledgment or new promise is required to be in writing, and subscribed by the party. In Nebraska the statute was as follows (Code Civ. Proc. § 22): "In any case founded on contract when any part of the principal or interest shall have been paid, or an acknowledgment of an existing liability, debt, or claim or any promise to pay the same, shall have been made in writing, an action may be brought in such case within the period prescribed for the same after such payment, acknowledgment, or promise." In Mayberry v. Willoughby, 5 Neb. 869, 25 Am. Rep. 491, it was held that part payment by one of two joint debtors does not take the case out of the statute as to the other. In Minnesota the statute was (Gen. Stat. chap. 66, § 24): "No acknowledgment, or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract by which to take the case out of the operation of this chapter unless the same is contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby; but this section shall not alter the effect of any payment of principal or interest." In Willoughby v. Irish, 85 Minn. 63, 59 Am. Rep. 297, it was held, in a well-considered case, that "a partial payment upon a promissory note by one of the joint and several makers thereof, and indorsed upon it before the note is barred by the statute of limitations, and within six years before suit is brought, is inoperative to prevent the running of the statute as to the others." Syllabus. In New York the statute is identical with that of Minnesota just quoted. In McMullen v. Rafferty, 89 N. Y. 456, it was held that payments made by one of two joint and several makers of a note did not prevent the running of the statute as to the other, although the partial payments were made before the statutory bar had attached. The following cases also hold that payment by one of two joint obligors does not suspend the running of the statute as to the others: Bush v. Stovell, 71 Pa. 208, at page 212, 10 Am. Rep. 694; Kallenbach v. Dickinson, 100 Ill. 427; Re Sanders's Estate, 4 Misc. 348; Littlefield v. Dingwall, 71 Mich. 228; Tate v. Clements, 16 Fla. 840, 26 Am. Rep. 709; Davis v. Mann, 48 Ill. App. 302. See also 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. pt. 11, p. 957, giving note to Whitcomb v. Whiting; Angell, Lim. 25 L. R. A.

6th ed. p. 209, and note at page 281 et seq.; 3 Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. p. 79 et seq.; Wood, Lim. Act. p. 605; United States v. Wilder, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 254, 20 L. ed. 681; 3 Kent, Com. 50.

We have examined with care the cases upon the other side of this question, especially Sigourney v. Drury, 14 Pick. 387; Quimby v. Putnam, 28 Me. 419; Hewlett v. Schenck, 82 N. C. 334; Moore v. Goodwin, 109 N. C. 218; Moore v. Beaman, 111 N. C. 328; Merritt v. Day, 88 N. J. L. 82, 20 Am. Rep. 362; Cox v. Bailey, 9 Ga. 470, 54 Am. Dec. 858; McClurg v. Howard, 45 Mo. 365, 100 Am. Dec. 378; Perkins v. Bartow, 6 R. I. 505; Woonsocket Inst. for Savings v. Ballou, 16 R. I. 351, 1 L. R. A. 555. In the last-cited case, from 16 R. I. 351, 1 L. R. A. 555, the supreme court of Rhode Island, at page 147, after reviewing the cases in that state, says, "The cases are doubtless at variance with the rule now generally prevailing in the United States," and hold that the doctrine is too firmly established in that state to be altered except by a statute. In the case of Hunter v. Robertson, 80 Ga. 479, the court, while holding to the rule declared in Cox v. Bailey, 9 Ga. 467, 54 Am. Dec. 858, as to the effect of a payment by one of two joint obligors, refuse to extend the rule so as to affect indorsers or sureties, and express grave doubts as to the correctness of the rule as to joint obligors, and use this language: "But, again, if the principle is wrong when applied to joint makers,—and there is no doubt in my mind that it is,—shall we extend it to an indorser, on the same fallacious reasons." In the case of McClung v. Howard, supra, Judge Bliss, delivering the opinion of the court, and referring to the case of Shoemaker v. Benedict, 11 N. Y. 176, 62 Am. Dec. 95, says: "I confess it would be very difficult to reply to or resist the force of the reasoning of Judge Allen, who gave the opinion of a majority of the court in that case; and, were the question a new one in Missouri, I would favor the application of its doctrine to the present case, but the question was expressly decided the other way by this court in Craig v. Callaway County Ct., 12 Mo. 94, and the decision was in accordance with the authorities at that time." And hence the question was considered as not an open one in Missouri. To the same effect is Campbell v. Brown, 86 N. C. 876, at pages 880, 882, 41 Am. Rep. 464.

And thus, upon examination of the authorities, we find, not only that the principle here contended for by the plaintiff is denied by the overwhelming weight of authority, but also that in some of the states where it is recognized as the law the courts continue to sustain it solely for the reason that it has been so decided in earlier cases.

The case of Cross v. Allen, 141 U. S. 528, 85 L. ed. 848, is strongly urged upon us as being a case which, in effect, denies the doctrine of Bell v. Morrison, supra. There are some expressions in this case which give some foundation to the contention, but an examination of the case leads me to the conclusion that it was correctly decided for reasons which in no wise conflict with anything said in Bell v. Morrison. The case arose in the state of Oregon, and the question was whether the payment by a principal suspended the running of the statute as to a surety. Of course, this called for a construction of the statute of Oregon. The statute in force was peculiar to that state and Minnesota. In each of those states the statute had been considered by their supreme courts, and held to mean that payment by any party upon an existing contract after it becomes due had the effect of causing the statute to run as to all the parties only from the date of the last payment. Whitaker v. Rice, 9 Minn. 14 (Gil. 1), 86 Am. Dec. 78; Parlow v. Singer, 2 Or. 307; Sutherland v. Roberts, 4 Or. 378. In these cases the peculiarities of the statute are pointed out and commented upon. We have hereinbefore quoted the present statute of Minnesota. A comparison of that statute with the one existing at the time of the decision in 9 Minn. 14 (Gil. 1), will show the reasons for the different rulings in that state. See Wiloughby v. Irish, 35 Minn. 63, 59 Am. Rep. 297.

Upon the whole case, I am of the opinion that the true construction of our statute (Rev. Stat. 1887, § 2881), is that given by the supreme court of Ohio in Kerper v. Wood, 48 Ohio St. 621, 15 L. R. A. 656, viz.: "A payment, an acknowledgment, or a promise in writing will not avail to take a case out of the statutory bar, unless made by a party to be charged thereby, or an agent authorized for that express purpose,"—and that the judgment of the district court of the county of Laramie should be, in all respects, affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

Daniel BARNARD, Attorney-General,

v.

David A. TAGGART.

(.....N. H. ....)

Illness of the governor of the state which disables him from performing the duties of his office constitutes a vacancy during which the president of the senate shall exercise the powers of the office, under Const., art. 49, making such provision "whenever the chair of the governor shall become vacant by reason of his death, absence from the state, or otherwise."

(April —, 1890.)

APPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant, who was president of the senate, to assume the office of governor during the governor's alleged disability. Judgment for plaintiff.

Prior to March 31, 1890, D. H. Goodell, the governor of the state, became by reason of illness unable to perform the duties of his office. He requested the defendant, the president of the senate, to perform them in accordance with the constitutional requirements. The defendant, being doubtful whether or not the case came within the constitutional provisions, desired instructions from the supreme court as to his duties. Thereupon the governor addressed to the attorney-general a letter requesting him to take the necessary steps to compel defendant to perform the duties. The attorney-general thereupon presented to the supreme court a petition asking for a writ of mandamus, or other appropriate or adequate process requiring defendant to exercise the powers and authorities of the governor during the vacancy, according to his duty in the premises. Defendant answered that he did not exercise the power of governor because his duty to do so was not settled by any adjudication or conclusive evidence of record. He stated that he was ready to do his duty, when he had authoritative evidence as to what it was, and submitted to the judgment of the court. Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel Barnard and R. M. Wallace for plaintiff.

Mr. David Cross for defendant.

Doe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"Whenever the chair of the governor shall become vacant, by reason of his death, absence from the state, or otherwise, the president of the senate shall, during such vacancy, have and exercise all the powers and authorities which, by this constitution, the

NOTE.—How far is sickness a vacancy in office authorizing performance of incumbent's duties by another.

This case seems to be the first one in which the question of the right of a subordinate officer to fill the place of the governor during the latter's sickness has been directly decided. There are, however, two cases in which dicta occur, one of which supports BARNARD V. TAGGART, and the other holds the opposite theory. In State v. Graham, 28 La. Ann. 568, 21 Am. Rep. 351, the court in discussing the question what absence from the state will authorize the lieutenant governor to assume the duties of the governor, says: "It is evident that if the lieutenant governor be authorized to exercise the functions of the governor during any temporary absence of the governor from the state, he may also whenever the governor is unable to attend to the duties of his office because of sickness. We do not believe this to be the meaning intended by the framers of the constitution." The inability to discharge the duties of the office as well as the absence from the state spoken of in the constitution, is such as would affect injuriously the public interest. The mere absence within a few hours of the run of the capitol would not by any possibility affect the public interest.

On the other hand the California court in People v. Wells, 2 Cal. 224, seems to be of the opinion that under the language of the California constitution the lieutenant governor would be authorized to exercise the duties of the governor in case of the latter's temporary disability.

H. P. F.

governor is vested with when personally present; but when the president of the senate shall exercise the office of governor, he shall not hold his office in the senate." Const. art. 49. From 1784 to 1792 the governor (then styled the "President of the State of New Hampshire") was president of the senate. Instead of his present power of vetoing or approving bills passed by the senate and house, he had "a vote equal with any other member" of the senate, and also "a casting vote in case of a tie," and when his office was vacant all his powers were exercised by "the senior senator." When the constitution took effect, and the legislature met for the inauguration of the new government, June 2, 1784, Meshech Weare, the governor elect, was unable to be present. In brief periods of his illness and absence, in June, 1784, and February, 1785, his duties were performed by Woodbury Langdon, senior senator, acting as governor pro tem. On both occasions Langdon presided in the senate, by virtue of his provisional tenure of the governor's office; and on the 8th of June, 1784, as governor, he sat with the council, and exercised the governor's power (with the required advice and consent of the council) of signing warrants for the payment of money out of the state treasury. The authority of this precedent has not been shaken, and it does not appear that the soundness of the contemporaneous construction has ever been doubted. "Where a word having a technical as well as a popular meaning is used in the constitution, the courts will accord to it its popular signification, unless the very nature of the subject indicates, or the text suggests, that it is used in its technical sense." Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111; Sprague v. Norway, 81 Cal. 178. Words used in a constitution should be construed in the sense in which they were employed. They 'must be taken in the ordinary and common acceptance, because they are presumed to have been so understood by the framers, and by the people who adopted it. . . . It . . . owes its whole force and authority to its ratification by the people, and they judged of it by the meaning apparent on its face, according to the general use of the words employed, where they do not appear to have been used in a legal or technical sense.' Mantley v. State, 7 Md. 135. Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462, 465. "The terms 'jury' and 'trial by jury' are, and for ages have been, well known in the language of the law. They were used at the adoption of the constitution, and always, it is believed, before that time, and almost always since, in a single sense. . . . At that date . . . no such thing as a jury of less than twelve men, or a jury deciding by less than twelve voices, had ever been known, or ever been the subject of discussion, in any country of the common law." Opinion of the Justices, 41 N. H. 551, 552. A similar narrowness of meaning has not been attached to "vacant by reason of his death, absence from the state, or otherwise." And, if the public service could be thrown into disorder by a rule of construction with which the people who adopted the constitution were not familiar, the law would not apply a rule which they did not apply, but would carry into effect the understanding and intent of the voters who enacted article 49 for cases of necessity, and used "otherwise" in its comprehensive and usual sense. In the connection in which the word here occurs, "otherwise" includes the governor's physical disability, as equivalent, for the provisional purpose of this article, to his death or absence from the state. "The object of construction, as applied to a written constitution, is to give effect to the intent of the people in adopting it. . . . We must presume that words have been employed in their natural and ordinary meaning. As Marshall, Ch. J., says, the framers of the constitution, and the people who adopted it, 'must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said.' Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 188, 6 L. ed. 23, 68. This is but saying that no forced or unnatural construction is to be put upon their language; and it seems so obvious a truism that one expects to see it universally accepted without question; but the attempt is made so often, by interested subtlety and ingenious refinement, to induce the courts to force from these instruments a meaning their framers never held, that it frequently becomes necessary to redeclare this fundamental maxim. Narrow and technical reasoning is misplaced when it is brought to bear upon an instrument framed by the people themselves, for themselves, and designed as a chart upon which every man, learned or unlearned, may be able to trace the leading principles of government. . . . The real question is what the people meant, and not how meaningless their words can be made by the application of arbitrary rules." When there is doubt, evidence may be found in the primary and leading "object to be accomplished, or the mischief designed to be remedied or guarded against, by the clause in which the ambiguity is met with. 'When we once know the reason which alone determined the will of the lawmakers, we ought to interpret and apply the words used in a manner suitable and consonant to that reason, and as will be best calculated to effectuate the intent.' Smith, Stat. & Const. Constr. 634. . . . We have not thought it important to quote and to dwell upon those arbitrary rules to which so much attention is sometimes given, and which savor rather of the closet than of practical life. . . . They are more often resorted to as aids in ingenious attempts to make the constitution seem to say what it does not, than with a view to make that instrument express its real intent. All external aids, and especially all arbitrary rules, applied to instruments of this popular character, are of very uncertain value; and we do not regard it as out of place to repeat . . . that they are to be made use of with hesitation, and only with much circumspection." Cooley, Const. Lim. 69, 73, 75, 80, 101.

The primary and leading object of article 49 is evidence tending to show that the construction adopted in the first year of the constitution is correct. The mischief designed to be prevented was the suspension of executive government by the governor's death, absence from the state, or disability. 9 Cong. Rec. pt. 1, 46th Cong. 1st Sess. pp. 184-189, 278-285, 287-293, 312-325, 341-355; Opinion of the Court, 60 N. H. 585. The prescribed remedy is the duty of a substitute to act in cases of necessity. The services of a substitute may be necessary when the governor's absence or disability is temporary as well as when it is permanent. When there is an office to which no one has a title, and which is in fact held by no one, there is a vacancy. Johnston v. Wilson, 2 N. H. 202, 203, 9 Am. Dec. 50; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 127. But, in article 49, "vacant, by reason of his death, absence from the state, or otherwise," has a broader signification if due weight is given to the evidential force of the primary and leading purpose that the executive work shall go on without interruption. An intermittent vacancy, such as occurred in the time of Governor Wear, may occur again; and the evils of an interregnum, which article 49 was intended to prevent, are not to be introduced by technical reasoning or arbitrary rules. "If, from the imperfection of human language, there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, . . . the objects for which it was given . . . should have great influence in the construction." Gibbons v. Ogden, supra. The general object of article 49 forbids a construction that would sometimes cripple the government, and render it powerless in a department in which the public safety requires constant readiness for action.

It is proved by medical testimony that the governor is still in the physical condition stated in his letter to the attorney-general, and that his disability may be reasonably expected to last a few weeks, and perhaps a few months. It is proved by the testimony of the secretary of state and the state treasurer that there is executive business demanding immediate attention, and that the governor's duties should no longer remain unperformed. The case being one of necessity, article 49 directs the president of the senate to exercise executive powers until the governor resumes them. The defendant being reluctant to act without an adjudication or some conclusive evidence of an emergency contemplated by that article, the governor requested the attorney-general to take the steps needed for the protection of public interests. There might be a case in which the attorney-general would intervene without such request. While a determination of the question of vacancy on a petition of this kind is not legally requisite to call the president of the senate to the executive chair, it may be a convenient mode of avoiding embarrassment that might sometimes arise from doubt and controversy in regard to his authority, and the validity of his acts. The existence of an executive vacancy is a question of law and fact within the judicial jurisdiction. If the defendant exercised executive power without a previous judgment on that question, the legality of his acts could be contested and determined in subsequent litigation, and the judicial character of the question does not depend upon the time when it is brought into court. With adequate legal process, the consideration and decision of such a question may be prospective as well as retrospective.

Mandamus "is a writ, in England, issuing out of the king's bench, in the name of the king, and is called a 'prerogative writ,' but considered a writ of right, and is directed to some person, corporation, or inferior court, requiring them to do some particular thing, therein specified, which appertains to their office or duty, and which is supposed to be consonant to right and justice, and where there is no other adequate, specific remedy.

. . . The theory of the British government and of the common law is that the writ of mandamus is a prerogative writ, and is sometimes called 'one of the flowers of the crown,' and is therefore confided only to the king's bench, where the king, at one period of the judicial history of that country, is said to have sat in person, and is presumed still to sit. And the power to issue this writ is given to the king's bench only, as having the general supervising power over all inferior jurisdictions and officers, and is coextensive with judicial sovereignty. And the same theory prevails in our state governments where the common law is adopted.

. . . The power of issuing this writ is generally confided to the highest court of original jurisdiction." Kendall v. United States, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 524, 614, 620, 621. 9 L. ed. 1181, 1216, 1218. "By the principles of the common law, . . . no court had a right to issue the prerogative writ of mandamus unless it was a court in which the judicial sovereignty was supposed to reside, and which exercised a general superintendence over the inferior tribunals and persons throughout the nation or state. In England this writ can be issued by the king's bench only. . . . The peculiar character and constitution of that court, from which it derives this high power, are so well known and familiar to every lawyer that it is scarcely necessary to cite authorities on the subject. Its peculiar powers are clearly stated in 8 Bl. Com. 42. . . . Mr. Justice Buller

. . . also places the right to issue this writ upon the peculiar and high powers of the court of king's bench. . . . In all of the authorities it is uniformly called 'a prerogative writ,' in order to distinguish it from the ordinary process which belongs to courts of justice; and it was not originally considered as a judicial proceeding, but was exercised as a prerogative power. In the case of Awdeley v. Joy, Poph. 176, Doddridge, J., said: 'This court hath power, not only in judicial things, but also in some things which are extrajudicial. The mayor and commonalty of Coventry displaced one of the aldermen, and he was restored; and this thing is peculiar to this court, and is one of the flowers of it.' These peculiar powers were possessed by the court of king's bench because the king originally sat there in person. . . . According to the theory of the English constitution, the king is the fountain of justice; and where the laws did not afford a remedy, and enable the individual to obtain his right by the regular forms of judicial proceedings, the prerogative powers of the sovereign were brought in aid of the ordinary judicial powers of the court, and the mandamus was issued in his name to enforce the execution of the law. And, although the king has long since ceased to sit there in person, yet the sovereign is still there in construction of law, so far as to enable the court to exercise its prerogative powers in his name; and hence its powers to issue the writ of mandamus, the nature of which Justice Doddridge so forcibly describes by calling it extrajudicial, and one of the flowers of the king's bench. . . . By the principles of the common law, this power would not be incident to any court which did not possess the general superintending power of the court of king's bench, in which the sovereignty might, by construction of law, be supposed to sit, and to exert there its prerogative powers in aid of the court, in order that a right might not be without a remedy." Taney, Ch. J., in Kendall v. United States, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 524, 629, 680, 9 L. ed. 1181, 1222, 1223.

In the case mentioned by Doddridge, of an alderman wrongfully displaced, if the board was not judge of the election of its members, and no other tribunal was specially provided, the official title of the displaced member, like his title to land or chattels, was determinable in a court of general common-law jurisdiction, and could not be classed with extrajudicial questions without disregarding the nature of the subject, and the precedents of quo warranto. "A writ of quo warranto is in the nature of a writ of right, . . . against him who claims or usurps any office, . . . to inquire by what authority he supports his claim, in order to determine the right." 3 Bl. Com. 262. "As the election officers perform, for the most part, ministerial functions only, their returns, and the certificates of election which are issued upon them, are not conclusive, . . . but the final decision must rest with the courts. This is the general rule, and the exceptions are of those cases where the law under which the canvass is made declares the decision conclusive, or where a special statutory board is established with powers of final decision." Cooley, Const. Lim. 785; Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 213, 490; Shortt, Extr. Legal Rem. chap. 8; High, Extr. Rem. § 634; Robertson v. State, 109 Ind. 79, 99. The forty-second article of the constitution provides that the returns of votes for governor shall be canvassed by the senate and house of representatives. The canvass is not conclusive, the power of final decision is not conferred upon a special statutory or constitutional board, and the controversy on matters of law and fact involved in disputed claims to the office is not an exception to the rule that judicial questions are settled by judicial decisions. A contested election of the chief executive magistrate is not selected and set apart as the only election case to be left undecided. "A mandamus, in modern practice, is nothing more than an action at law between the parties, and is not now regarded as a prerogative writ. It undoubtedly came into use by virtue of the prerogative power of the English crown. . . . But the right to the writ, and the power to issue it, has ceased to depend upon any prerogative power, and it is now regarded as an ordinary process in cases to which it is applicable." Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 66, 97, 16 L. ed. 717, 725; Gilman v. Bassett, 83 Conn. 298, 805. Upon the American theory of government, the state being sovereign,—the people being the state, and all magistrates and public officers being "their substitutes and agents" (Bill of Rights, arts. 7, 8),—a mandamus properly issued by such agents in the name (Const. art. 87) and by the authority of the principal is not inferior to a prerogative writ issued in the name of the king by the king's bench, when the king sat there in person; and other legal process, properly issued by the same agents, and enforceable by the power of the same principal, is not less effective, in the business assigned to it, than a mandamus. All writs lawfully issued in the name of the state, and by its authority, are the state's commands, requiring something to be done by a sheriff or other official or unofficial person, and a division of such orders into superior and inferior classes may be misleading. As our common law furnishes all writs necessary for the furtherance of justice and the due administration of the laws, there can be no legal right without a remedy, and there is no occasion in this case to consider peculiar powers of the king's bench (continuously vested in this court since 1699), or to distinguish between ordinary and extraordinary process, or between prerogative and other powers. Borty v. Walton, 64 N. H. 162, 169-171, 178, 179. The statement that a mandamus can be granted, or a bill in equity can be maintained, when there is no other adequate remedy, may be understood in a sense at variance with New Hampshire law. There would be adequate remedies if a mandamus were unknown in England, and chancery had not been invented as a separate jurisdiction. "Mandamus," "trespass," and other names of ancient forms of action, are used here as references to the character of rights asserted, wrongs complained of, or remedies sought, in particular cases, but with no recognition of forms of action as tests or limitations of rights or remedies. When, as in this petition, with due precision and brevity, a plaintiff asserts a legal right, and an infringement of it, and asks appropriate relief, his case is decided on the facts proved, without a waste of time in the consideration of a form of action. Gage v. Gage, 66 N. H. 282, 283, 289, 293, 296. In a certain sense, the only form of action is a party's application for a judgment, and his averment of a ground on which he is entitled to it. In another sense, there is no form of action. When used in the technical sense that formerly prevailed, such terms as "assumpsit," "certiorari," and "mandamus" present an obsolete doctrine of procedure, and an inaccurate view of our remedial law. An exercise of judgment on a question of fact is frequently called "discretion" (Bundy v. Hyde, 50 N. H. 120; Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 408, 12 Am. Rep. 55; Eckstein v. Downing, 64 N.

H. 259); and that question often is the justice, wisdom, or expediency of some course to be taken on an executive, judicial, or legislative subject, on which there may be no appeal or power of revision. Ex parte Morse, 18 Pick. 443, 446; Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 162, 186. The common council of a city may be compelled by mandamus to call a ward meeting for the election of an alderman. In People v. Brooklyn, 77 N. Y. 508, 511, 512, 83 Am. Rep. 659, it was held that the court was "justified in fixing the time for the election. The defendant, by its return, denied that there was a vacancy to be filled, and, although notified by the mayor of the necessity for an election, instituted no proceedings in regard to it. An order to proceed would have been nugatory, unless accompanied by special direction as to the time of the election. It is insisted, however, that this was within the discretion of the common council; and so it was, but the discretion was to be exercised, and not withheld. It was also to be so exercised that the order and election should be complete within the time provided. . . . And as it was obvious from the return that the discretion vested was to be abused, or so exercised as to work injustice, it was a matter to be considered by the court." "If the law requires a certain thing to be done, we may order it to be done by the party upon whom the obligation of doing it is imposed. If he is to act according to his discretion, and he will not act, or even consider the matter, we may compel him to put himself in motion to do the thing but we cannot control his discretion." Best, J., in King v. Yorkshire N. R. Trustees, 2 Barn. & C. 286, 291. "Mandamus . . . extends to all cases of neglect to perform a legal duty, where there is no other adequate remedy. It applies to judicial as well as ministerial acts. If the duty be judicial, the mandate will be to the officers to exercise their official discretion or judgment without any direction as to the manner in which it shall be done. If it be ministerial, then the mandamus will direct the specific act to be performed. . . . Were application made to county commissioners to estimate damages caused by the laying out of a railroad, turnpike, or common highway, the duty required of them would be a judicial duty. If they refused or neglected to perform it, this court would issue a mandamus commanding them to do it; that is, to exercise their judgment upon the matter." Carpenter v. County Commrs. of Bristol County, 21 Pick. 258, 259.

In this case the inquiry is not whether the defendant can be compelled by mandamus to exercise the governor's powers in a particular manner (approve and sign a bill passed by the senate and house, concur with the council in the appointment of a justice of the peace and the pardon of a convict, or perform a ministerial act requiring no exercise of judgment), or whether the independence of each branch of the government shall be maintained in matters of law or fact which it is exclusively authorized to determine (King v. Finney, 2 Barn. & C. 584, 596, 598; Decatur v. Paulding, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 497, 515-517, 10 L. ed. 559, 563, 569; Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 66, 106, 16 L. ed. 717, 729; Cox v. United States, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 293, 312, 19 L. ed. 576, 583; Cotten v. Ellis, 52 N. C. 545, 550; Cooley, Const. Lim. 126), but whether there is a vacancy, during which it is the defendant's right and duty to act, under article 49, and whether the state shall have the executive service to which it is entitled. Between the governor's and the defendant's right to "exercise all the powers" of the governor's office, there is no difference that excludes this case from the jurisdiction in which the title of the office could be determined, if it were disputed. The duty of jurors may be made as imperative as that of conscripts (Bowles v. Landaff, 59 N. H. 191); and the state's right to the executive service of the president of the senate, under article 49, is no less enforceable than its right to the judicial service of a juror. There is no express or implied exemption of the executive substitute from the compulsion of legal process. "The court will not interfere by mandamus with the executive officers of the government in the exercise of their ordinary official duties. . . . the court having no appellate power for that purpose, but when they refuse to act in a case at all . . . a mandamus may be issued to compel them." United States v. Black, 128 U. S. 40, 48, 32 L. ed. 354, 357; United States v. Raum, 185 U. S. 200, 204, 34 L. ed. 105, 106. The law generally authorizes coercion when a public officer refuses to act in a particular case in which it is his duty to act. Smith (N. H.) 482; Butler v. Selectmen of Pelham, 19 N. H. 558; Ballou v. Smith, 29 N. H. 530; School-Dist. v. Curr, 63 N. H. 201; School-District No. 3 in Greenfield v. Greenfield, 64 N. H. 84; Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 162. His refusal to act in all cases is not an exception to the rule applicable to his refusal in a single case.

If the defendant were exempt from mandamus, there would be another question. "That a man who has a judgment for possession may enter without a writ [of possession] is common learning. And why should the commonwealth, which cannot be disclosed,—the whole people,—require the aid of an officer to give them actual possession, when it is not necessary in the case of an individual? The highest evidence of title that can exist is the solemn judgment of a court. When, then, this judgment says that the demanded premises, which were the property of A., have been forfeited by him, and have escheated, inured, and accrued to the government, if this be not evidence that his title was transferred to the government, we must abandon the idea of the absolute verity of judgments. . . . The issuing of a writ of possession on such a judgment was . . . not necessary to complete the absolute title of the government." McNeil v. Bright, 4 Mass. 282, 300-302. "The service of an habere facias is not necessary to perfect or complete the title evidenced by the judgment. It is a convenient process to enable a party having a judgment in a real action to avail himself of the power of the law to obtain a lawful and peaceable entry and possession under his judgment title. It adds nothing to the strength of such title." Oreighton v. Proctor, 12 Cush. 433, 437; Farwell v. Rogers, 99 Mass. 33, 35. A decree that a deed "is hereby reformed," and "shall take and have effect, for all purposes, as if it had been originally made as now reformed," corrects the erroneous evidence of title without a writ of possession or an additional conveyance. Winnipisseeogee Lake Cotton & Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Perley, 46 N. H. 83, 109; Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 162, 182. In the construction of wills and trusts, and the location of boundaries, private ways, dams, and public waterways, declarative judgments may be complete remedies, settling controversies and removing doubts without the aid of the sheriff. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 171; Wheeler v. Perry, 18 N. H. 307; Goodhus v. Clark, 37 N. H. 525, 531; Petition of Baptist Church and Soc. in Londonderry, 51 N. H. 424; Methodist Episcopal Soc. v. Harriman, 54 N. H. 444; Kimball v. Norton, 59 N. H. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 171; Marcy v. Amazeen, 61 N. H. 131, 60 Am. Rep. 320; Gardner v. Webster, 64 N. H. 520, 522, 523; Concord Mfg. Co. v. Robertson, 66 N. H. 1, 19, 20. What trees a tenant for life can cut without committing waste may be judicially determined before they are cut as well as afterwards. Bennett v. Danville, 56 N. H. 216. A judgment establishing his right to cut all trees of a certain description, or all on a certain lot, would not be carried into effect by legal process. A common-law award is a judgment, and by such judgment a title or right may be determined without subsequent process of enforcement. Truesdale v. Straw, 58 N. H. 207, 213. A real action lies for a remainder in fee expectant upon a life estate. Although the tenant for life cannot be ousted, and a judgment against a claimant of the remainder cannot be enforced by any process that will give the plaintiff the occupation, use, or income of the land during the life of the tenant, justice may require adjudication of the disputed title of the remainder. Walker v. Walker, 63 N. H. 321, 323, 324, 327, 56 Am. Rep. 514.

If a judgment for the state in this case could not be carried into execution by a writ of mandamus, the plaintiff might contend that the suit should not be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. An amendment of the petition could raise the question whether the best procedure would enable the state to obtain a judgment establishing the fact of an executive vacancy, and the public right to the defendant's service as a substitute. A decision of this question might be as important as the establishment of a private right by a declarative judgment.

Frank LEE.

(.....Conn. ....)

A minor leasing rooms for a year while attending college is bound on the ground that the lodging is a necessary only to pay for the time he continues to occupy them, and may terminate the lease at any time.

(June 29, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for New Haven County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Talcott H. Russell, for appellant:

Education is a necessary and for that purpose the infant may enter into fair and suitable contracts if necessary for an entire year.

See 1 Roll, 729; 3 Comyn, Dig. 563; Pickering v. Gunning, Pal. 528; Chapple v. Cooper, 18 Mees. & W. 252; Squier v. Hyatt, 9 Mich. 274.

A lease may of itself be a necessity.

Wood, Land. & T. § 103, p. 146; Co. Litt.

172 a; Taylor, Land. & T. § 96, p. 76; Lewis v. Griffiths, 1 Hodges, 80, 1 Scott, 458; Peters v. Fleming, 6 Mees. & W. 42; North Western R. Co. v. McMichael, 5 Exch. 118, 125.

Our law is laid down in Riley v. Mallory, 33 Conn. 206; 1 Swift, Dig. 52.

The rule that an infant's contracts are voidable is one made for his protection. Where it is necessary for him to have power to make contracts the law will allow him to make them.

Chapple v. Cooper, supra.

Messrs. Watrouse & Buckland and Harry G. Day, for appellee:

To every perfect contract there must always be (1) subject-matter; (2) consideration; (3) meeting of the minds; (4) parties capable, in contemplation of law, to contract.

1 Parsons, Cont. 8.

But "the law assumes the incapacity of an infant to contract."

Riley v. Mallory, 33 Conn. 206.

Therefore, where an infant is a party, one element of a perfect contract is missing and it is an anomaly to say that there is any contractual obligation on his part. The contract, so far as there is a contract, is a unilateral one, binding only on the adult and voidable by the infant at any time.

Shipman v. Horton, 17 Conn. 481; Mustard

NOTE.—The above case makes an important distinction upon the question how far lodgings are a necessity for which an infant may make a valid contract.

Whatever enforceability a transaction with an infant may have is due solely to the operation of law, and not to any act of the infant, and the only obligation which the law implies is the obligation to pay the reasonable value of necessities actually supplied.

Even if assumpsit would lie it must in addition be shown to maintain this action that the room was a necessary.

The fact that he obtained and was occupying a suitable room elsewhere during this time disposes of this question, for those things with which an infant is already supplied are not necessities.

Conboy v. Howe, 59 Conn. 112; Trainer v. Trumbull, 141 Mass. 527; Pollock, Cont. *50; Barnes v. Toye, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 410; Johnson v. Lines, 6 Watts & S. 80, 40 Am. Dec. 542.

An infant is liable on his lease only while he is in possession and then only for a reasonable price.

Ketley's Case, Brownlow & Goldsborough's Rep. 120; Blake v. Concannon, 4 Ir. C. L. Rep. 323; North Western R. Co. v. McMichael, 5 Exch. 114; Taylor, Land. & T. § 96; 1 Keener, Cases on Quasi Contracts, 514; Holmes v. Blogg, 8 Taunt. 508.

It makes no difference how near to full age an infant may be nor what is his actual capacity in fact.

1 Parsons, Cont. *295; Lawson, Cont. § 129. The fact that an infant has an allowance and is not under the immediate direction and control of his parent does not confer upon him any capacity to make a contract.

1 Parsons, Cont. *311; Lawson, Cont. § 129. Evidence of custom is not admissible to contradict a positive rule of law.

Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 384, 391, 19 L. ed. 987, 989, 990.

The fact that a contract may be beneficial to an infant does not make it binding upon him. The privilege of avoidance still remains.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this case alleges that on the 1st of June, 1892, the defendant being a student in Yale College, entered into a contract with the plaintiff, by which he leased a room for the ensuing college year of forty weeks, at an agreed rate of $10 per week, payable weekly, and immediately entered into possession of said room, and has neglected and refused to pay the rent of said room for the ten weeks ending February 7, 1893. The answer, in substance, is as follows: On or about September 15, 1892, the defendant agreed to lease a room in the house of the plaintiff for the ensuing college year of forty weeks, at the agreed rate of $10 per week, payable weekly; that he then entered into possession of said room, and occupied it until December 20, 1892; that on said day he gave up possession of said room, and ceased to occupy the same, and then paid to the plaintiff all he owed her for such occupation and possession up to that time; that immediately thereafter he engaged at a reasonable price another suitable room elsewhere, and continued to possess and occupy the same till the end of said college year; that during all of said period he was a minor, and a student in said college; and that on December 20, 1892, he refused to fulfill said agreement with the plaintiff to occupy or pay for said room for the remainder of said forty weeks, and has always refused to pay for the time during which he did not possess or occupy said room. The reply to the answer was as follows: "Paragraph 1. Plaintiff admits all the allegations of said defense. Par. 2. Defendant, at the time of making said contract, was between nineteen and twenty years of age. Par. 3. Defendant and his parents are residents of the island of Trinidad. His father makes him an annual allowance, out of which he is expected to defray all his college expenses, including room and board, transacting the business incidental thereto in his own name, and not on account of his father. Par. 4. It is the general custom among students and lodging house keepers to rent rooms for the college year of forty weeks, and students also usually contract for and pay tuition by the year. Defendant, at the time of renting said rooms, had contracted for his tuition during the college year. Par. 5. The rent charged for the room was fair and reasonable, and was suitable to his necessities as a student and to his condition in life. It was also necessary for him to have a room as a place of lodging and study during his college year. Par. 6. Defendant could not have obtained a room equally suitable for his purpose, nor on such advantageous terms, if he had not contracted for the year, except by going to a hotel, and paying the usual charges made by hotels for such period as he wished to stay. The cost of this would have been considerably greater. Par. 7. Owing to the customs above noted, the plaintiff cannot rent her room for the balance of the year, and will be subjected to great loss, unless defendant is compelled to pay rent for the balance of said period." There was also filed in the case a second defense and a reply to the same, which, in view of the conclusion reached upon the first defense and the reply thereto, need not be considered. To the reply above set out the defendant demurred specially, the court below sustained the demurrer, and judgment was rendered for the defendant. The sole reason of appeal is the claimed error of the court in sustaining the demurrer.

Upon this appeal the facts stated in the answer, and also in the reply so far as the same are well pleaded, must be taken to be true. It thus appears that the defendant, a minor, agreed to hire the plaintiff's room for forty weeks at $10 per week, and that he entered into possession and occupied it a part of said period; that he gave up and quit possession of the room, and refused to fulfill said agreement, on the 20th of December, 1892, paying in full for all the time he had occupied it; that he has never occupied it since, but has been paying for and occupying a suitable room elsewhere. Under the facts stated, it must be conceded that this room, at the time the defendant hired it, and during the time he occupied it, came within the class called "necessaries," and also that to him during said period it was an actual necessary, for lodging comes clearly within the class of necessities; and the room in question was a suitable and proper one, and during the period he occupied it was his only lodging room. "Things necessary are those without which an individual cannot reasonably exist. In the first place, food, raiment, lodging and the like. About these there is no doubt." Chapple v. Cooper, 18 Mees. & W. 252; 1 Swift, Dig. 52. So long then as the defendant actually occupied the room as his sole lodging room it was clearly a necessary to him, for the use of which the law would compel him to pay; but, as he paid the agreed price for the time he actually occupied it, no question arises upon that part of the transaction between these parties. The question now is whether he is bound to pay for the room after December 20, 1892. The obligation of an infant to pay for necessities actually furnished to him does not seem to arise out of a contract in the legal sense of that term, but out of a transaction of a quasi contractual nature; for it may be imposed on an infant too young to understand the nature of a contract at all. Dyman v. Cain, 48 N. C. 111. And where an infant agrees to pay a stipulated price for such necessities, the party furnishing them recovers not necessarily that price, but only the fair and reasonable value of the necessities. Earle v. Reed, 10 Met. 387; Barnes v. Barnes, 50 Conn. 572; Trainer v. Trumbull, 141 Mass. 537; Keener, Cases on Quasi Contracts, p. 20. This being so, no 25 L. R. A. binding obligation to pay for necessities can arise until they have been supplied to the infant; and he cannot make a binding executory agreement to purchase necessities. For the purpose of this case, perhaps, we may regard the transaction which took place between these parties in September, 1892, either as an agreement on the part of the plaintiff to supply the defendant with necessary lodging for the college year, and on the part of the defendant as an executory agreement to pay an agreed price for the same from week to week; or we may regard it as what, on the whole, it appears the parties intended it to be, a parol lease, under which possession was taken, and an executory agreement on the part of the defendant to pay rent. If we regard it in the former light, then the defense of infancy is a good defense; for in that case the suit is upon an executory contract to pay for necessities which the defendant refused to take, and never has had, and which, therefore, he may avoid. If we regard the transaction as a lease under which possession was taken, executed on the part of the plaintiff, with a promise or agreement on the part of defendant to pay rent weekly, we think infancy is equally a defense. As a general rule, with but few exceptions, an infant may avoid his contracts of every kind, whether beneficial to him or not, and whether executed or executory. Riley v. Mallory, 33 Conn. 201. The alleged agreement in this case does not come within any of the recognized exceptions to this general rule. "An infant lessee may also avoid a lease, although it is always available for the purpose of vesting the estate in him so long as he thinks proper to hold it. . . . As to his liability for rent, or the performance of the stipulations contained in the lease, he is in the same situation, with respect thereto, as in case of any other contract; for he may disaffirm it when he comes of age, or at any time previous thereto, and thus avoid his obligation." Taylor, Land. & T. § 96. In this case the defendant gave up the room and repudiated the agreement, so far as it was in his power to do so, in the most positive and unequivocal manner. The plea of infancy, then, under the circumstances must prevail, unless the matters set up in the reply make the facts set up in the answer unavailable in this case. Upon this point, without dwelling in detail upon the matters set up in the different paragraphs of the reply, we deem it sufficient to say that neither singly nor combined do the matters so set up constitute a sufficient reply to the answer.

There is no error.

SOUTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

City of SIOUX FALLS, Appl.,

v.

Joe KIRBY, Resp.

(.....S. Dak. ....)

- *1. An action to recover a penalty prescribed by a municipal ordinance, not made a criminal act by the general law of the state, but forbidden by such ordinance, is a civil action, and may be brought to this court by appeal.
2. A municipal corporation possesses the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express terms; second, those necessarily and fairly implied, or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation, not simply convenient, but indispensable.
3. The right of a party to exercise dominion over his own property, and to build upon and improve the same, in accordance with the general laws of the land and municipal ordinances applicable alike to all citizens of a city, is secured by the fundamental principles of the constitution; and he cannot be compelled by the municipal government under which he lives to hold that right subject to the power of granting or refusing a permit to build upon or otherwise improve his property, vested in a city building inspector, from whose decision there is no appeal.
4. An ordinance of the city of Sioux Falls which prescribed that before any person can erect any building, or any addition thereto, within the city limits, he must first apply to and obtain from the city building inspector a permit, and who may grant or refuse such permit, and from whose decision there is no appeal, and which subjects such party to a penalty in case he builds without such permit, violates the constitutional rights of the citizen, in that it makes the right of the owner of property to improve and use the same dependent upon the decision of the city building inspector, and is therefore void. Keilam, J., dissents, on the ground that the ordinance in question does not contemplate or allow the inspector to arbitrarily grant or refuse a permit, but authorizes him to decide whether the proposed building will not conform to the requirements of the ordinance, and upon such decision to grant or withhold such permit.

how a building outside of the fire limits shall be constructed, and it also provides that any person constructing a building outside of the fire limits in compliance with the ordinance which is uniform, shall upon the payment of the fees be entitled to his permit. An ordinance of this character was sustained in Welch v. Hotchkiss, 89 Conn. 141.

Mr. Joe Kirby, for respondent:

The ordinance in question was void. First, the city had no power under the act creating it to require defendant to procure a building permit.

A municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily implied or necessarily incident to the power expressly granted; third, those absolutely essential to the declared object or purpose of the corporation—not simply convenient but indispensable; and any fair doubt as to the existence of a power is resolved by the court against the corporation.

A municipal corporation can exercise no power of taxation unless such power is expressly conferred upon it by the legislature.

State v. Smith, 81 Iowa, 493; Davenport v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 12 Iowa, 539.

There is also another reason why the ordinance in question is void. The building inspector must be satisfied; if he is satisfied the building may go on. If he is not satisfied it must stop. He is made sole judge of the matter, and it is his satisfaction or disapproval which will constitute or not the offense, and it is his approval or disapproval which will make the act a crime. It is not made a crime to erect a building dangerous or otherwise, but it is made such not to have the inspector's approval.

An ordinance to be valid must leave no discretionary power vested in the officer whose duty it is to execute it. The ordinance must specify the condition on which the license if any is required, should be granted, and the

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent and defendant was arrested and tried upon a complaint charging him, in substance, with having willfully refused to take out a building permit and to pay the prescribed fee therefor, after being requested so to do by the building inspector of the city of Sioux Falls, contrary to the ordinance of said city. The respondent was convicted in the city police court, but on appeal to the circuit court he was acquitted; that court holding that the provisions of the ordinance requiring a party to take out a permit, and pay a fee therefor, were void. The case was brought to this court from the circuit court by appeal.

The respondent moved in this court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the case should have been brought to this court by writ of error, and not by appeal. In a similar case (Huron v. Carter [S. Dak.] 57 N. W. Rep. 947) this court held that the act charged, not being punishable by imprisonment, was properly brought to this court by appeal. Following the decision of that case, the motion to dismiss upon that ground is denied.

The respondent relied on his motion to dismiss the appeal upon the further ground that the notice of appeal was not properly served upon the clerk of the circuit court; but after a careful examination of the affidavits read on the hearing, and the original records in this court, we are inclined to the opinion that the notice of appeal was properly served, and so hold. The only question that we shall consider on this appeal is the one upon which the circuit court ruled, namely, that so much of the city ordinance as required the respondent to take out a permit, and pay the prescribed fee therefor, was void.

Section 100 of the ordinance reads as follows: "Building Permits.—Any person desiring to erect, alter, or repair any building to be used exclusively not for business purposes, shall apply to said building inspector for a permit for such purpose and furnish him a written statement showing the location, dimensions and manner of construction of the proposed building, stating the material to be used, and manner of construction of chimneys and stove pipe connections, and exhibit to said inspector any plans or specifications of the same which he may have. If satisfied that such building, alteration, or repair is in compliance with the provisions of this chapter, the building inspector shall give his permit for such proposed building or structure on payment of the fees prescribed in the next section." Section 101 of the ordinance prescribed the fee to be paid for such permit, being from $1 to $4 for buildings not exceeding in value $5,000, and 50 cents additional for each $1,000 above $5,000, with certain exceptions not necessary now to be noticed, and section 126 provides that a fine not less than $5 nor more than $100 may be imposed for a violation of the ordinance. The learned counsel for the respondent contends that the city council has no power under the act of 1890 providing for the incorporation of cities, to require the respondent to procure a building permit, and pay the prescribed fee therefor. He admits that, under the power conferred upon the city council by the statutes of this state, it has power to pass ordinances to prevent the construction of buildings having dangerous chimneys, etc., within the city limits, and to provide penalties for the violation of such ordinances; but he contends that in this case there is no charge that respondent has erected any defective chimney or other appliance in violation of any ordinance, and that, therefore, no offense is charged. We are inclined to agree with counsel in his contention.

By chapter 87, article 5, Laws 1890, it is provided that: "The city council shall have the following powers, . . . (50) To prescribe the limits within which wooden buildings shall not be erected or placed or repaired without permission, and to direct that all and any buildings within said limits (which shall be known as the fire limits), when the same shall have been damaged by fire, decay, or otherwise, to the extent of fifty per cent of the value, shall be torn down or removed, and to prescribe the manner of ascertaining such damage. (51) To prevent dangerous construction and condition of chimneys, fire places, hearths, stoves, stove pipes, ovens, boilers, and apparatus used in and about any building and manufactory, and to cause the same to be removed or placed in a safe condition where considered dangerous; to regulate and prevent the carrying on of manufactories dangerous in causing and promoting fires; to prevent the deposit of ashes in unsafe places, and cause all such buildings and enclosures as may be in a dangerous state to be put in a safe condition."

Mr. Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, defining the powers of such corporations, says: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily and fairly implied, or incidental to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation, not simply convenient, but indispensable." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 89, and cases there cited. And this is substantially the rule as laid down in Treadway v. Schnauber, 1 Dak. 237, by the late territorial supreme court. It will be observed that no power is expressly granted to the city council to require of a party desiring to construct a building, or an addition to one existing, to procure a permit therefor, and that no express power is conferred upon the city council to require a fee to be paid for a permit. The city council, by the ordinance in controversy, it will be noticed, has not only assumed to require a permit to be procured for the erection of any building or structure within the city limits, and to require a fee to be paid therefor, but has provided that this permit can only be obtained from the inspector when he is "satisfied that such building, alteration, or repair is in compliance with the provisions" of that chapter. The ordinance is therefore much broader and more comprehensive in its scope than the power conferred by the statute referred to, and cannot be justified, it seems to us, as a reasonable exercise of the authority conferred by the statute. The right of a person to use and improve his property as he may deem proper, consistent with law, is a constitutional right, of which he cannot be deprived at the mere will and pleasure of a city council, or of any officer appointed by it. While the city council may pass any ordinance that may be proper and necessary as to the manner of constructing buildings, chimneys, and other fire apparatus so as to protect the residents of the city from the dangers of fire, and may prescribe such penalties for the violation of the same as are within the limits provided by statute, it cannot impose upon the citizen unnecessary burdens, and in effect permit him to improve his property, or refuse to permit him so to do, as the building inspector may determine. Section 100 of the ordinance does not contain any regulations to guide the landowner in the construction or alteration of a building upon his land, but requires of such landowner, before any such building can be constructed or alteration made, that he must apply to the inspector for a permit, which he is required to give when he is satisfied that such building or alteration is in compliance with the ordinance. It does not merely forbid the erection of any building which is hazardous, or which exposes property or persons to danger from fire; but it requires of the landowner that he obtain a permit from the inspector, and pay the prescribed fee therefor, which may be granted or withheld by such inspector, as he may or may not be satisfied that the building complies with the requirements of the ordinance, which, as we have seen, makes no provisions as to what shall be deemed necessary to constitute a safe construction. It is clear that the ordinance in controversy, upon its face, attempts to restrict the right of dominion which every individual possesses over his property, not according to any general or uniform rule, but so as to make the absolute enjoyment of his own property depend upon the arbitrary will of the city inspector, and therefore makes the right of the citizen to use his property subject to the will of such inspector, from whose decision no appeal is given. Such an ordinance cannot be sustained. Its provisions are not necessarily or fairly implied from, or incidental to the power granted the city council. Fick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 80 L. ed. 220; Newton v. Belger, 143 Mass. 598; State v. Tenant, 110 N. C. 609, 15 L. R. A. 423; State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 902; Bills v. 25 L. R. A.

Goshen, 117 Ind. 221, 3 L. R. A. 261; Anderson v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 178, 2 L. R. A. 110; May v. People, 1 Colo. App. 157; Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405.

We cannot close the discussion of this section of the ordinance better than by quoting the vigorous language of Mr. Justice Matthews in the case first above cited. He says: "But the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possessions, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts bill of rights, the government of the commonwealth 'may be a government of laws and not of men,' for the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself."

Section 101 of the ordinance is equally objectionable. While it does not in terms impose a tax upon the landowner who desires to improve his property, it in effect does so. The office of building inspector is created, and he is clothed with certain powers, not alone for the benefit of those who are about to erect buildings, but for the benefit of the citizens of the municipality generally; and to require a person, before he can be permitted to improve his property, to pay for a permit which is not required of the other residents, imposes a burden upon him not imposed upon the citizens generally. Such a burden cannot be imposed except by express authority. We know of no reason why a landowner should be required to pay a fee for the privilege of improving his property that might not be applied to the removal of a person from one part of the city to another, or to the renting or any other use of property. We are of the opinion that no such fee can be legally required, in the absence of an express legislative power authorizing its collection.

Our conclusions are that the circuit court ruled correctly, and properly instructed the jury to find a verdict for the respondent.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Fuller, J., concurs.

Kellam, J.:

I dissent. The law of the opinion is abstractly correct, but I think it is misapplied to this case. No one at this day will question the power of the legislature to prohibit the erection of buildings constructed of wood or other inflammable material within the limits of a city. It is a police regulation often demanded by considerations of public safety. In such cases the convenience of the individual citizen must give way to the safety of the public. Nor can it be doubted that such power can be delegated to municipalities. They are but subdivisions of the state, created by the state, and upon them the state confers a portion of its sovereignty to enable them to control their local affairs. Among the powers so generally conferred is the right to protect property from destruction by fire, by prohibiting the erection of combustible and dangerous buildings within the limits of such municipality, or within more circumscribed limits, to be designated by the governing body of such municipality. This is all plain enough, but the majority of the court is of the opinion that this particular ordinance is invalid because it subordinates the right of the individual landowner to improve his property, by building thereon, to the arbitrary will of a building inspector, in that it requires the landowner, as a condition precedent to the erection of such building, to make a statement to such inspector of the character and location of the building he proposes to erect, the material to be used, and how the chimneys are to be constructed, and then that such inspector may refuse a permit for such building, and thus prevent its erection, unless he is satisfied that such building is to be constructed "in compliance with the provisions of this chapter." I think the mistake of the opinion is in considering the power thus conferred upon the inspector an arbitrary one. The language of this section plainly implies that this particular provision is supplementary to other sections of this "chapter," which prescribe general regulations concerning material to be used, and manner of construction, and with them the statement of the landowner as to his proposed building is to be compared, and, "if satisfied that such building is [will be] in compliance" with the requirements of such chapter, "the inspector shall give his permit for such proposed building, on payment of the fees prescribed in the next section." It cannot be contemplated that his decision will be arbitrary or willful or capricious. It is to be the exercise of a quasi judicial function by a sworn and bonded public officer. In this respect he is put upon the same footing as many other ministerial or executive officers who are required to pass upon acts or instruments, and govern their conduct accordingly. Statutes have often forbidden the doing of acts otherwise lawful, such as selling intoxicating liquors, except when certain preliminary conditions exist or have been complied with, and have committed to local boards and officers the right and duty of granting or refusing permits or licenses therefor, according as they are or are not satisfied that such prescribed conditions exist, or have been conformed to by the applicant, but such laws have not been held invalid because under them such board or officer might capiously refuse to be satisfied. If the objection is good at all, it would be equally good as against the exercise of such power by the common council of the city, for the objection is to the nature of the power, and not to the character of the party exercising it. In the cases cited in the majority opinion the ordinances condemned contained no such element as appears in this. There were no general regulations applicable to all proposed buildings, as to material or construction, to guide and control the inspector; but the power of determining whether or not a permit to build should be granted was left to the unqualified, unguided, and therefore arbitrary will of the council or inspector. In State v. Tenant, a North Carolina case, found in 110 N.C.609, 15 L.R.A. 423, and cited in the opinion, the ordinance was this: "That no person, firm or corporation shall build or erect within the limits of the city, any house or building, of any kind or character, or otherwise add to, build upon or generally improve or change, any house or building, without having first applied to the alderman and obtained a permission for such purpose." The court, it seems to me, rightly held the ordinance void because "it prescribed no general rule for the exercise of discretion in granting permits," but allowed the granting of a permit to one, and the refusal to another, under precisely the same conditions, with no reason therefor but the irresponsible and arbitrary will of a majority of the aldermen. In Newton v. Belger, 143 Mass. 598, the ordinance was as follows: "No person shall erect, alter or rebuild, or essentially change any building or any part thereof, for any purpose other than a dwelling house, without first obtaining in writing a permit from the board of aldermen. The application for such permit shall specify the location and size of the building, the material of which it is to be constructed and the use for which it is intended." This ordinance was held void on the same ground stated in the North Carolina case, the court remarking, "Under the ordinance they may refuse a permit because, in their opinion, it is desirable that certain parts of the city shall be used only for handsome dwelling houses." These cases are representative of their class, but I discover nothing in them that requires the condemnation of an ordinance that first prescribes general and uniform rules regulating the kind of buildings that may and may not be erected, and then merely intrusts to an officer qualified by an oath and bond the duty of issuing permits to all who satisfy him that their proposed buildings will comply with the prescribed conditions. To me the ordinance does not seem obnoxious to the objection urged against it.

I also dissent from the second proposition of the opinion, which denies the right of the city to require the payment of a fee upon the issuance of a permit. While the specific power to demand such fee may not be found, in express terms, in the law under which the city is organized, I think it is there by intendment. The legislature having conferred upon the city, as a part of its police functions, the power of prescribing the kind and character of buildings that may be erected within its limits, as a prudential safeguard against the general destruction of property by fire, and the common council having, as a means of executing such general power, provided, by an ordinance regulating the matter of the construction of buildings, that the building inspector should issue a permit whenever, upon examination, it appeared that the conditions of such ordinance were complied with, it does not seem to me beyond the power of the city, as contemplated and intended by the legislature, to exact a reasonable fee upon the issuing of such permit. Such fee is not intended, nor should it be considered or treated, as a tax. It is simply an expense incurred at the instance of the proposed builder, in a manner and for a purpose authorized, as I think, by the statute and the city ordinance,—an expense incurred in obtaining his permit to build, the reasonable cost of which may properly be charged to the person procuring it, as in many other cases in the exercise of its police power the municipality requires the payment of a fee by a party securing a permit or license. This question, in the precise phase in which it is here presented, was discussed and decided in Welch v. Hotchkiss, 89 Conn. 140. The reasoning and conclusion of that court commends itself to my judgment, and is adverse to the views of this court. There may be grounds upon which this judgment ought to be affirmed. I merely dissent, in justice to my own views, from the opinion of the court affirming upon the grounds stated.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Susan A. PHELPS, Resp't.,

v.

John W. PHELPS et al., Appts.

(148 N. Y. 197.)

A woman cannot under the New York statutes enforce dower rights in land purchased with her husband's money and conveyed to a third person, who has contracted in writing to permit the husband to receive all the benefit of and have full control over the property.

(October 9, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order and judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an interlocutory judgment entered in the office of the clerk of Kings County, overruling demurrers to the complaint, in an action brought to establish dower rights in certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Herbert T. Ketcham, with Mr. Albert G. McDonald, for appellants:

A widow shall be endowed of a third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during marriage.

Statute of Estates in Dower, § 1.

Seisin in the husband is the first essential of the right of dower.

Where a grant for a valuable consideration shall be made to one person, and the consideration therefor shall be paid by another, no use or trust shall result in favor of the person by whom such payment shall be made; but the title shall vest in the person named as the alienee in such conveyance, subject only to the provisions of the next section.

Statute of Uses & Trusts, § 51.

The agreement and arrangement under which Lewis is alleged to have taken title did not vest any legal estate in the defendant Phelps.

“Every person who by virtue of any grant, assignment, or devise, now is, or hereafter shall be, entitled to the actual possession of lands, and the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, in law or equity, shall be deemed to have a legal estate therein, of the same quality and duration, and subject to the same conditions, as his beneficial interest.

Statute of Uses & Trusts, § 47.

A promise to give excludes all suggestion of present gift.

The holder of a “grant” needs nothing more from his grantor.

New York Dry Dock Co. v. Stillman, 80 N. Y. 174.

The equity sought to be invoked is claimed to exist for the prevention of a fraud. But there is no fraud or wrong according to the view of law or equity simply in preventing a woman from acquiring a right in something in which she never had or was legally or equitably entitled to have or to expect any right whatever.

Her husband having complete control of his own, has used it as he chose, and has lawfully and reasonably availed himself of a device to prevent her from acquiring any interest in it while he was employing it in business uses.

Messrs. Bailey, Bell & Crane, for respondent:

The novelty of the present action is no bar to its maintenance.

Youngs v. Carter, 10 Hun, 194.

An action may be maintained in the lifetime of a husband to preserve and protect the wife's inchoate right of dower in his lands, and such right is a valuable and subsisting interest which will be protected by the courts.

mean that she must be regarded as a creditor, and therefore has the right to set aside a conveyance that is in the way of her rights.

Youngs v. Carter, supra.

"Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in equity brought by a wife to establish and to protect an inchoate right of dower in certain lands now held by and in the name of a third person, but which were paid for by the plaintiff's husband, and also to establish her dower right in the proceeds of the sale of certain other lands similarly purchased and held. Her complaint having been demurred to for insufficiency to state a cause of action, we must assume all its averments of material facts to be true. After alleging a marriage and the birth of children, she sets forth a separation between herself and her husband, caused by his neglect, wrong conduct, and desertion. She alleges that since his desertion of her, "with the intent and purpose of defrauding her of her dower rights in his real estate, her husband had purchased various pieces of land, and caused the title to be taken in the name of one Lewis, as a dummy in the transaction, under an agreement and arrangement with the said Lewis that the said defendant [meaning her husband] should receive all the benefit of, and have full control over, said property, which agreement was in writing." She alleges that her husband "retained and exercises full possession and control over the same," and that when he desired to dispose of any of the property he would, "under the agreement and arrangement with said Lewis, present the deeds and papers to him, which said Lewis, under his agreement, was bound to execute;" that all of the property, with the exception of one piece, was thus disposed of by her husband "to bona fide purchasers, without notice of the dower interest of this plaintiff;" and that her husband "received the full amount of the purchase money paid for the same, for his own use and benefit." She then proceeds to describe the piece remaining unsold, which she alleges to have been conveyed by Lewis, at the request of her husband, without consideration, to the defendant Goodwin, a partner of her husband, "who was to hold the same under the same agreement that said Lewis had with her husband," and as to this property the plaintiff charges her husband to be the real owner. She prays for a decree which will adjudge, because of these transactions and their fraudulent purpose, that the proceeds received by her husband upon the sale of any of this property "are still real property, and that this plaintiff has an inchoate right of dower in the same;" that her husband be ordered to pay one third of these proceeds into court, there to be held and invested, etc.; and that, as to the land held by Goodwin, it be adjudged to be subject to her inchoate right of dower, etc.

With this as a sufficient summary of the material facts of her complaint, we are confronted with a pretended cause of action, for which I am unable to find any sufficient basis in our revised statutes, to which we must look for the authority for the claim of a wife to be entitled to dower in lands. To entitle the wife to dower, the husband must be seised, either in fact or in law, of a present freehold in the premises, as well as of an estate of inheritance. That proposition follows from the language of the section in the revised statutes that "a widow shall be endowed of the third part of all the lands, whereof her husband was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage." 4 Rev. Stat. 8th ed. chap. 1, title 8, § 1.

How can seisin be predicated of the plaintiff's husband with respect to the lands purchased through the use of his moneys, but never conveyed, nor agreed to be conveyed to him? The plaintiff certainly had no control over the use which her husband chose to make of his personal estate. That was his absolutely, and she had no interest in it which she could assert, beyond a claim upon him for the support of herself and their children. He might have chosen to use it in the acquisition of any of the many kinds of personal property, without any right on the part of his wife to complain of, or to interfere in, his acts. Instead of confining his use of his moneys to purchases of personal property, or instead of putting them into land, and of taking title to himself, he has adopted methods set forth in his complaint for its use; and they were effectual to prevent the vesting in him of any legal estate in the realty, although paid for with his moneys. He undoubtedly intended to prevent his wife from acquiring any dower right in the real property, in the purchase and sale of which he was dealing through his friend; but unless he was actually seised, or unless he had such a seisin at law as would entitle him to its possession, it is difficult to see how his wife could claim that she ever gained any dower interest. Her complaint seems to concede that her husband acquired no legal title unless through the agreement alleged to have existed between him and Lewis. But that agreement is not one which could operate to vest in her husband any right to the actual possession of the property conveyed to Lewis. The agreement is purely executory in its nature, and, if not complied with by Lewis, would only have given to Phelps a cause of action in damages for its breach. Taken at its strongest meaning, it cannot be said to import any grant by Lewis of any interest in the property to be acquired by him, through which a legal estate would arise in favor of Phelps. It does not rise beyond the promise of Lewis that Phelps should have the full control and enjoyment of whatever real property he might become vested with the title to under their arrangement. Phelps' rights rested in the mere promise of Lewis. It is manifest from the statute that, notwithstanding the consideration for the grant of the real property to Lewis was paid by Phelps, the title vested in the grantee, free of all claims, except the claim which creditors might have to assert that the transaction was fraudulent as to them. See sections 51 and 53 of the article of "Uses and Trusts." It is needless to argue that wives cannot come under that classification. The position of a wife with respect to her husband's property is limited by the revised statutes, and unless she can bring herself within their limitations, she is without the right to assert any claim to it. Concededly, in this case, the husband was never seized of the property in question, and the agreement set forth, and which is claimed to confer upon him its real ownership, could create no interest, or right to possession. If it were possible to assume a right in Phelps, based upon the agreement, to maintain an action for the reconveyance by Lewis to himself of the lands, such an assumption clearly negatives any idea of the existence of a legal estate in Phelps. We may assume, as it is alleged, that he was to receive the benefits arising from the lands; but if there was a beneficial use it must be united with a right to the possession (a right which is not alleged here), before we can perceive the existence of any estate upon which a claim of dower may be impressed. It is not pretended that any precedent exists in the decisions of the courts of this state for the maintenance of this action. So far as my examination has gone, I am unable to find in the adjudged cases any support for the proposition that a right to dower can be asserted, except with respect to real property of which the husband was actually seized during his lifetime, or to the actual seisin of which he had a legal right. The cases referred to by the respondent's counsel in the reports of the courts of other states are inapplicable in the construction of the statutes of our own state. They may or may not turn upon the wording of particular statutes; and however it may be, they cannot control when our own statutes are in question.

It results from my consideration of the case that the order and judgment below should be reversed and that an order should be entered dismissing the complaint, with costs in all the courts to these appellants.

All concur, except Andrews, C. J., not sitting.

Henry HEINLEIN, Appt.,

v.

IMPERIAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A life insurance policy payable to the son of the insured is not a wager policy, where the first premium was paid by the insured and the others by the son, who had general charge of the business of the insured and forwarded them in her behalf.

2. A life insurance policy surrendered on return of the premiums paid will be revived, where the surrender was procured during the illness of the insured by false assertions that it was a wager policy and threats of litigation unless it were surrendered.

NOTE.—Right to take life insurance for benefit of stranger.

With one or two possible exceptions the courts all agree that in case the transaction is bona fide, a person may take insurance upon his own life for the benefit of one having no insurable interest in his life, and that the latter may collect and hold the amount which becomes due upon the policy.

Some requirements are insisted upon in some jurisdictions by way of safeguards which do not appear in others, but these are more by way of local regulations of the rule than of exceptions to it.

Insuring one's life for the benefit of a stranger is not void as against public policy. Johnson v. Van Epps, 110 Ill. 551.

Where a person obtains a policy on his own life of his own accord and pays the premiums himself he may make the policy payable to one who has no insurable interest in his life, and by so doing no rule of law or principle of public policy would be violated. Bloomington Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Blue, 120 Ill. 121, 60 Am. Rep. 553.

A man may take out insurance in favor of his grandson, which in the absence of fraud will be valid and binding. Elkhart Mut. Aid Benev. Relief Assn. v. Houghton, 108 Ind. 236, 53 Am. Rep. 514.

A policy procured by a man on his own life, he paying the first premium and made payable to his sister's husband who pays subsequent premiums as agent for the insured, and who is shown to be a trustee for the insured, is valid. Forbes v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co., 15 Gray, 249, 77 Am. Dec. 360.

The fact that the beneficiary has no insurable interest is no defense to the insurer. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Williams, 79 Tex. 637.

In Wisconsin it seems that there is no statute prohibiting taking insurance on the life of another. Hurd v. Doty, 21 L. R. A. 746, 86 Wis. 1.

So the general rule is that a contract for the benefit of a third person is valid. Milner v. Bowman, 119 Ind. 448; Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381; *Vivar v. In Pennsylvania it was held in Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74, 49 Am. Rep. 570, the policy had been procured by the one whose life was insured for the benefit of one having no insurable interest, and had been assigned by the latter to a third person also having no insurable interest, who kept up the premiums. The court held that he could not hold the sum recovered on the policy, saying: "As a beneficiary merely, having no interest in the life, it seems to us very clear that he could lawfully have no interest in the policy. For if we admit the contrary; if we admit that one man may insure his life for the benefit of another who is neither a relative nor a creditor, our whole doctrine concerning wa-

3. A life insurance policy is not forfeited by failure to pay an assessment which came due after the surrender of the policy had been improperly procured by the company.
4. Instructions by an insurance company that premiums must be paid at the office, and that due notice will be given of the day when due will prevent forfeiture for nonpayment, unless notice has been given.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Bay County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to reinstate a policy of life insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Tarsney & Wicker, for appellant:

The son could be made the beneficiary in the policy.

Voorheis v. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. of Elk-hart, 91 Mich. 489; Amick v. Butler, 111 Ind. 578, 60 Am. Rep. 723.

Whether "where a party effects an insurance on his own life, for the benefit of another who pays the premiums, the policy is a valid one has been doubted, but the weight of authority seems to be in favor of the validity; it being in substance a contract with the beneficiary, who is the insured."

If the person whose life is insured pays the premiums, there can be no doubt, even if the beneficiary has no interest, since his own interest supports the policy.

Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 881; Hogle v. Guardian L. Ins. Co. 6 Robt. 587.

A man may insure his own life, himself paying the premiums for the benefit of another, who has no insurable interest.

Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192; Olsted v. Keyes, 85 N. Y. 593.

A son may insure for the benefit of his father.

Tucker v. Mutual Ben. L. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 50 Hun, 54; Forbes v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 15 Gray, 249.

There was no consideration whatever for giving up the policy and getting back nothing giving policies goes by the board." But the court in considering language used by Judge Sharswood in American Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Robertshaw, 26 Pa. 189, says: The position assumed by the learned judge is that where a policy is bona fide and founded upon an insurable interest, an assignment or gift of it to a friend or other person is no fraud upon the insurance company by which it was issued. The court then says that admitting this to be correct, it is no authority in the case in hand, and the result of the decision seems to be that although the policy may not be void as far as the insurer is concerned, yet the beneficiary if having no insurable interest, cannot hold the proceeds when collected.

But in a case arising a few years later in which Gilbert v. Moore was relied on as authority for the rule that one could not insure his life for the benefit of another having no insurable interest in it, the court said: "The validity of such policies has never been doubted. Policies of this nature are in no sense wagering. It would be denying a man's right to do what he will with his own to say that he could not in any form insure his life for the benefit of an indigent relative, or a friend to whom he felt under obligations." Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192.

In Texas, as will appear from cases cited, infra, the tendency has been to hold the policy valid but to prevent the beneficiary from taking the advantage of it.

But in Mayher v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. (Tex.) June 24, 1894, it appeared that at the request of the one whose life was insured, premiums were paid by the father of a child in whom the insured was interested, for the purpose of procuring the insurance in her favor. The court says that the facts bring the case within the cases of Price v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 68 Tex. 381, and Schonfield v. Turner, 7 L. R. A. 189, 75 Tex. 325, and that the transaction was practically an insurance of another's life by one having no insurable interest, and could not be upheld. But the court states: "The record does not present a case in which a man insures his own life for the benefit of another, the person whose life was insured paying the premiums, thereby making an investment of his own money for a friend selected by himself, and we are therefore not called upon to decide upon that question." 25 L. R. A.

The effect of this decision is therefore to leave the question open in that state as to the rule in case the latter state of facts existed.

In Swick v. Home L. Ins. Co., 2 Dill 160, the language of the court is such as to lead to the conclusion that one could not insure his life for the benefit of a stranger, but it seems from other language of the case that in it the beneficiary paid the premium, and of course if that fact existed it takes the case out of the rule as to insuring for the benefit of another, and makes it practically a cover for an insurance on the life of a stranger.

In Mutual Ben. Assn. v. Hoyt, 46 Mich. 473, the policy was declared void on the ground that it was a mere wager policy, but it is not shown who procured it and paid the premiums.

The beneficiary has the burden of establishing his claim. Pfeiffer v. Browne, 28 Beav. 391.

After a verdict in favor of plaintiff, the presumption is that the beneficiary in making the payments acted as agent for the insured. Fairchild v. North Eastern Mut. L. Assn. 51 Vt. 618.

Speculative policies.

While a bona fide transaction will be upheld the courts are very quick to condemn the contract if circumstances of speculation appear.

The form of the policy cannot be made a cover for a wager contract. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 385, 22 Am. Rep. 180.

In discussing the validity of a policy on the joint lives of persons who had been husband and wife, but were subsequently divorced and married to other persons, the Supreme Court of the United States in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. ed. 251, said: "There is no doubt that a man may effect an insurance on his own life for the benefit of a relative or friend. The essential thing is that the policy shall be obtained in good faith, and not for the purpose of speculating upon the hazard of a life in which the insurer has no interest."

Where the person whose life is insured is the real contracting party and continues to pay the premiums, it is of no consequence that the beneficiary has no insurable interest in the life insured. In case, however, the party insured is only nominally the contracting party, while the beneficiary named in the policy has in reality procured the insurance more than would have been a matter of right in case of actual default, and it cannot be imagined that any such arrangement would have been made, unless under some gross mistake whether brought about by fraud or not.

Tabor v. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. 44 Mich. 824.

While a person cannot generally be justified in acting solely on the statement of his legal right by an agent of the insurance controversy, yet they may be so mixed with unconscionable conduct as to stand differently.

Payment or tender of payments on premiums is not necessary where the insurers have already declared the policy forfeited, or done any other act which is tantamount to a declaration on their part that they will not receive it if tendered.

An insurable interest will be held to exist when the relationship is such that the assured has a legal claim upon the insured for services, or for support, or where, though such legal claim does not exist, yet from the past personal relations of the two and the treatment of the assured by the insured the assured has a reasonable right to expect some pecuniary advantage from the continuance of the life of the insured, or to fear loss from his death.

An insurable interest is necessary to support a policy of insurance, and a wager policy is void as contrary to public policy.

and paid the premiums, then in order that the transaction may be taken out of the category of wagering contracts the beneficiary must have had an insurable interest of a pecuniary character, or of that nature either present or prospective at the time the policy had its inception. Amick v. Butler, 111 Ind. 573, 60 Am. Rep. 723.

If the policy issues directly to the beneficiary and states that the advance premium is paid by him and that he undertakes to pay the future premiums as they fall due, he must show an insurable interest in order to recover, although the policy was procured for his benefit by the insured, and the premiums in fact were paid by the latter. Burton v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 119 Ind. 207.

Although the policy in form purports to have been procured by the person whose life is insured, it should not be so treated if it was applied for and obtained by another who took the initiatory steps for procuring it, stating in the application that it was for his benefit, and paid the original and all subsequent premiums on it. Rawls v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 27 N. Y. 235, 84 Am. Dec. 280.

A policy taken out nominally in the name of the insured and for his benefit and in the interest of one having no insurable interest, is void. Brookway v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 9 Fed. Rep. 242.

If the policy is a part of a fraudulent scheme to procure insurance on several lives to take assignments of the policies and then hasten the period at which the policies become claims upon the insurer, the transaction is void. Prince of Wales Assn. Co. v. Palmer, 25 Beav. 605.

If the policy is made in the name of the life insured, as a cover for the real transaction which is in favor of a third person, it is void. Shilling v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 2 Hurlst. & N. 42, 23 L. J. Exch. 265, 2 Bigelow, Life & Acc. Ins. Cas. 423, 27 L. J. Exch. 14.

If there is evidence tending to show that the policy was a wager, the question is for the jury. Langdon v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 272; Johnson v. Van Epps, 14 Ill. App. 201.

In Burke v. Prudential Ins. Co., 135 Pa. 235, policies were held not to be wagering, which were taken by the person whose life was insured and then handed to her daughter-in-law with directions to pay the premiums, pay funeral expenses and pay what was left to the grand-daughter of the insured.

The effect of existence of insurable interest.

If the policy is procured by a man for the benefit of his sister, it is totally immaterial what arrangement they choose to make between themselves about the payment of the premium. Where the relationship between the parties is such as to constitute a good and sufficient consideration in law for a gift or grant the transaction is entirely free from any imputation of being done by way of cover for a wager policy. Etina L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U.S. 551, 24 L. ed. 287.

Payment of premiums.

One of the tests as to the validity of the contract is to determine by whom the premiums are to be paid. If the one taking the insurance pays the premiums the transaction is generally upheld. But there is a strong, though not universal, tendency to condemn contracts in which the premiums are paid by the beneficiary.

The fact that the person whose life was insured made the application for the policy will not of itself render it valid if the premiums are all paid by the beneficiary. Trinity College v. Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 22 L. R. A. 291, 113 N. C. 244.

In Hearing's Succession, 23 La. Ann. 323, the policy was taken for the benefit of the wife of the insured and she paid the premium, and the court held the policy valid, although there is no discussion of the effect of the manner of paying the premiums, and what the effect would be if the beneficiary were other than the wife.

The fact that the beneficiary pays the premiums would not avoid the policy so far as the insurer is concerned, but if it is found that he has no insurable interest, he may be held to be a trustee for those entitled to the proceeds of the policy as distributees of the one whose life was insured. Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Blodgett (Tex.) 23 Ins. L. J. 812.

In Wainright v. Bland, 1 Mees. & W. 82, 1 Moody & R. 481, 1 Gale, 406, it is said there is no doubt whether a person cannot insure his life for the benefit of another who pays the premiums.

The question of payment of premiums has most Mich. 478; Carmichael v. Northwestern Mut. Ben. Asso. 51 Mich. 494; Smith v. Finch, 80 Mich. 332.

Whether this court would now decide that in this state this policy was valid, and that the complainant had an insurable interest in his mother's life, or not, the question, in the condition of the authorities, was, at the time of the settlement and surrender of the policy, in sufficient doubt and uncertainty to constitute a good consideration for the compromise.

Moore v. Detroit Locomotive Works, 14 Mich. 286; Hull v. Swarthout, 29 Mich. 249; Sanford v. Huxford, 32 Mich. 318, 20 Am. Rep. 647; Prichard v. Sharp, 51 Mich. 432; Nash v. Manistee Lumber Co. 75 Mich. 346; Pratt v. Castle, 91 Mich. 484; Mayhew v. Phania Ins. Co. 23 Mich. 105.

frequently arisen in cases of assignments and the cases being upon that question are therefore referred to, without attempting to discuss the general question of the validity of the assignment of a policy.

To show that assignments are treated as quite similar to insurance for a stranger attention is called to the following decisions.

If policies are valid at their inception the fact that they are assigned to one having no insurable interest in the life insured does not change the liability of the insurer. St. John v. American Mut. Ins. Co. 13 N. Y. 81, 64 Am. Dec. 529.

If the assignee has no insurable interest in the life of the subject insured which would sustain a policy to himself, the assignment would take effect only as a designation by mutual agreement of the contracting parties of the person who should be entitled to recover the proceeds when due. And if it should appear that the arrangement was a cover for a speculative risk contravening the general policy of the law, it would not be sustained. Stevens v. Warren, 101 Mass. 564.

The fact that the assignee has no insurable interest in the life does not avoid the assignment. Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York v. Allen, 138 Mass. 24, 52 Am. Rep. 245.

If the policy provides that the beneficiary must have an interest in the life insured it is a fraudulent evasion of the provisions of the policy to procure one to effect insurance on his own life and then to assign it to a third person having no interest. Scott v. Roose, 1 Long & T. 54, 3 Ir. Eq. Rep. 170.

An assignment of a policy is valid. St. Johns v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 2 Duer, 419; Murphy v. Red, 64 Miss. 614.

In Ashley v. Ashley, 3 Sim. 149, it was ruled generally that a policy might be lawfully assigned.

The question then arises as to who must pay the premiums, and while in many of the cases the question has not been discussed the following cases have considered it:

If the beneficiary is to pay the dues and assessments, the policy is void. Melly v. Hershberger, 16 W. N. C. 136.

If the assignee of the policy pays the premiums, it cannot be enforced. Franklin L. Ins. Co. v. Hazard, 41 Ind. 116, 18 Am. Rep. 313; Franklin L. Ins. Co. v. Sefton, 53 Ind. 330.

The policy cannot be assigned to one having no insurable interest if the premiums are to be paid by him. Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 23 L. ed. 324.

In Pennsylvania it is held that there is nothing speculative in the origin or continuance of a contract of insurance so long as the insured keeps it within his own control and pays the premium him-

McGrath, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill to revive a life insurance policy, issued December 22, 1890, on the life of Maretha Heinlein, and payable "to Henry Heinlein, Jr., hereon if living; if not living, to the executors, administrator, or assigns of said insured." One Smith, an insurance agent, applied to Henry Heinlein to take out insurance. Heinlein replied that he did not desire to take out a policy, but that his mother had spoken to him about insurance, and he thought that she wanted insurance. Smith requested him to see his mother, and let him know. Afterwards Smith, who was accompanied by a physician, met Heinlein, and asked if the latter had seen his mother. Heinlein replied that he had, and Smith sugself, but it is a different case when he assigns the policy out and out to one having no insurable interest. Downey v. Hoffer, 110 Pa. 109.

And the rule that an absolute assignment is void when the insured parts with all control over the policy is recognized in Carpenter v. United States L. Ins. Co. 23 L. R. A. 571, 161 Pa. 2.

In an earlier Pennsylvania case, however which seems to have been completely ignored in the later cases, it was held that one may have his life insured with the money of another and assign the policy to him absolutely. Cunningham v. Smith, 70 Pa. 450.

In New York it has been said that a person has an insurable interest in his own life. And no use made by him of the policy subsequent to the completion of the contract will convert it into a wager policy. Valton v. National Loan Fund Life Assur. Soc. 22 Barb. 9, 20 N. Y. 32. In that case the opinion is expressed that if a person insures his own life for the benefit of another, the contract would not be void although the latter advances the money to pay the premium.

And in Rhode Island in Clarke v. Allen, 11 R. I. 439, 23 Am. Rep. 426, an assignment of the policy was upheld, although the assignee paid the premiums subsequently falling due.

The reason for condemning a policy for the benefit of a stranger who pays the premiums is much stronger than that for condemning an assignment under similar circumstances. An assignment may frequently be made a matter of decided pecuniary advantage to the one insured of which there seems to be no good reason for depriving him. As seen by the cases cited supra if the assignment is simply a cover for a wager it is not upheld. On the other hand in case an insured derives a benefit from a policy made in favor of another the circumstances are usually such as to give the latter an insurable interest and it then becomes immaterial who pays the premiums.

The Texas doctrine.

In Texas there have been a series of cases the effect of which was to deny the general doctrine by holding that the beneficiary will be held to be a trustee for the heirs-at-law. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Hazlewood, 7 L. R. A. 217, 75 Tex. 323; Goldbaum v. Blum, 79 Tex. 638; Lewy v. Gilliard, 75 Tex. 400; Schonfield v. Turner, 7 L. R. A. 189, 75 Tex. 324.

Those decisions have never been directly overruled but they are somewhat shaken by a statement found in Mayher v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. (Tex.) June 21, 1894, which is set out supra. The future rule in that state is therefore left in uncertainty.

H. F. F.

gested that they go right up to the house, and they did so. The application was filled out, and the medical examination made. The defendant company declined to take the full amount, viz. $10,000, but issued a policy for $5,000, and the Berkshire Life took a policy for $3,000; a new application being made out, and another medical examination having been made. The first premium was paid by check on a bank at Saginaw, signed "M. Heinlein, by Henry Heinlein." The insured resided at East Saginaw, and it would appear from the testimony that Henry Heinlein also resided there, at the time the policy was taken out. The subsequent premiums were payable quarterly, and were paid by Henry Heinlein, although he testified that he had general charge of his mother's affairs, and paid the premiums in her behalf. The policy seems to have lapsed in 1891, owing to the failure to pay the premium promptly, but a health certificate was furnished, and the policy was restored. Maretha Heinlein was taken sick in the spring of 1892, and died July 2d, of that year. On June 14, 1892, the president of the defendant company and the secretary thereof and the general agent of the Berkshire Life Company went to Bay City where complainant then resided, and secured both policies from Henry Heinlein, refunding to him the amount of the premiums paid. It appears that, before going to Bay City, the officers of these companies had been to East Saginaw, and had there learned of the illness of the insured. Upon arrival at Bay City, they sought out Smith, who had solicited the insurance, and secured his services to aid in recovering the policies. The interview with Smith is described by him as follows: "We went up to a room, Mr. Angus, and Mr. Oliver and Mr. Early and myself, and Mr. Angus, I think, was the one who broached the subject to me, and told me that they were there to see what could be done with the Heinlein matter. As near as I can remember, Mr. Early showed me the papers, and asked me as to the certificate of health, etc., and wanted to know if I knew that that was graveyard insurance. I told him, 'No, sir;' I didn't consider it in that light; that the insurance was solicited in the regular way. He says: 'I understand that this, where the party is paying the premium on his mother, makes it graveyard insurance or speculative insurance.' I told him I didn't know that that was the case,—that this was a case of that kind,—because, in Mr. Heinlein's statement to me previous to this, he told me what his mother wanted the insurance for,—to protect the property of some minor children. That is what she was taking this insurance for. And Mr. Angus said to me, or Mr. Oliver,—I could not say which one; the conversation was between the two of them,—they said it was graveyard insurance, and that if he pressed it, that they should put it into the courts, and it would be a question whether they would get anything or not and stated to me that they wanted to take them, and would pay for the taking up of the policies, and wanted to know what I thought about it. I says: 'Gentlemen, if I have done anything wrong in any way, shape, or manner, I am willing to right it.' They wanted to know how I was willing to right it. I told them I was willing to go to Mr. Heinlein, and state to him their statements, and the only condition that I would go would be that they would pay the premiums in full that Mr. Heinlein had paid. And Mr. Early and Mr. Angus talked together, and wanted to know if I would go and do that, and I told them I would, and Mr. Angus signed a check for Mr. Oliver, and Mr. Early signed a check payable to my order." He says, further: "I told Mr. Heinlein that, as I understood it, we had got ourselves in trouble with that insurance; and he wanted to know how, and I told him Mr. Oliver says we had made a mistake in writing the insurance in that way, making him the beneficiary, as it came under the head of graveyard insurance, and that they wanted to settle the matter, and they would do so by paying him back the entire amount of his premiums that he had paid if he would release the policies, both for the Imperial and for the Berkshire; and Mr. Oliver says to him, 'That is the facts in the case,' as near as I can remember what he said. 'It comes under the head of old folks' insurance, and ain't legitimate business.'" Complainant testifies that he met Oliver and Smith in the street, and "Smith said: 'You are the man we are looking for.' We went into a store, and Smith says: 'We have got ourselves in a nice box. We have got ourselves in trouble.' I asked him in what way." Oliver is then introduced, and he proceeds to assert that the policies are void; that it was graveyard insurance; that Heinlein didn't have any insurable interest in his mother, and she had no insurable interest in him; that, if the insured should die, Heinlein could recover only the premiums paid in; that they would refund the premiums if he would surrender the policies; that, unless he accepted, they would throw it into the courts, and then he would get nothing; that he had insured his mother for a speculation; that they were in haste to leave the city; that Heinlein suggested that the insurance commissioner lived in the city, and that he would go to him for advice; that Oliver said: "There is no use going to him. He cannot help you in the matter, and, if you don't take what we offer you, why, we will take it, and throw it into court, and you will not get anything." The matter seems to have been closed out within a few hours. Heinlein went to the office of Shepard & Lyon, attorneys. The parties went with him. Neither Shepard nor Lyon were in. Heinlein then went to the office of a justice of the peace. They went with him, and the matter was then concluded. From the time that Oliver and Smith met Heinlein until the policies were received by them, Heinlein was not out of their sight. Heinlein had a short talk with the justice about the matter. Oliver and Smith were in the room, and Oliver reiterated the assertions as to speculative and graveyard insurance, and exhibited to the justice a pamphlet containing some reference to the subject of speculative insurance, and read therefrom.

We think that the facts bring the case within the rules laid down in Tabor v. Mich- igan Mut. L. Ins. Co., 44 Mich. 324, and that complainant is entitled to the relief prayed. There is no ground for the claim that this was a wager policy. It affirmatively appears that the first premium was paid by the insured, and the fact that the check for the premium was signed as it was, and was, as thus signed, presented and honored, supports Heinlein's claim that he was acting for his mother, had general charge of her affairs, and for her forwarded the other premiums. See also Renard v. Olink, 91 Mich. 1. Mr. May says, at section 112, if the person whose life is insured pays the premiums, there can be no doubt, even if the beneficiary has no interest, since his own interest supports the policy. Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 381; Hogle v. Guardian L. Ins. Co. 6 Robt. 567; Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192; Amick v. Butler, 111 Ind. 578, 60 Am. Rep. 723. It is apparent from the policy itself that the mother's regard for the son's interest was not the only motive for its procurement. The record discloses that the policy was made payable on the event of the death of Henry Heinlein to the estate of the insured, at the special instance of the insured. This fact tends to corroborate what Smith says as to the purpose of the policy.

It is urged, however, that a premium fell due July 1st, following the surrender, which was not paid or tendered. There are two reasons why this contention should not prevail: First. Payment or tender of premiums is not necessary when the insurers have already declared the policy forfeited, or done any act which is tantamount to a declaration on their part that they will not receive it if tendered. May, Ins. § 858. Second. On February 12, 1892, the company, by its president, had sent a written notice to the insured, which contained the following: "Your premiums on insurance with this company will be collected hereafter at this office, instead of at Saginaw Bank, and must be here before twelve o'clock noon on the day of maturity. You will receive due notice of day when due, amount," etc. See May, Ins. §§ 856, 856a.

The decrees of the court below will be reversed, and a decree entered here for the complainant, restoring the policy, and for the amount thereof, with costs of both courts.

The other Justices concurred.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

STATE of Maine, Appl.,
v.

George H. HAMLIN, Exr., etc., of Edward Mansfield, Deceased.

(.....Me.....)

1. A succession duty or tax on the transmission of decedent's estates is not within the scope of Const., art. 9, §§ 7, 8, providing for the valuation of property and that it shall be "apportioned and assessed equally, according to the value thereof," as these sections contemplate only the general, constantly occurring assessment upon the same property and do not include occasional, exceptional and special subjects and modes of taxation.
2. A tax upon the right or privilege of taking property by will or descent under the law of the state is an excise or duty and not a tax on property.
3. The constitutional requirement of uniformity is satisfied by a tax on the transmission of property by will or descent to strangers and collaterals, when it is uniform in its rate as to the entire class affected, although other classes of persons are exempted from the tax.
4. The right to transmit property at death free from a succession tax is not within the constitutional right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property.
5. Each beneficiary is entitled to receive $500 free from tax under a statute providing that all property which shall pass by will or the intestate laws shall be liable to a tax upon its value above $500.

(July 27, 1894.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County for the opinion of the Law Court of an appeal by the State from the Probate Court determining the amount of the collateral inheritance tax to be paid upon the estate of Edward Mansfield, deceased. Affirmed.

The court determined that under the provisions of the act the sum of $500 should be deducted from each legacy in the will which comes under the operation of the law, and that the tax should be computed upon the residue of the legacy.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. C. A. Bailey for the State.

Mr. A. W. Paine, for appellee.

That this is a "tax" within the meaning of the constitution and that it is "assessed by authority of the state" are apparently indisputable.

The tax is one levied or assessed for the purpose of supporting the state government and to be paid into the state treasury. Whether or not the assessment is one imposed "equally according to the just value thereof" is well illustrated by a case in which the owner of the estate taxed died in one week after the tax day. The usual city tax was of course assessed "according to the just value thereof." If the tax in question is legal a double tax of 2½ per cent is now to be paid in addition to that assessed one week before. The case would seem to come within the principles already settled in Brewer Brick Co. v. Brewer, 63 Me. 63, 16 Am. Rep. 895; Dyar v. Farmington Village Corp. 70 Me. 515.

The construction placed upon the statute in the above case as to the amount of exemption is in accord with the New York case of Re Howe's Estate, supra.

Upon the organization of state governments legislatures and courts were to a great extent deprived of power.

In adopting rules regulating so important a subject as the taxing power, special care was taken to provide for the same and the appropriate language was used to express the intended meaning.

What is the meaning of the words "all taxes assessed by authority of the state?" Does it include a "tax" on a dead man's property assessed by the legislature? And what is the meaning of the words "assessed equally?" Does it admit of a second assessment on one's property in addition to a prior one made" according to the just value "thereof" "equal" with all others?

The purpose of a statute must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect.

Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 288, 13 L. ed. 702.

The language "all taxes assessed by authority of the state" is too plain to allow of any question or doubt.

Strout, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal from the decree of the judge of probate arises under chapter 146, § 1, of the Statute of 1898. That section is as follows:

"Section 1. All property within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein, whether belonging to inhabitants of this state or not, and whether tangible or intangible, which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state, or by deed, grant, sale or gift made or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after the death of the grantor, to any person in trust or otherwise, other than to or for the use of the father, mother, husband, wife, lineal descendant, adopted child, the lineal descendant of any adopted child, the wife or widow of a son, or the husband of the daughter of a decedent, shall be liable to a tax of two and a half per cent of its value, above the sum of five hundred dollars, for the use of the state, and all administrators, executors, and trustees, and any such grantee under a conveyance made during the grantor's life shall be liable for all such taxes, with lawful interest as hereinafter provided, until the same shall have been paid as herein-after directed."

It is strenuously claimed by the appellee that the act is in violation of the constitutional provision that all men "have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying, and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property." Art. 1, § 1.

"Private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation; nor unless the public exigencies require it." Art. 1, § 21.

"All taxes upon real and personal estate, assessed by authority of this state, shall be apportioned and assessed equally, according to the just value thereof." Art. 9, § 8. Also of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Succession duties or taxes have been in existence in other countries for centuries, and have been regarded with favor, as a convenient and comparatively nonburdensome means of revenue. They were well known in Roman jurisprudence (1 Gibbon's Rome, p. 183), and were imposed upon all successions, except those to the nearest relatives and to the poor. The practice has long been resorted to in European countries, and was introduced in England in the last century, and was enlarged from time to time till 1853, when it was extended to all successions to real property, chattels real, and a vast variety of personal property and rights.

In this country they were imposed by Congress by Acts of June 30, 1864, and July 18, 1866, which were repealed in 1870. They were held by the Supreme Court of the United States to impose an excise tax or duty, and, as such, not in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Scholey v. Rew, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 831, 23 L. ed. 99.

The policy of taxing collateral inheritances was adopted in Pennsylvania in 1826, and has been adhered to ever since. In that state the statute has been constantly recognized as valid by its supreme court. Strode v. Com. 52 Pa. 181; Orcutt's App. 97 Pa. 179; Bittinger's Estate, 129 Pa. 883.

In Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, New York, and several other states, laws imposing succession taxes have been enacted and are now in force,—that of Virginia dating back to 1844; of Delaware, to 1869; Maryland, to 1864, the others, of more recent date. In Maryland the act was attacked as in violation of the declaration of rights in the constitution of 1864, which declared, "that the levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive, and ought to be prohibited; that paupers ought not to be assessed for the support of the government, but every other person in the state, or person holding property therein, ought to contribute his proportion of public taxes, for the support of government, according to his actual worth in real or personal property; yet fines, duties, or taxes may properly and justly be imposed or laid, with a political view, for the good government and benefit of the community." But the court of appeals held the statute to be constitutional. Robinson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court said: "We have not the slightest doubt as to the constitutionality of the law. . . . The restrictions imposed by it [the constitution] upon the legislative power, as to the objects of taxation, are explicitly declared. Poll taxes are denounced as grievous and oppressive, paupers are exempted from assessment, and all other persons are required to pay their proportion of public taxes according to the value of their property. Arbitrary taxes on property, without regard to value, are expressly prohibited, and all measures for the collection and imposition of taxes upon property are required to conform to this general principle of equality. Whilst thus providing for a uniform mode of taxation on property, it was not the purpose of the framers of the constitution to prohibit any other species of taxation, but to leave the legislature the power to impose such other taxes as the necessities of the government might require." Tyson v. State, 28 Md. 586; State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 294, 8 L. R. A. 873.

In Virginia the supreme court held the same doctrine in Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 480, 78 Am. Dec. 867. In that case the court said: "The right to take property by devise or descent is the creature of the law, and secured and protected by its authority. The legislature might, if it saw proper, restrict the succession to a decedent's estate, either by devise or descent, to a particular class of his kindred,—say to his lineal descendants and ascendants,—and it might impose terms and conditions upon which collateral relatives may be permitted to take it, or it may to-morrow, if it please, absolutely repeal the statute of wills and that of descents and distributions, and declare that upon the death of a party his property shall be applied to the payment of his debts, and the residue appropriated to public uses."

The Statute of New York (Laws 1885, chap. 488), contains substantially the same provisions, and nearly the same exemptions, as the first section of chapter 146 of the Laws of 1893 of our state. It does not differ in principle from ours. The question of the constitutionality of this act came before the New York court of appeals in Re McPherson, 104 N. Y. 306, 58 Am. Rep. 502, and that court said: "We entertain no doubt that such a tax can be constitutionally imposed. The power of the legislature over the subject of taxation, except as limited by constitutional restrictions, is unbounded. It is for that body, in the exercise of its discretion, to select objects of taxation. It may impose all the taxes upon land, or all upon personal property, or all upon houses or upon incomes." A like statute in New Hampshire was held by the supreme court of that state to be in violation of that state's constitution, which empowered the legislature to assess and lay taxes, but expressly limited that grant of power to "proportional and reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes, upon all the inhabitants and residents within the said state, and upon the estates within the same." And, by article 12 of the Bill of Rights, every member of the community "is bound to contribute his share to the expense" of the state. Curry v. Spencer, 61 N. H. 624, 60 Am. Rep. 387.

We are not aware that the question has been decided in any other state where similar statutes exist. These decisions of the courts, being based upon constitutions containing provisions in some cases unlike, and in others like, but not the same, as our constitution, have a lessened weight as authority here. In Virginia the constitution required taxes to be equal and uniform. In Maryland the constitutional provision required every person holding property to contribute his proportion of public taxes, according to his actual worth in real or personal property. But, whatever may be the particular language of the several state constitutions, all the cases assume that the constitution, either in terms or by necessary implication, requires taxation of property to be equal and uniform; and in all of them, except the New Hampshire case, succession taxes are regarded as special taxes or duties, or, more exactly excises, not falling within the regular and ordinary annual taxation of property, contemplated and provided for and guarded by constitutional provisions and limitations.

The statute under consideration provides a subject and mode of taxation not heretofore resorted to in this state. The act provides sufficient opportunity to parties interested to be heard and have their rights protected, and cannot be deemed to conflict with article 1, § 6, of the Constitution, which provides that no person shall be deprived of his property or privileges, but by judgment of his peers or by the law of the land, nor with section 21 of the same article, which prohibits the taking of private property for public uses without just compensation. Perhaps the latter provision is limited to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and does not extend to the subject of taxation. The word "compensation" seems to imply a money or other valuable consideration, as distinguished from the protection of life and property afforded by the state as a return for the tax contributions of its citizens.

Does the act conflict with the constitutional provision which requires all taxes assessed upon real and personal estate to be apportioned and assessed equally, according to the just value thereof? The first constitution of Maine provided that, "while the public expenses shall be assessed on polls and estates, a general valuation shall be taken at least once in ten years." Art. 9, § 7. Section 8, immediately following was: "All taxes upon real estate, assessed by authority of this state, shall be apportioned and assessed equally, according to the just value thereof." These provisions remained unchanged until 1875, when, by an amendment, the words "and personal" were inserted after the word "real," in the eighth section. Prior to this amendment there was no express constitutional requirement that taxes on personal property should be uniform; but it was left to the legislature to determine the subjects, mode, and rate of taxation of personal property, in its discretion, and without limitation or restriction, unless such exercise of power should degenerate into such arbitrary, oppressive, and unreasonable exactions as to be subversive of the principles of the constitution and the rights of the people. Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 618, 617.

The two sections, 7 and 8, as they now stand, must be construed together, to determine their scope and extent. Section 7 provides that so long as the public expenses shall be assessed on polls and estates, to equalize the burden as nearly as practicable, a general valuation shall be taken as often as every ten years. By its terms it necessarily implies a periodical and regularly recurring assessment of predetermined amounts, proportioned to the entire estates within the taxed district, to meet continuing and regularly recurring expenses, while section 8, manifestly referring to the same class of general taxes, provides for an equal apportionment and assessment according to value. It is clear that these sections contemplate only the general, constantly recurring assessment upon the same property, and do not include occasional, exceptional, and special subjects and modes of taxation. The constant practice, hitherto unobjected to, of imposing a duty or exacting a fee for the right to exercise certain vocations, not illegal in themselves, but made so by statute for the purpose of deriving a revenue therefrom, such as that required of itinerant vendors, retail liquor dealers, while a license law existed, innholders, auctioneers, insurance brokers, etc., notwithstanding all the real and personal property of such persons was assessed in common with the property of all others in the state in the general and recurring assessments, conclusively shows that many subjects of taxation have constantly been regarded as not falling within the prohibition of sections 7 and 8 of the Constitution. The tax imposed upon the franchises of railroads and other corporations, upon a basis which did not result in equal taxation according to value and proportion, has been held by this court as not in violation of the constitution, but within the legitimate province of the legislature. State v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 78 Me. 527; State v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 74 Me. 382. So, also, the extensive exemptions of property from all taxation, such as the property of literary, benevolent, and charitable institutions, acquiesced in for many years without objection, afford a practical construction of sections 7 and 8, that they do not require an absolute equality, but that the legislature may, in its discretion, exempt from taxation classes of property within the terms of these sections, although the effect is to increase the rate upon other assessable property, and may select classes of subjects from which duties and excises may be required, not, however, degenerating into arbitrary and oppressive burdens. The duties exacted by the state from justices of the peace and other officers, and attorneys before admission to the bar, have never been regarded as a violation of the constitutional provisions in regard to taxation, but as excise taxes, rightfully levied. Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 617-619; Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 256.

It is evident, therefore, that these constitutional requirements do not include every species of taxation, but all special cases like those referred to are, by implication, excepted.

The tax provided for in the statute under consideration is clearly an excise tax. Scholey v. Rew, 90 U. S. 28 Wall. 846, 23 L. ed. 101. The whole tenor and scope of the act is one of excise, and not a "tax upon property," as that term is used in the constitution. It is not laid according to any rule of proportion, but is laid upon the interests specified in the act, without any reference to the whole amount required to be raised for public purposes, or to the whole amount of property in the state liable to be assessed for public purposes. It is true that the act contains some language indicating a tax upon property, but it should be construed according to its essential principle, object, and effect. Substance, and not form or phrase, is the important thing. All exactions of money by the government are taxes, but they are not all levied by assessment upon values. The latter class refers to the burdens recurring periodically, which are assessed upon valuations of property, made at stated intervals. Danforth, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in State v. Western U. Teleg. Co., supra, said: "Such is the variety and extent of meaning attached to the word 'tax,' or 'taxes,' that no argument either way can be drawn from its use. It has been at different times applied to nearly if not quite every burden imposed upon persons, property, or business for the support of government; and, in acts for raising a revenue for public purposes, it seems to be used as meaning the same thing as 'impost,' 'duty,' or 'excise.'"

The tax under this statute is, once for all, an excise or duty upon the right or privilege of taking property, by will or descent, under the law of the state. It is uniform in its rate as to the entire class of collaterals and strangers, which satisfies the constitutional requirement of uniformity. State v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra; Brewer Brick Co. v. Brewer, 62 Me. 74, 16 Am. Rep. 395. "It is not levied as property taxes usually are. There is no given sum to be assessed, in which the percentage is fixed by valuation; but the percentage is fixed by law, leaving the amount to be ascertained by the valuation." The value of the property is resorted to, to measure the amount of the excise. The act taxing telegraph companies in terms imposed a tax of  $\frac{2}{4}$  per cent on the value of any telegraph line, etc., and it was strongly urged by counsel that this was a property tax, and not an excise, and therefore violated the constitutional provision requiring equal taxation; but this court, in State v. Western U. Teleg. Co., supra, held that the tax was an excise, and clearly within the constitutional right of the legislature to impose. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Com., 133 Mass. 162. The same reasoning applies with equal force to the tax on collateral inheritances. State v. Maine Cent. R. Co. supra.

The constitution guarantees to the citizen the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property (art. 1, § 1), which includes also the right of disposal. But the guaranty ceases to operate at the death of the possessor. There is no provision of our constitution, or that of the United States, which secures the right to any one to control or dispose of his property after his death, nor the right to any one, whether kindred or not, to take it by inheritance. Descent is a creature of statute, and not a natural right. 2 Bl. Com. pp. 10-18; Strode v. Com., 52 Pa. 181. At common law, prior to the statute of distribution in England (22 & 23 Car. II.), descent of personal property could hardly be recognized; and, even after the statute requiring administration to be granted, the administrator, after the payment of the debts and funeral expenses of the deceased, was entitled to retain to himself the residue of his effects, the court holding that there was no power to compel a distribution. 2 Bl. Com. 515; Edwards v. Freeman, 2 P. Wms. 442.

Degrees of kindred and the laws of descent in the several states of the Union differ widely. In this state there have been frequent changes in the law governing the subject. It is entirely within the province of the legislature to determine who shall and who shall not take the estate, and the proportion in which they may take, and whether severally or as joint tenants, per capita or per stirpes. In the absence of constitutional prohibition the legislature is supreme, and may dispose of an intestate decedent's estate, after payment of his debts, to any class or classes of his kindred, to the exclusion of any class or classes. It may limit heirship to lineal descendants, to the absolute exclusion of all collaterals. If it permits, as our laws now do, collateral kindred to inherit, no reason is perceived why the state is debarred from exacting an excise or duty from such collateral for such privilege allowed by the state. It is necessary to make such excise uniform as to the entire class of collaterals. It must not tax one and exempt another in the same class. But it is not a violation of this principle to require an excise from all collaterals and strangers, and exempt from the excise classes nearer in blood to the decedent.

The right to dispose of estates by will is of very ancient origin, but is a creature of municipal law, and not a natural right. Redf. Wills, chap. 1, § 1; Mager v. Grima, 49 U. S. 8 How. 494, 12 L. ed. 1170. Before the Statute of Wills in England (82, 84 & 85 Hen. VIII.), the right did not extend to real estate, and was limited as to personal, if the testator left a widow or children. If he had both, he could dispose of but one third of his personal estate by will; if but one, he could dispose of one half. This right has since been extended by statute to include real estate, and all personality. The restriction has never existed in this country, except as to widows, where right to dower and a share of the personal estate is secured by statute in most of the states, and in Louisiana, where the rules of the civil law prevail. Our statute of wills authorizes certain persons to make wills, and prescribes the mode of their execution. This is a statute right, and it is competent for the lawmaking power to modify or take away the right. If the right itself can be wholly destroyed, it must be competent to impose conditions and limitations upon it. The greater always includes the less.

While it has always been the policy of our law to allow collaterals to inherit, in default of lineal descendants, and to allow the disposal of estates by will, which take effect only at the death of the owner, and when his ownership has ceased, the policy may be changed if the legislature so determine; and it is competent for it, if it chooses, to retain this general policy, and to annex to the privilege of taking a decedent's property by descent or will, such conditions as it may deem wise. An excise tax upon the value of the property so allowed to be received by the collateral or stranger to the blood leaves him in much better condition than an absolute withdrawal of the privilege would. He cannot complain of unjust taxation when the state allows him to take a property subject to a duty of 2½ per cent, when the estate has the right to exclude him from the whole.

The exemption from the tax of certain classes, not any part of the classes taxed, is unobjectionable on constitutional grounds. State v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Me. 527.

We think the Act of 1893 imposed an excise tax upon certain inheritances and devises and conveyances, to take effect after the death of the grantor, and is not a tax upon property, within the meaning of article 9, § 8, of the Constitution, and does not conflict with any provision of the constitution of Maine.

It is claimed by the appellant that the act is in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits any state from depriving "any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." It is argued that the act fails to furnish sufficient means to parties interested for the protection of their rights, and confers upon probate courts powers and duties not authorized or contemplated by our constitution. The Act (sec. 12) provides for an appraisal of the estate subject to the excise, upon application to the probate court, by the state assessors, or any person interested in the estate; and (sec. 13) the probate court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate is authorized to "hear and determine all questions in relation to said tax that may arise," etc., "subject to appeal as in other cases." These provisions fully secure the rights of all parties interested, and satisfy the requirement of "due process of law." The act applies equally to citizens of this and other states, and therefore is not in conflict with another provision of the 14th Amendment, that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." Whether the parties subject to the excise take by will or descent, it is only under and by virtue of the laws of this state that the right or privilege to take at all exists; and when that law places all upon an equality, as this act does, there can be no violation of this constitutional provision, in letter or spirit.

The question whether the exemption of $500 in the first section is an exemption from the corpus of the estate, or a several exemption of that sum from each portion of the estate passing by will or descent to persons outside the exempted classes, is raised by the appeal. A careful examination of the statute satisfies us that the legislature intended the exemption to apply to each taker within the class subject to the duty. The language of section 1 is that "all property . . . which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state . . . other than to or for the use of the father," etc., " . . . shall be liable to a tax of two and one half per cent of its value above the sum of five hundred dollars," etc., and any grantee under a conveyance made during the grantor's life, to take effect after his death, "shall be liable for all such taxes." It is difficult to construe this language to mean other than that such taker, subject to the tax, shall be liable upon the amount received, above $500. A grantee is made liable to "such taxes." What taxes? Plainly, 2½ per cent upon the amount received in excess of $500. This construction is greatly aided by the second section, which, in dealing with limited estates to the excepted classes (whether including all or part of decedent's estate), and remainder to the taxable class, provides for an appraisal of the value of the limited estate, and, when that is ascertained, that value, "together with the sum of five hundred dollars," is to be deducted from the value of such property, and the remainder becomes subject to the tax or duty. This provision is plainly inconsistent with the claim that the $500 exemption is to be taken, once for all, from the corpus of decedent's entire estate. The legislature undoubtedly intended the same rule to apply in both sections. We think, therefore, that the decree of the probate court was correct, and the entry must be, decree of Probate Court affirmed.

1. Knowledge of an agent, with power to solicit insurance, collect premiums, and deliver policies, of the existence of a bill of sale of property insured, takes such instrument out of the operation of a condition as to title and incumbrances in a policy, which at his discretion he fills up and delivers. (Per O'Brien Finch, and Peckham, JJ.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, denying a new trial upon exceptions taken at a trial at the Genesee Circuit of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. M. H. Peck, Jr., for appellant:

A policy of insurance, like other contracts, is presumed to embrace the entire agreement between the parties.

After it has been delivered and accepted parol evidence is not admitted to control or vary its terms.

The bill of sale, whether intended to be absolute or as a chattel mortgage, transferred the title to the goods to the persons therein mentioned.

Woodward v. Republic F. Ins. Co. 82 Hun, 365.

If this mortgage or bill of sale was good between the parties, the fact that it was void as to third persons does not affect the question. Wood, Fire Ins. § 822.

By the terms of the policy it became entirely void, by the giving of this bill of sale; the insurance was not separable.

Smith v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 518.

Insurance policies must, like other written contracts, be so construed as to give effect to the intent of the parties as indicated by the language employed. Such a construction should be adopted as will uphold the whole contract and give effect to all its provisions in preference to one that will render some of its provisions nugatory.

Weed v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. 116 N. Y. 114.

The conditions violated in this case were contained in the authorized blank, and as to these the agent has no power in any manner, in writing or otherwise, to waive them, but power is given to agents to waive added provisions or conditions, provided such waiver is written upon or attached to the policy. It is immaterial whether the plaintiff read the policy or not. The conditions and limitations were a part of the contract and he was bound to take notice of them.

Quinlan v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 133 N. Y. 356; O'Brien v. Prescott Ins. Co. 134 N. Y. 28.

It was perfectly proper and competent for the parties to this contract to provide therein that anything done by, or known to, the agent should be without effect upon the contract unless made known in writing to the principal.

Allen v. German American Ins. Co. 123 N. Y. 6.

The burden of showing the power and authority of the agent is upon the plaintiff and it is not sufficient to simply prove that a person signed the policy as agent, and this does not prove authority in him to waive any conditions of the policy.

Messelback v. Norman, 123 N. Y. 578.

What was done by the adjuster in ascertaining the amount of the loss does not operate as a waiver of the forfeiture.

Weed v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. 116 N. Y. 106; Armstrong v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 180 N. Y. 560.

This is an action on the policy, and not to reform it, and evidence of a waiver, not having been pleaded, is not admissible.

Oakley v. Morton, 11 N. Y. 25, 62 Am. Dec. 49; Bogardus v. New York L. Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 828; Reining v. Buffalo, 102 N. Y. 808.

The power to waive could only be exercised in the mode prescribed, unless it was shown that the agent whose acts were alleged to amount to a waiver possessed actually or apparently the power of his principal in respect to the provision alleged to have been waived.

Messelback v. Norman, supra; Glenn v. Garth, 188 N. Y. 18.

It was essentially a conditional obligation of the company, and when he accepted it the plaintiff became chargeable with knowledge of its contents and took it according and subject to its terms. There is no reason why any provision should be set aside.

Allen v. German-American Ins. Co. 128 N. Y. 6; Quinlan v. Providence-Washington Ins. Co. 188 N. Y. 356.

Of such a condition existing in another case the supreme court says: Had the company been advised that Mr. Kiernan was placing mortgage after mortgage upon his property insured, and that he had suffered a judgment to be recovered against him, it would undoubtedly have availed itself of the right reserved to cancel the policy; its officials would have concluded that there was a moral hazard which they did not wish to be subjected to.

Kiernan v. Agricultural Ins. Co. of Watertown, 72 Hun, 519.

Mr. Safford E. North, for respondent:

The knowledge of the agent at the time the policy was issued of any fact or condition contrary to the terms of the policy is to be deemed the knowledge of the company itself.

The interest of the plaintiff in the property was proved on the trial to be precisely what defendant understood it to be when the policy was contracted for.

Nothing more than an insurable interest was necessary.

The plaintiff had continued in possession, bought new goods and exercised acts of ownership. Upon the undisputed evidence in the case he was still the sole owner.

Barry v. Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 1.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment in this case was recovered upon a policy of insurance issued April 23, 1891, at one year, upon a store and the goods therein, which were owned by the plaintiff. By the terms of the policy the risk was distributed as follows: Upon the store, a sum not exceeding $1,000; the goods, a sum not exceeding $1,200; and the furniture and safe, a sum not exceeding $100. The entire property was destroyed by fire on the 27th of September, 1891. The complaint alleges, and the answer admits, that the loss was adjusted and determined between the plaintiff and a general agent of the defendant on the 6th of October following at $1,950, and the recovery was for this sum and interest. The only defense interposed by the answer, or urged upon the argument of the appeal in this court, was a breach on the part of the plaintiff of one, or perhaps two, of the conditions contained in the following clause of the policy: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void . . . if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional, sole ownership, . . . or if the subject of insurance be personal property, and be or become incumbered by a chattel mortgage. . . . In any matter relating to this insurance, no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company. . . . This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions as may be indorsed hereon or added hereto; and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company, shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as, by the terms of this policy, may be the subject of agreement, indorsed hereon or added hereto; and, as to such provisions and conditions, no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto. Nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under the policy exist, or be claimed by the insured, unless so written or attached."

It was shown at the trial that the plaintiff, about two months before the policy had been issued to him, had executed and delivered to his brother an instrument in the form of a bill of sale upon the stock of goods, furniture, and fixtures in the store, which on March 3, 1891, was filed in the town clerk's office. This instrument, in consideration of $500, purports to transfer the plaintiff's interest in the property absolutely to his brother. The proof at the trial tended to show that there was in fact no consideration for the transfer; that it was colorable, merely, and made between the two brothers with reference to some litigations pending or threatened against the plaintiff. The brother never in fact paid anything as a consideration for the transfer, and no debt was due or owing to him by the plaintiff. He never in fact claimed any title to the property, or any right to its possession, which always remained in the plaintiff. There was also proof that the existence of this bill of sale, and its true consideration, character, and purpose, were disclosed to the defendant's agent before the policy was issued or delivered. The court submitted two questions to the jury: (1) Whether the defendant, notwithstanding the condition of the policy, had knowledge of all the facts respecting the existence, nature, and purpose of the bill of sale; instructing them that the knowledge of the agent was the knowledge of the company, and that, if they found that the defendant had knowledge of the facts, the policy was not avoided. (2) Whether a statement contained in the proofs of loss, to the effect that there was no incumbrance on the property at the time, was willfully false, and known to be so by the plaintiff when he made the proofs, and was made for the purpose of defrauding the defendant; instructing them that, if it was not then it did not amount to false swearing, within the intent and meaning of a condition in the policy. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and hence all the disputed facts material to the questions of law must be deemed to be established in the plaintiff's favor.

It was said by Judge Andrews in Walsh v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 73 N. Y. 11, upon the authority of many cases, that "conditions for the prepayment of premium, and the like, which enter into the validity of a contract of insurance at its inception, may be waived by agents and are waived, if so intended; although they remain in the policy when delivered, and that a contract for renewal is, for the purpose, to be treated as the original contract." It has uniformly been held by this court that a condition of this character in a contract of insurance will not operate to avoid it after a loss, providing the company, before delivering the policy, had knowledge of the fact, that the insured, notwithstanding the warranty, or the statement and the condition, was not the sole owner, or that it was incumbered. In such cases the company is deemed to have waived the condition, or by the delivery of the policy with the condition avoiding it in case the insured is not the sole owner, or that the property is incumbered, and accepting the premium, is held estopped from setting up the condition as a defense. It was never supposed that such a condition was intended to apply to a state of facts in regard to which the company had been fully informed when it accepted the risk. The cases on this point are numerous, and it is impossible to make any distinction in principle between the conditions considered and that involved in the case at bar. Van Schoick v. Niagara Falls Ins. Co. 68 N. Y. 434; White v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 76 N. Y. 415; Woodruff v. Imperial F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 184; Short v. Home Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 16, 43 Am. Rep. 138; McNally v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 137 N. Y. 389; Carpenter v. German American Ins. Co. 185 N. Y. 298; Cross v. National F. Ins. Co. 182 N. Y. 133; Berry v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 182 N. Y. 49. In these cases it was held, either that the company had waived the condition, or was estopped by the delivery of the policy and the receipt of the premium, since, under such circumstances, it could not be supposed that it intended to deliver to the insured a policy which it knew to be void. When the underwriter, before the inception of the contract, is informed by the owner that the property is incumbered, but still delivers the policy with the condition embodied in it, then, as it seems to me, it is not so much a question of waiver or estoppel, as a question whether the condition ever attached or operated, upon the facts thus disclosed. It can, of course, operate in the future upon transfers or incumbrances, as the facts arise, and then the question is one of waiver. But, when the facts are all known before any contract is made, a condition against a state of things known by all the parties to exist cannot be deemed to be within their intention or purpose. This case cannot be taken out of the rule, by any possible distinction, unless it be by the character and powers of the agent of the defendant, to whom, upon the finding of the jury, the facts were communicated. It is urged that the cases cited do not apply, for the reason that the waiver there was by a general agent. That may be true with respect to the four cases last cited. But it does not seem to me to be so much a question of power or authority in an agent to waive a condition in the contract, as of knowledge by the company, through its agent, of the real facts. In the Carpenter Case, supra, the information as to the true state of the title was given to a mere clerk of the general agent; and we held that such knowledge was imputable to the company through the general agent, for whom the clerk acted in soliciting the insurance, and that a condition of this character remaining in the policy did not avoid it. Now, the powers of the agent in this case were certainly much broader than those of the clerk in the case referred to. In this case the person to whom the information was communicated was certainly an agent appointed by the defendant itself, while in that the person had no authority directly from the company, but was a mere servant or clerk, acting for, and solely under the authority of, the agent. The agent, in this case, and the clerk, in the other, were engaged in precisely the same duty, and performing the same service, when they acquired the knowledge as to the condition of the property and the state of the title. They were both soliciting insurance, and ascertaining the character and condition of the property upon which the risk was about to be taken; and I am unable to suggest any reason for imputing knowledge in the one case, and not in the other. Moreover, the record is entirely silent as to any facts tending to show that in this case the agent was acting in pursuance of a special or limited power. On the face of the policy, he appears to be the duly authorized agent of the defendant, and actually did grant special permits, and waive conditions in the policy. He had power to waive conditions, providing it was done in the manner stipulated in the policy; that is to say, in writing. He had power to solicit insurance, collect premiums, and deliver policies. There is no proof in the record that the plaintiff ever made application for this policy, written or otherwise, or that he touched the company at any point, or in any form, except through this agent. The fair inference from the proof is that the defendant furnished the agent with policies duly executed, which he filled up and delivered at his discretion, reporting the facts to the company. There is nothing on the face of the policy, and nothing was communicated to the plaintiff, to lead him to believe that the powers of the agent were special or restricted. Insurance companies, doing business by agencies at a distance from their principal place of business, are responsible for the acts of the agent, within the general scope of the business intrusted to his care; and no limitations of his authority will be binding on parties with whom he deals, which are not brought to their knowledge. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. of Maine v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 222, 20 L. ed. 617; Mercerau v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 66 N. Y. 278; Bodine v. Exchange F. Ins. Co. 51 N. Y. 117, 10 Am. Rep. 566; Arff v. Star F. Ins. Co. 125 N. Y. 57, 10 L. R. A. 609.

It was held in the case of Ellis v. Albany City F. Ins. Co., 50 N. Y. 402, 10 Am. Rep. 495, that an agent, with precisely such powers as I have supposed the agent in this case possessed, could bind the company by a parol contract of insurance, while an application for a policy was pending, but none delivered till after a loss. I am unable to discover in the record any basis for the contention that the knowledge of the agent as to the existence and purpose of the bill of sale is not the knowledge of the defendant. On the contrary, his knowledge of the facts is, I think, imputable to his principal. So far as appears, the plaintiff dealt with him as the representative of the company. If there were in fact any limitations or restrictions on his powers as an ordinary agent, it was for the defendant to show it. His commission was not put in evidence, nor any proof given tending to show that he was not what he was described in the complaint,—the defendant's duly authorized manager or agent at the place where the contract was made. There was no other means of communication between the plaintiff and defendant employed. So far as appears, he made the contract for his principal, and the knowledge that he obtained in the course of the business was the knowledge of the defendant.

There is another view of the question that deserves some notice. Conditions in contracts of insurance against liability when the property is incumbered, or where the title is not absolute in the insured, are inserted for the purpose of guarding against the moral hazard involved. When the transfer or incumbrance is merely colorable or nominal, and not real or effective, the reasons that induced the stipulation do not apply. Was there any real sale or transfer of this property, within the meaning of the policy? Nothing was done, except to execute and file a paper. There was no intention, in fact, to transfer the title, or vest any beneficial interest in the nominal vendee. There was no debt to be enforced, no consideration passed, and the use and possession remained unchanged. The filing of the paper added nothing to its validity. It was not a mortgage, nor intended as security for any debt. It was a mere paper transfer, without consideration, and without delivery of possession; and while it had the form, it had none of the legal elements, necessary, even between the parties, to constitute a valid contract of sale. In legal effect, it was, I think, the same as an unexecuted gift. The worst that can be said of it is that it was intended to defraud creditors; but, if that be true, still the moral hazard which was the basis of the condition of the policy would still be absent, since the plaintiff's interest in the property at the time of the insurance was in fact the same as before the paper was executed. There is no legal ground upon which this court can properly disturb the verdict, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO., App't.

(.....N. Y. ....)

The public easement in a rural highway of which the fee is in an adjoining owner does not include the permanent and exclusive appropriation of any part of the highway by poles and wires of a telegraph and telephone company.

(October 2, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Erie County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of a strip of land subject to the public easement to use the same for highway purposes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Melville Egleston, for appellant:

The erection of the defendant's telephone line upon the highway was duly authorized by law.

The legislature may authorize the erection of a telegraph or telephone line on a highway without compensation to the owner of the fee.

The telegraph and telephone are newly discovered methods of exercising the public easement.

the highway subserves the proper purpose of the highway, and does not, in any way, incommode its use by the public, then certainly such use of the highway is within the scope of the public easement, and the rights of the owner of the fee are in no way affected.

Waterloo Presby. Soc. Trustees v. Auburn & R. R. Co. 8 Hill, 567, was placed upon the ground that the public had only the right of way, with the powers and privileges incident to such right—such as digging the soil, etc., for repairs thereto. But this argument, supposing "right of way" to mean only a part of passing over the surface—which we certainly do not admit was not necessary to sustain the decision of either case, and the old authorities cited as authority (Lade v. Shepherd, 2 Strange, 1004; Northampton v. Ward, 1 Wils. 110; Perley v. Chandler, 6 Mass. 454, 4 Am. Dec. 159; Harrison v. Parker, 6 East, 154; Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447, 8 Am. Dec. 268; Gidney v. Earl, 12 Wend. 96), do not really support it.

The purpose of a highway is not travel and traffic merely, but intercommunication.

The rule which the court may be expected to adopt will not be identical with that of the earlier decisions sometimes referred to as establishing the law.

The onward spirit of the age must, to a reasonable extent, have its way. The law is made for the times, and will be made or modified by them. The expanded and still expanding genius of the common law should adapt it here, as elsewhere, to the improved and improving condition of our country and our countrymen.

Mr. Sherman S. Rogers, also for appellant:

The function of the telephone and telegraph is but a new and legitimate exercise of the easement to which the land was subjected by its appropriation and dedication as a public highway.

Upon a public highway, if the user be public, it is of no importance whether the user be directly through the officers and employees of the state or through an agency to which the state has entrusted such user for the benefit of the public, although the agent may derive private emolument from the operation and though the appliances employed for such user are its private property.

The operation of an electric telegraph or telephone is a public use.

Witcher v. Holland Water-Works Co. 66 Hun, 619; Pocantico Water-Works Co. v. Bird, 180 N. Y. 249.

The question then for determination in this case is not in any material respect different from what it would be if this telephone line had been built and operated by the state pursuant to statute and through its own officials.

If the transmission of intelligence upon wires strung in or over a public highway be not in substance a mere newly discovered means of exercising the public easement, it is still such a use of the easement as must have been contemplated in the dedication and acceptance of the public highway, and this is so for the same reason that sewers, water pipes and gas pipes and posts may be properly laid or placed in the highway.

The public highway is an instrument of civilization, the use of which necessarily develops public wants, which cannot practically be supplied except by its use, and which cannot be met by the exercise simply of the right of passage and repassage.

It must be the legal intentment, therefore, that in the dedication of the highway the owner purposed that it should be used in the discretion of the public to meet every such necessity or at least every such necessity as could be so met without seriously impairing the original and obvious right of passage.

Mr. John M. Hull, for respondent:

Placing telegraph and telephone poles and wires in highways is an additional burden upon the soil, and constitutes a taking which requires compensation to be made.

Private property cannot be taken for a public use without paying or securing to the owner just compensation.

The same rule applies to horse railways, where the fee is in the abutting owner.

Ortig v. Rochester City & B. R. Co. 39 N. Y. 404.

The laying of a gas pipe along a country highway was likewise held to be an additional burden upon the fee, not included in the easement acquired by the public, and entitled the owner of the land to compensation.

Re Bloomfield & R. Nat. Gas-Light Co. v. Oaklins, 63 N. Y. 886.

There are also analogous cases holding that the construction of a telegraph line along the right of way of a railroad is a taking of the company's land, for which it is entitled to compensation.

Southwestern R. Co. v. Southern & Atlantic Tele. Co. 46 Ga. 42, 12 Am. Rep. 585; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Rich, 19 Kan. 517, 27 Am. Rep. 159.

The safer and perhaps sounder view is that such a use of the streets or highway, attended as they may be especially in cities with serious damage and inconvenience to the abutting owner, is not a street or highway use proper, and hence entitles such owner to compensation for such use, or for any actual injury to his property caused by poles and lines of wire placed in front thereof.

The argument drawn from public utility is entitled to no consideration.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question involved upon this appeal is the extent of the public easement in a rural highway, the fee of which is in the adjoining owner. The plaintiff herein is the owner in fee, subject to the public easement, of the premises in question, which constitute part of a public highway in the town of Alden, and county of Erie, in this state. The defendant occupies a portion of the highway with its poles, upon which it has strung its wires for the purpose of conducting its business as a telephone and telegraph company. It is incorporated and organized under the laws of this state for the incorporation and regulation of telegraph companies. The plaintiff claims that the defendant has no right to occupy any portion of the public highway with its poles, and he has, therefore, commenced this action of ejectment to recover the premises described in the complaint, subject to the public easement therein for a highway. The court upon the trial directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and, the judgment entered upon it having been affirmed by the general term, the defendant has appealed here.

The defendant admits that if the use it makes of the highway is outside the scope of the public easement, then the consent of the owner of the soil is necessary, or compensation must be made him for such use. By the 5th section of chapter 265 of the Laws of 1848, providing for the incorporation and regulation of telegraph companies, as amended by the second section of chapter 471 of the Laws of 1853, it is provided that telegraph corporations may construct their lines upon any of the public roads, streets, or highways of the state, provided the same shall not be so constructed as to incommode the public use of the roads or highways; and they are also authorized to construct the same upon any other land, subject to the right of the owner to full compensation therefor. It has been held that a telephone company is, within the provision of the statute, a telegraph company. Telephone Cases, 126 U. S. 6, 81 L. ed. 868; Hudson River Teleph. Co. v. Water-vliet Turnp. & R. Co. 185 N. Y. 893, 404, 17 L. R. A. 674. The defendant does not, however, contend that the statute gives any right to these companies to make use of the highway for the purpose of constructing their lines thereon without compensation to the owner of the fee of the highway, unless such use is in its nature a part of the public easement for which highways are constructed. The statute, therefore, does not aid in the decision of this question, but it is cited by the defendant as evidence of legislative belief that such use of the highway was legitimate, and within the purpose for which highways were laid out. Defendant also urges that some weight is to be attached to the alleged fact that this use of the highway has been very generally acquiesced in by the adjoining owners of the land, and that such acquiescence is quite strong evidence that the use was proper.

The question is one plainly of law, and, whatever may have hitherto been the legislative belief or the opinion of the adjoining owners as to the propriety of this use of a rural public highway, it must be decided by us in accordance with our own view as to what the law is upon the subject. The length of time which any particular adjoining owner has acquiesced in this use of a highway, the circumstances attending upon and surrounding that acquiescence, the probable considerations operating either to create or to continue it, are all alike matters upon which the court is completely ignorant, and any opinion as to the legality of the use, founded upon an acquiescence by the adjoining owners under circumstances unknown to the court, must, in its very nature, be almost, if not entirely, worthless. The argument founded upon the legislative belief of the legality of such use has also very little weight. There was no warranty implied from the passage of the statute that the consent of the state alone was necessary. All the facts were known to all the parties, and whether, in addition to the consent of the state, that of the adjoining owners was necessary, was a matter which the state might well leave to the parties interested to try out when the point arose. The question has never been covered up or otherwise concealed, and at the most it can only be urged that the legislature was of the opinion, upon this purely legal question, that the consent of the adjoining owner was not necessary. It is not contended that if it had held the other opinion it would have legislated any more favorably for the companies. If such consent were necessary, it was on account of the constitutional provision that private property should not be taken for public use without due compensation, and this provision the legislature could neither alter nor efface. The companies cannot, therefore, be legally said to have suffered anything by reason of this legislative opinion, and they are not on that account in any position to appeal to a specially favorable construction of the law in their behalf. The legislature could have provided that in all future dedications of land for a public highway, and in taking land under the right of eminent domain for that use thereafter, the right to use it for the purpose for which defendant now uses the highway in question would be implied in such dedication, and paid for when taken. That would have no effect upon land already dedicated or taken for a highway, and could not aid the defendant. An alleged practical construction of the law for many years by the general public in favor of the defendant's contention cannot be the foundation upon which, if proved, to base a legal claim on the part of the defendant; and, unless it can show that its use of the highway at the locus in quo is within the limitation of the public easement, it can create no right of continuance in such use arising from a general public acquiescence in its claim, provided the plaintiff, or those under or through whom he claims, have not given, expressly or by implication, the requisite consent. What other parties may have thought, or what action they may have taken, upon such a question, and with regard to their lands, cannot in any manner conclude or affect the plaintiff when he chooses to deny the existence of defendant's right to use land of which plaintiff owns the fee, subject to the public easement therein for a public highway. We agree with the learned counsel for the defendant that the question is not essentially different from that which would arise if the state itself, through its public officers, by virtue of an act of the legislature, should attempt to operate a telegraph line by means of poles, etc., placed in a public highway and without the consent of, or compensation made to, the adjoining owners, who owned the fee of the highway subject to the public easement. If the state itself could do such an act, it could create and authorize a corporation to do it.

We think neither the state nor its corporation can appropriate any portion of the public highway permanently to its own special, continuous, and exclusive use by setting up poles therein, although the purpose to which they are to be applied is to string wires
